ABRIDGED PROSPECTUS.

The Company has been formed primarily for the purpose of acquiring as going concerns as from the 15th day of April, 1910:—

(1) The "British Metalite" Lamp and Metal Filament Manufacturing Business, Goodwill, and Assets in the United Kingdom of the Bryant Trading Syndicate, Limited; and

(2) The Business, Patents, Processes, and Goodwill of the International Filaments, Limited.

The liabilities of both the Vendor Companies will be discharged by them.

"Contracts exceeding Fifteen Million (15,000,000) Filaments per annum for the next five years are already in hand and in course of execution, in addition to large Trade orders, and the Syndicate is on the list of Contractors for, and has received orders from, amongst others, over fifty Corporations, the War and Admiralty Departments, Home Office, Crown Agents for the Colonies, several of the principal Home Railways, Tramway Corporations, Hotels, and National Telephone Company. Arrangements are being made both in the United Kingdom and abroad to develop the business on an extensive scale whereby a large proportion of the world's trade should be secured, and on the installation of the Company's proposed larger works contracts for many additional millions will be available for acceptance."

The present minimum consumption of Incandescent Electric Lamps within the United Kingdom is estimated at 40,000,000 per annum, but when the fact is more generally known that owing to the introduction of Metal Filament Lamps electricity has become cheaper to use as an illuminant than gas, the demand for those lamps will be enormously increased. At present gas supplies 90 per cent. of the artificial lighting in the country. It will thus be obvious that there is wide scope for development, under a well-defined system of organisation, by which the Company should enormously increase the output of their "British Metalite" Lamps, and it is computed that the sale in the United Kingdom alone will amount to at least 5,000,000 annually.

ESTIMATED PROFITS AND REVENUE.

An estimate based on results obtained by the Vendor Companies since the perfection of the Patents and Processes, and compiled in conjunction with Mr F. Harrison, A.M.I.E.E., shows, after charging all outgoings and expenses of manufacture, the following minimum annual profits:—

|---|---|
| On the sale of "British Metalite" Lamps.. | 125,000 |
| On the sale of "British Metalite" Filaments to other Lamp Manufacturers in this Country and abroad .. .. .. .. | 130,000 |
| | £255,000 |
| Deduct for Administration, Advertising, and General Expenses, Reserves, Depreciation, and Contingencies, 33 1-3 per cent.. .. | 85,000 |
| | £170,000 |

Showing a Dividend exceeding 30 per centum on the entire Capital.

The above estimate has no regard to additional and profitable sources of Revenue, such as the sale of Prepared Metal for the manufacture of filaments, special machinery and plant to foreign manufacturers and subsidiary companies, and the granting of licences when expedient.

EXTRACTS FROM REPORTS.

Dr. HENRY REYNOLDS, Ph.D., B.Sc., of Manchester.

"I consider their factory is well equipped with modern and up-to-date apparatus and appliances for the production of tungsten filaments and lamps. Their methods and processes are simple and excellent, and I am especially pleased with their reduction process. Their filaments are strong and consist of practically pure tungsten. The specific resistance is only from 8 to 10 microhms per centimetre cube; this indicates a high degree of purity in the filaments, the variation being probably due to small traces of carbon which can never be entirely eliminated.

This great purity accounts for the very low breakages of filaments in the manufacture of the lamps, bringing about a low prime cost of production, and a thing far more important, it is the chief factor in producing the excellent results obtained in the life tests of the completed lamps.

"I can only add that the 'Metalite' filaments possess the very best qualities that a tungsten filament should possess, and I have not yet examined their equal."

Dr. C. HEINRICH WEBER, of Berlin.

"The cost of manufacture, owing primarily to your processes, has been reduced to a lower figure than any hitherto obtainable without in any way detracting from the quality of the lamps and filaments from which adequate tests (as per particulars herewith) show a marked superiority to any other lamps or filament on the German or English market. .. .. ..

"Taking into consideration the results of my investigation and disregarding entirely the capitalised value of distinctly inferior filaments purchased and manufactured by other companies, I value your invention in the United Kingdom at a minimum sum of one hundred thousand pounds."

Tests have also been made by the National Physical Laboratory showing marked superiority over other well-known filament lamps in every respect. In addition to the above, life tests have been made by one of the largest London Electricity Supply Companies on 13 "Metalite" Lamps taken indiscriminately by it from those purchased in the ordinary way of business showing an average life per lamp of 2,226 hours, and of these lamps on the 17th June, 1910, four were still burning efficiently.

Twenty-seven Patents and Provisional Patents, together with all rights to improvements, are being acquired by this Company, and Thos. Terrell, Esq., K.C., has given his opinion in regard to the principal British Specification.

The Articles of Association and the Agreements, Reports of Experts and Chartered Patent Agents, Certificate of Tests, and Valuation of the Plant and Machinery by Messrs Miller, Reid, Paxton and Co., 5 & 6 Clement's Inn, London, W.C., together with Counsel's opinion, can be seen at the offices of the Solicitors to the Company, at any time during business hours while the Subscription List is open.

It is intended to apply in due course to the London Stock Exchange for a special settlement and quotation in the Shares now offered.

A CLEAR BRITISH STATEMENT

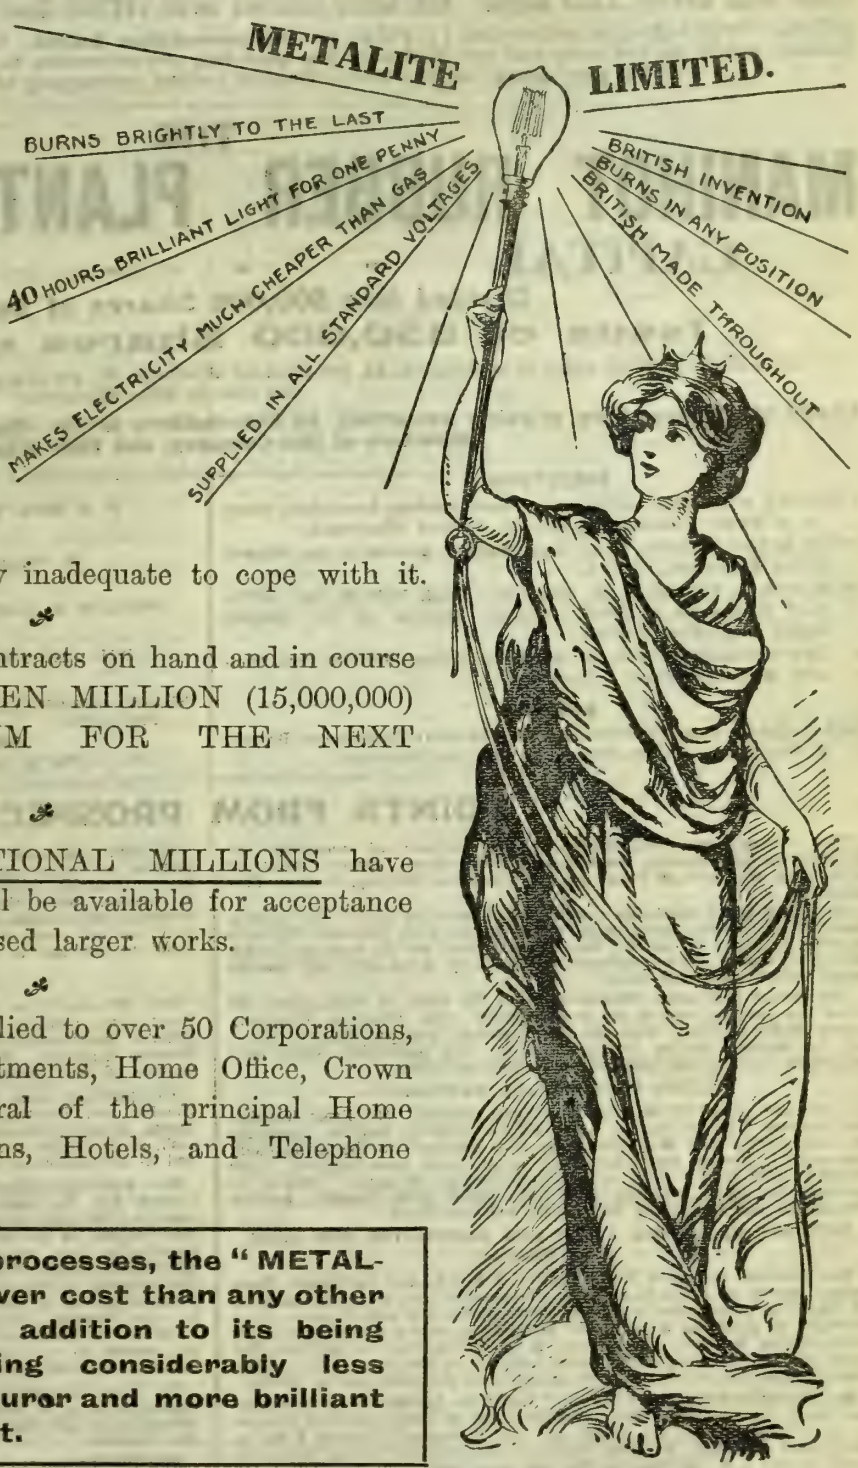
The "METALITE" Lamp is the British-invented metal filament lamp that is manufactured in Great Britain.

The severest tests have proved it to be SUPERIOR IN EVERY RESPECT to foreign productions.

The practical proof of this superiority is that the demand for the "METALITE" is so overwhelming that the present factory accommodation is totally inadequate to cope with it.



From America alone, the contracts on hand and in course of execution EXCEED FIFTEEN MILLION (15,000,000) FILAMENTS PER ANNUM FOR THE NEXT FIVE YEARS.

Orders for MANY ADDITIONAL MILLIONS have had to be refused, but they will be available for acceptance on the installation of the proposed larger works.

The "METALITE" is supplied to over 50 Corporations, the War and Admiralty Departments, Home Office, Crown Agents for the Colonies, several of the principal Home Railways, Tramway Corporations, Hotels, and Telephone Companies.

Owing to certain secret processes, the "METALITE" is produced at a lower cost than any other metal filament lamp, in addition to its being more durable, consuming considerably less current, and emitting a purer and more brilliant light.

The "METALITE" Lamp is protected by TWENTY-SEVEN PATENTS AND PROVISIONAL PATENTS in Great Britain and throughout the World. LEGAL PROCEEDINGS will be immediately instituted IN THE EVENT OF ANY INFRINGEMENT.

THIS FORM OF APPLICATION MAY BE USED.

This Form to be sent with remittance to The London County and Westminster Bank, Limited, 21, Lombard street, London, E.C., or to The Commercial Bank of Scotland, Ltd., 62 Lombard street, London, E.C., or Branches.

POINTS FROM PROSPECTUS.

This Company has been formed for the purpose of acquiring the Kwamagoda and Usanga Ceara Rubber Plantations, situate about 18 miles from the port of Tanga on the Usambara Railway, German East Africa.

The Kwamagoda plantation consists of about 1,250 acres. This plantation already contains about 100,000 Ceara Rubber trees (Manihot Glaziovii) planted on about 250 acres. These 100,000 trees are all tappable within the year 1910-11. This plantation, when fully developed, will contain about 400,000 additional trees.

The Usanga plantation consists of about 700 acres, of which about 182 acres are planted with 37,500 Ceara rubber trees (Manihot Glaziovii). About 20,000 of these trees are now tappable, and the balance, 17,500 will be tappable during the year 1911-12. The plantation, when fully developed, will contain about 260,000 additional trees.

TREES PLANTED AND TAPPABLE.

There are in all 137,500 trees at present planted. Mr. Ernst Koehler, the General Manager of the Lewa Rubber Estates, Limited, reporting by cable on the 18th May, 1910, says, with reference to the Kwamagoda plantation, "planted 100 hectares (250 acres), 70,000 trees tappable, 22,000 October, 8,000 1911." With reference to Usanga, he says: "Planted 73 hectares (182 acres), totalling 37,500 trees, about 20,000 tappable, balance 1911-12, all and everything exceedingly well developed."

ESTIMATE OF RUBBER YIELD AND PROFITS FOR THE FIRST FIVE YEARS.

The Directors requested Mr. Wicherley, F.R.H.S., the well-known Ceara rubber expert, to advise them on a conservative basis as to the quantity of rubber to be expected from the estate during the next 5 years. It is intended to plant, as a minimum, 50,000 trees during the present year; 50,000 during the year 1911-12; and 50,000 during the year 1912-13. The trees planted this year will become tappable in the year 1912-13; those planted next year will be tappable 1913-14; and the remainder in 1914-15.

Mr. Wicherley reports as follows:—"Under the favourable circumstances existing in German East Africa Manihot trees of three years old produce on an average ¾ lb. of dry rubber per year increasing to nearly 2 lbs. at four years and over. In order to be on the safe side I have taken the yield at only ½ lb per tree for the first year, increasing, of course, with the age of the trees, and on this basis I have made the following estimate of the rubber production from the plantations for the next five years:—

|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| During Season | 1910-11 | .. | 120,000 trees | should produce | 30,000 lbs. | rubber |
| " | " | 1911-12 | .. | 137,000 | " | " | 75,000 | " | " |
| " | " | 1912-13 | .. | 187,000 | " | " | 135,000 | " | " |
| " | " | 1913-14 | .. | 257,000 | " | " | 220,000 | " | " |
| " | " | 1914-15 | .. | 287,000 | " | " | 315,000 | " | " |

"The above figures, in my estimation, are exceedingly conservative. I have only allowed slightly more than 1lb. for any one tree in the two latter years, whereas you may confidently expect a normal yield of at least 2 lbs. of rubber per tree at the age to which the trees will then have attained."

The cost of production will be fully covered by 1s. 6d. per lb. (Mr. Müller's report). The best Ceara rubber at present realises within 10 per cent. of the price of best Para. Best Para now sells at 9s. 6d per lb. The following table of expected profits is based on a selling price for the year 1910-11 of only 4s. 6d. per lb.; for the year 1911-12 of 4s.; for the year 1912-13 of 3s. 6d.; for the year 1913-14 of 3s. 3d.; and for the year 1914-15 of 3s. per lb. The Directors expect these estimates to be greatly exceeded, but in case they are not the result is sufficiently satisfactory.

| Year. | | Lbs. | | Profit per lb. | | Net return. | | Equivalent to a dividend on the issued capital of |
| 1910/11 | .. | 30,000 | .. | 3/- | .. | £4,500 | .. | 10% |
| 1911/12 | .. | 75,000 | .. | 2/6 | .. | £9,375 | .. | 20½% |
| 1912/13 | .. | 135,000 | .. | 2/- | .. | £13,500 | .. | 30% |
| 1913/14 | .. | 220,000 | .. | 1/9 | .. | £19,250 | .. | 42½% |
| 1914/15 | .. | 315,000 | .. | 1/6 | .. | £23,625 | .. | 52½% |

Without additional planting the yield of rubber may be expected to increase by 10 per cent. annually. But the policy of the Directors will be to continue planting yearly until the greater part of the estate is covered. When the estate is entirely planted the yield will be a minimum of 1,000,000 lbs. of rubber per annum (450 tons), which at the very low net profit of fifteenpence per lb. will provide annual dividends equal to one and a quarter times the total capital.

MANAGEMENT.

The Directors have made arrangements with the Mkumbi Rubber Plantations, Limited, whose property adjoins their plantations, for the general superintendence of their plantations by the Manager of the Mkumbi Company, Mr. Hans Paulsen, of Tanga, who undertakes to provide efficient plantation managers.

The purchase price for the property payable to the Hanseatische Handels and Plantagen Gesellschaft mit Beschraenkter Haftung, of Tanga, German East Africa, is £30,000, which is payable as to £10,000 in cash, as to £10,000 in cash and (or) shares at the option of the Company, and as to £10,000 in fully paid up shares of the Company.

The Zone Concessions Syndicate, Limited, of Broad Street House, London, E.C., has undertaken in consideration of a payment of £1,000 in cash and the right to subscribe at par for the balance of the Company's share capital to provide the preliminary expenses of promotion, including registration fees, reports, cablegrams, brokers' fees, the printing and advertising of this Prospectus, and legal and other expenses down to the first general allotment of shares (except brokerage and underwriting commissions) at an estimated price of £4,000. This amount to be repaid by the Company after allotment. If the said expenses exceed the estimate the Syndicate is liable to pay the excess. If such expenses do not amount to such estimate, the Zone Concessions Syndicate, Limited, is entitled to retain the balance.

The Zone Concessions Syndicate, Limited, has further undertaken in consideration of a commission of 5 per cent. with an over-riding commission of 2½ per cent. to procure the underwriting of 250,000 shares of the Company.

The full Prospectus contains all the statutory information.

Prospectuses, containing the reports on which the statements made are based, and Forms of Application may be obtained from the Bankers, Brokers, Solicitor, Auditors, and at the Offices of the Company.

This Form may be used.

ABRIDGED PROSPECTUS.

OBJECTS.—The Company has been formed with the object (amongst others) of acquiring from City Central Sites, Limited, of 54, New Broad Street, London, E.C., the Block of Buildings now in course of completion, having frontages to Austin Friars, Great Winchester Street, and Pinners Court, Old Broad Street, E.C., and occupying an unequalled position for high-class Professional and Mercantile Offices in close proximity to the Stock Exchange.

CHARACTER AND SITUATION.—The Buildings have been designed by and carried out under the supervision of Mr. M. E. Collins, F.R.I.B.A., and by reason of their handsome elevation, careful planning, splendid light, and unusually quiet situation, afford one of the most up-to-date Blocks of Office Property in the heart of the City, and have attracted a large amount of attention, substantial lettings having already been effected to tenants of the highest class. The buildings are already sufficiently finished to accommodate tenants, several of whom are now in occupation, and the Vendors have contracted to complete the same (except tenants' requirements) by the 1st September, 1910. Up to the date of issue of this Prospectus offices have been already let producing a gross income of over £18,000 per annum.

PARTICULARS OF LEASES.—The Property will be held under two leases direct from the freeholder, as under:—

PINNERS HALL (MAIN BUILDING).—For a term of 99 years from 24th June, 1908, at a Ground Rent of £7,500 for the third year and £9,825 per annum for the residue of the said term.

1, PINNERS COURT.—For a term of 60 years from the 24th June, 1908, at a Ground Rent of £175 per annum.

Both premises are now known as Pinners Hall.

These rents are liable to be increased by about £100 per annum, being an amount equal to 4 per cent. per annum on the sum expended by the Freeholder in redeeming the tithe rent charge.

The sum of £100 per annum is also payable in respect of certain rights over adjoining premises.

The Buildings cover a ground area of 20,000 square feet.

INCOME.—When fully let, it is estimated that the property will produce a gross income of £37,515 per annum, and after providing for ground rent and all other outgoings, there should be a surplus income of about £17,586 per annum, whilst the interest upon the Debentures will amount only to £6,250 per annum.

The property has been reported on by Mr. Leslie R. Vigers, a member of the firm of Messrs. Vigers and Co., and by Messrs. Lofts and Warner. Copies of their Reports are appended:—

Dear Sirs, PINNERS HALL.

I have visited this property and made an inspection of the various floors, and consider the building well arranged and lighted, and that the remaining offices should soon find tenants.

I estimated the rental value of the offices per foot super from the plans some time since, and I find the portions let justify my estimates.

I consider when all let the building should produce a gross rental of £37,515 and a net rental of £17,586.

I consider the value of the leases of the property is £258,340, after deducting the sums allowed to the tenants towards fittings, etc., etc.

I am, Yours faithfully,

The Directors of The City Central Sites, Limited.

PINNERS HALL.

Messrs. Wheater, Cornwallis-West, and Co.,
5, Austin Friars, E.C.

Dear Sirs,

As requested by you, we have made an inspection of the various floors of the newly erected buildings known as "Pinners Hall," situate fronting Austin Friars and Great Winchester Street, E.C. We estimate the value of the leases of the property on the basis of the present lettings and estimated rental values at the sum of Two hundred and fifty-seven thousand, two hundred and seventy-five pounds (£257,275).

Yours faithfully,

The above Reports show that the Debenture Stock is secured twice over as regards the capital value of the property and (in view of Mr. Vigers' estimate of the net rental) almost three times over as regards interest.

The Debenture Stock will be secured by a Trust Deed in favour of the Phœnix Assurance Company, Limited, as Trustees for the Stockholders, which will create a First Mortgage of this property and the Sinking Fund Policy and a floating charge over the other assets of the Company.

The property is sold subject to and with the benefit of all sub-leases and tenancy agreements granted and entered into by the Vendors.

The Vendors to the Company are City Central Sites, Limited, of 54, New Broad Street, London E.C. and the consideration payable to them is £250,000, payable as to £124,596 by the allotment of 124,596 fully paid-up shares in the Company, as to £404 in cash, and as to £125,000 by the allotment of the present issue of Debenture Stock. In regard to No. 1, Pinners Court, the Company is a sub-purchaser, the original vendor being Mr. Richard Stafford Charles, of 2, Broad Street Place, E.C., and the consideration payable to him is £3,930 and is payable by City Central Sites, Limited. No amount is payable for goodwill.

The Debenture Stock of the present issue and 124,596 of the shares of the Company have been agreed to be issued as part of the consideration payable to the Vendors for the leasehold properties. No other shares or debentures have been issued or agreed to be issued as fully or partly paid-up or otherwise than in cash. Under the contract between Messrs. Wheater, Cornwallis-West and Co. and City Central Sites, Limited, mentioned below, a commission at the rate of 5 per cent. on the amount of the present issue is agreed to be paid by City Central Sites, Limited, to Messrs. Wheater, Cornwallis-West, and Co. for agreeing to underwrite or procure sub-underwriting for the present issue.

For contracts, see full prospectus.

The preliminary expenses payable by the Vendors (exclusive of brokerage) are estimated at £4,000.

A brokerage of 10s. per cent. will be paid by the Vendors on the amount of Stock applied for and allotted on applications through brokers.

Copies of the First Mortgage Debenture Stock Trust Deed, and of the Memorandum and Articles of Association of the Company and of the above-mentioned contracts, can be seen at the offices of the Company's Solicitors at any time during the hours of 10 a.m. and 4 p.m., while the lists are open.

A copy of the Company's Memorandum of Association is printed at the back of the full Prospectus and forms part thereof.

A Stock Exchange settlement and quotation will be applied for in due course.

Applications for Debenture Stock are not invited by this notice, and can only be made and accepted upon the terms of the full prospectus.

The failure to pay any instalment when due renders all previous payments liable to forfeiture.

When no allotment is made the deposit will be returned in full, and in case of a partial allotment the balance will be applied towards the amount due on the Stock allotted.

Prospectuses and application forms can be obtained from Messrs. Wheater, Cornwallis-West, and Co., 5, Austin Friars, London, E.C., of the Brokers, Messrs. Leonard Clow and Co., 22, Austin Friars, London, E.C., and from the Company's Bankers, Messrs. Hoare, 37, Fleet Street, London, E.C., to whom all applications should be sent.

Keeping in Health

is a much easier matter if you have your bedroom floors covered with LI-NOLA. You spend many hours in the bedroom, and whilst sleeping it should be your extra aim to breathe air as pure as possible. With dust-filled carpets in the bedroom, dust germs and dust are inhaled. The lungs do not get the pure reviving air they should, and the result is injury to your health, limpness when you awake, and a "throaty" feeling. LI-NOLA gathers no dust, and does not pollute the bedroom atmosphere. Free patterns show you how the luxurious colour of a costly carpet is equalled at a little cost. Kindly apply for post-free samples, set "12."

4. In every instance the prize will be given in money, subject to no condition whatever, except the publication of the winner's real name and address in this Journal.

5. Competitors will be allowed eleven days for the composition and despatch of their efforts; but all such communications must, at the latest, be received at the TRUTH Office by the first post on the morning of the second Monday succeeding the publication of the subject for competition.

PUZZLE EDITOR OF "TRUTH," CARTERET STREET, QUEEN ANNE'S GATE, S.W.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE No. 1,641.

Our cousins, the Yankees, are supposed to be peculiarly endowed with the faculty of picturesque exaggeration, and to employ it, in the main, for the glorification of their own country and its institutions.

Possibly the imputation is unmerited. Into that aspect of the question I will not enter. The fact remains that with us on this side of the herring pond the humorous exaggerations of American boastfulness have passed into an accepted creed; and when any story illustrative of this particular kind of tall-talking is related, it's always fathered upon one of the progeny of Uncle Sam.

Thus it was an American fisherman who caught the skate that measured an acre; and an American, again, whose wife (in evidence of the terrific speed of the U.S.A. express trains) put her head out of the car window to say good-bye to her spouse and found herself kissing a black man at the next station.

These are merely ordinary specimens, which many of my readers, doubtless, will have no difficulty in capping.

I hereby invite them to do so, with the offer of the usual Prize of Two Guineas for

THE BEST HUMOROUS ANECDOTE ILLUSTRATIVE OF THE (SUPPOSED) EXAGGERATED BOASTFULNESS OF THE TYPICAL YANKEE.

Anecdotes need not be original. Chestnuts—provided they are good chestnuts—are admissible.

Each competitor may submit two, but not more than two, anecdotes.

All anecdotes must reach TRUTH office by the first post on Monday August 8.

ENTRE NOUS.

THE King and Queen are to leave Euston on Friday night for Ballater, travelling by the West Coast route on the London and North-Western Royal train. The Lord Provost and Magistrates of Aberdeen have received permission to meet their Majesties at Ferryhill (the junction of the Caledonian and Deeside lines) on Saturday morning, but no address is to be presented. It is expected that the King and Queen will reside at Balmoral for between eight and nine weeks. It is just possible that their Majesties may postpone their departure for Scotland until Monday night.

On their return from Balmoral the King and Queen will take up their residence at Windsor Castle for the autumn and winter. Their Majesties are going to Scotland sooner than had originally been proposed, as it is thought that the comparative rest and quiet of Balmoral and the bracing air of Upper Deeside will be beneficial to them after their hard and very trying work during the last three months.

During the residence of the Court at Balmoral the King will be attended there by various Cabinet Ministers, who are to take the duty in turn, each one staying at the castle for a week. This is the same arrangement which prevailed in the last reign, and during the last forty years of Queen Victoria's reign.

The rearrangement of the Royal banners in the choir of St. George's Chapel, Windsor Castle, which takes place after a demise of the Crown, will shortly be carried out by the officials of the Order of the Garter. King Edward's banner and other paraphernalia will be removed to St. George's Hall, in the Castle, and will be replaced by King George's banner and the accompaniments. These are to be hung over the Sovereign's stall, which is to the right of the entrance into the choir from the nave, and immediately under the organ screen. This stall is usually occupied by the Dean of Windsor. It is a curious fact that the Dean and Canons have no places really of their own in the choir of St. George's Chapel, except the seats within the rails of the altar adjoining the Communion table.

Queen Alexandra has changed her plans for the summer and autumn several times, and now there has been another alteration. Her Majesty is disposed to proceed from Sandringham to Scotland for a short time, and the King has offered to place either Abergeldie Castle or Birkhall House at his mother's disposal, unless she prefers to be a guest at Balmoral or at Mar Lodge, where the Princess Royal and the Duke of Fife arrived last week for the season.

The intended visit of Queen Alexandra to the Duke and Duchess of Cumberland at their country seat in Upper Austria will not take place until the autumn. Some of the papers announced that her Majesty would arrive at Gmunden from London this week.

Princess Victoria and her cousin, the Grand Duchess Marie Georgievna, are staying at Harrogate, at a house in York Place, overlooking the Stray. They take the waters every morning and afternoon at the Royal Baths, and their spare time is occupied with motor drives about the country. The Princesses have paid private visits to Harewood, Knaresborough, and other interesting places in the neighbourhood. It is expected that they will leave Harrogate in a few days. The Grand Duke George Michailovitch has joined his wife, the Grand Duchess Marie, at Harrogate. Princess Victoria will go shortly to Christiania on a visit to the King and Queen of Sweden, with whom she is to pass the autumn.

The Queen of Spain's arrival in the Isle of Wight is definitely fixed for the end of this week or the early part of next week, and she will stay with Princess Henry of Battenberg at Osborne Cottage for about a month. The Queen of Spain and her mother will be the guests of the Empress Eugénie at Farnborough Hill for a day or two, and they are to pay a strictly private visit to Windsor Castle, in order that her Majesty may enter the Royal vault, and herself lay a wreath on King Edward's coffin. She will on the same day visit the Frogmore Mausoleum.

I noticed the other day a statement in a weekly paper that the Emperor of Russia has a Civil List of over a million sterling. The fact is that the Emperors of Russia have no Civil List, as they draw ad lib. on the Imperial Treasury, every rouble in which is supposed to be at the absolute disposal of the Sovereign, who, by the way, is the owner of vast estates and forests, with mines of great value. A diplomatist, newly arrived at St. Petersburg, asked a functionary of the Russian Foreign Office the amount of the Imperial Civil List, and received the answer, "Que voulez-vous avec une Liste Civile? Tout appartient au Tsar, et il prend ce qu'il veut." It was said that during the year before his assassination the Emperor Alexander II. drew one hundred and twenty-five millions of francs from the Treasury in order to make what he considered to be an adequate provision for his morganatic wife, Princess Dolgorouki, and her children.

The Duke and Duchess of Schleswig-Holstein-Augustenburg, who spent the winter and spring in Egypt, have arrived for the remainder of the summer and the autumn at Primkenau, their place in Silesia, where they will receive a visit from Prince Christian, who is next heir to the titles and estates. The Duke is a great grandson of the Duchess of Kent, through her first marriage to the Prince of Leiningen, and he is the only brother of the German Emperor. The Duchess is the daughter of Prince Philip of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha (the head of the wealthy Hungarian branch of this family), and her mother is Princess Louise of Belgium, eldest daughter of the late King Leopold.

The Grand Duchess Augusta of Mecklenburg-Strelitz has just celebrated her eighty-eighth birthday. She is the elder sister of the late Duke of Cambridge, and she was married to the late Grand Duke of Mecklenburg-Strelitz in June, 1843, in the private chapel of Buckingham Palace. Until a few years ago she was in the habit of spending two or three months of the London season in England, but she is now too feeble to leave Germany.

Lord and Lady Aberdeen left Ireland last week for a short visit to the other side of the water. The Lord-Lieutenant practically never leaves Ireland, as he is divested of his office when the Lords Justices are sworn in at Dublin Castle on his leaving the country. The party character of the Viceroyalty—a lamentable feature of this high office in Ireland—is kept up by the selection of Privy Councillors of the same party to fill the place vacated by the Viceroy.

M. Athos Romanos, the late Greek Minister in London, has been appointed to the Legation at Paris. His Excellency is to present his letters of credence to the President of the Republic next week, in order that he may be officially installed before King George arrives in Paris from Aix-les-Bains.

The Duke and Duchess of Buccleuch are to arrive this week at Langholm Lodge, where they will entertain small parties for grouse shooting on the extensive Eskdale moors. The Duke and Duchess will proceed towards the end of September to Drumlanrig Castle, the magnificent old seat of the Dukes of Buccleuch and Queensberry, on the Nith, near Thornhill, where they intend to spend the autumn.

Lord Lonsdale, who has been taking the waters at Carlsbad, has leased the celebrated deer forest of Martindale, in Westmorland, which is stocked with over five hundred head of wild red deer. This forest, which belongs to the trustees of the late Mr. Hasell, of Dalemain, is bounded north and south by Lakes Ullswater and Haweswater.

The Duke and Duchess of Westminster will entertain a large party next week at Eaton Hall for the Chester polo week. The Duke and Duchess are afterwards going to Scotland to spend a few weeks at Reay Forest. During their stay in the North they will divide the time between Lochmore Lodge and Stack Lodge, the residences on the extensive shootings which are leased by the Duke of Westminster from the Duke of Sutherland.

The Duke and Duchess of Devonshire have been staying a great deal since Whitsuntide at Compton Place, Eastbourne, and they have paid several short visits to Chatsworth. The Duke and Duchess will arrive in a few days at The Hall, Bolton Abbey, where they are to entertain a series of parties for grouse driving over the extensive Upper Wharfedale moors. Very good sport is expected this season on the Duke of Devonshire's range of moors, which usually yield about the heaviest bags of grouse which are obtained in either England or Scotland. The King has several times stayed at Bolton Abbey in August during the last fifteen years for the shooting.

Lord Ducie, who has just celebrated his eighty-fourth birthday, is the doyen of Lords-Lieutenant. He was appointed to the Lieutenancy of Gloucestershire by Lord Palmerston in 1857 on the death of the first and last Earl Fitzhardinge, who had succeeded the sixth Duke of Beaufort in 1835. Directly the Duke was dead Lord Fitzhardinge (then Lord Segrave) rushed up to London from Berkeley Castle, and hastened to Lord Melbourne's house. He demanded the Lieutenancy of his county because he returned three members to the House of Commons:—"The electors do not know my brothers by sight. My influence returns them. Unless I am appointed they shall go over to the Opposition." The Ministerial majority was then very small, and the transfer of the Berkeley votes would have been a serious disaster. The appointment excited much scandal and keen disapproval, as Lord Segrave's manner of life was very disreputable, but he proved an excellent Lord-Lieutenant on the whole.

Sir Henry Tichborne, who was the head of one of the oldest Roman Catholic families in England, died last week only four days after his return from a hunting tour in Africa. Sir Henry never took any part in public life, but he was a man of considerable ability. His table talk was remarkably good, and he was an excellent speaker and distinguished as a linguist. He was best known as a hunter of big game in India and Africa, but he had strong literary tastes, and he was an enthusiastic student of Shakespeare. Sir Henry was a most liberal landlord, and his kindness and generosity to the poor were unlimited. He was constantly giving away money in charity both at home and outside his own neighbourhood, and he always pensioned old estate servants. At Tichborne Park there is one of the finest collections of sporting trophies in Great Britain. Sir Henry also possessed a splendid collection of guns and other firearms. He was "pricked" for the office of High Sheriff of Hants in 1892, but he went off to Africa to hunt big game, and he was fined 500 gs. as a penalty for being absent from the assizes at Winchester.

THE BLESSINGS OF BANK HOLIDAY.

(By One who has Studied them First Hand.)

They sought with me the silver sea;
It seemed a lengthy ride;
Half-squashed, I sat by neighbours fat;
We travelled eight a side.

But on each face shone, plain to trace,
Their keen, prospective glee;
For what a day enjoy would they
Beside the silver sea!

They'd breathe the rare ozone-filled air,
Bask in the August sun;
Nice walks they'd go; they'd sail, they'd row,
Combining health with fun.

Then, in the end, they'd homeward wend,
Refreshed as they could be
By that one day of healthy play
Beside the silver sea.

* * * *

I travelled back with them. Alack!
How all had lost its gloss!
The men I viewed were mostly "screwed,"
The women fagged and cross;

The children—well, the truth to tell,
They'd gorged themselves too free,
As, faith! I learned ere we'd returned
To London from the sea.

To-morrow—eh? Refreshed will they Resume their useful toil?
No! Bed for Pa; the same for Ma;
For Tommy, castor-oil.

Oh! blessed quest of health and rest!
For many days to be
How they'll repent that one they spent
Beside the silver sea.

The discussion on the Royal Declaration Bill is one of those occasions which bring out the most absurd traits of our national character. It is fifty years or more since Doyle drew a comical picture in Punch of "a Protestant gentleman abusing ye Pope" on the platform of Exeter Hall. The Protestant gentleman was a ludicrous figure enough then, but he is fifty years more ludicrous now, being that much more behind the times.

It puzzles me how any one outside Bedlam can excite himself at the present date about such a fly-blown antiquity as "the Protestant Succession." It was very natural that men should feel strongly on this subject when the trial of the seven Bishops was still fresh in their memories, and while James the Second and his descendants were still scheming to recover the Crown. But nowadays, when the Sovereign has ceased to exercise any administrative power, and when Roman Catholics are admitted without a murmur to Parliament, to the Cabinet, and to all the highest offices of State, what rational argument can be found for subjecting the King to any religious test?

It may concern the Church of England that its titular Head should be in communion with it, but no Protestant Nonconformist has any interest in the question; and even the Church of England has not much ground for agitation on this point, seeing that a Roman Catholic, not to say a Jew, may appoint its bishops and deans, and dispense ecclesiastical patronage generally. The King's religion is in these days his own private affair, and his subjects have no business to trouble their heads about it.

If the Front Bench Conference does not eventually agree upon some method of dealing with the House of Lords, the Eight Brahmins concerned will be fairly reproached, after what has now passed, with making fools of themselves and the country. Mr. Asquith guarded himself very cautiously last Friday against breathing a word that could be construed as conveying a definite expectation of a satisfactory result. But the mere fact that the Eight have held twelve sittings and think it desirable to hold more warrants the spectators in forming such an expectation. It really ought to be possible in twelve meetings—less than that, I should say—to discover whether there are irreconcilable differences of opinion on fundamental points. If no such differences have been discovered, then it ought to be certain that the Eight will agree on something definite and practical. Otherwise they are wasting their time and deranging the business of Parliament for nothing.

To expect "something definite and practical" from these lengthy deliberations does not necessarily mean that the Eight are going to settle the House of Lords question offhand, or to propound any cut-and-dried scheme of reform. They are not plenipotentiaries. They have, indeed, nothing in the nature of a mandate. The very assumption on their part of authority to draft an amendment of the Constitution would provoke a revolt in both political parties against their conclusions, irrespective of their merits.

JEFFREY & CO.'S NEW ARTISTIC WALL PAPERS are on view at their Show Rooms, The Wallpaper Gallery, 31, Mortimer St., W. To be had of all Decorators. Factory: 64, Essex Rd., Islington, N.

What the Conference certainly could do, as a committee of the leaders of both Houses, is to make very authoritative recommendations regarding the readjustment of the relations of the two Houses. They might also usefully arrive at an understanding as to some method of procedure by which a Bill for the reform of the House of Lords might be lifted out of the region of ordinary party politics and passed through both Houses without resorting to a creation of peers. If there is any room at all for compromise on the reform question, we might begin by agreeing on a procedure ad hoc for dealing with a Reform Bill. But I do not believe in any scheme for the reform of the Upper House being settled, even in outline, by a voluntary and irresponsible committee sitting in camerâ, and I hardly suppose any one else does.

The significance of the announcement made by Sir Edward Grey in reply to a question of Mr. Joseph King, M.P., that he had instructed Consul-General Casement to go up the Putumayo and to ascertain whether any British subjects are in distress, and if so the cause thereof, lies not so much in the object of the investigation as in the personality of the investigator. Mr. Casement is a gentleman whose investigations on the Congo threw much light on the iniquities perpetrated upon the unfortunate natives of the Free State, and he may be trusted not to take a too narrow view of the scope of his inquiry. I should, think, however, that the British Amazon Company has by this time done all that can be done in the way of setting its house in order.

Garrulous wiseacres are pressing the Government to "find a post" for Lord Kitchener, and if no post can be found, then one must be made. It strikes me that Mr. Haldane has had worry enough over the Mediterranean post without having another on his hands. The silliest of all suggestions is that Lord Kitchener should be invited to "inspect and report" on the Territorial Army, a duty which Sir John French is paid to do, and does very well.

Like others before him, Lord Kitchener must wait his turn; nor, in spite of his officious friends, has he shown any disposition to do otherwise. He wisely refused the Mediterranean post for the same reasons as the Duke of Connaught refused it before him. What he set his heart on was going back to India as Viceroy, but Lord Morley set his face the other way; for he knew that Lord Kitchener's appointment would have added fuel to the flame of Indian unrest. A Commander-in-Chief who could drag his Viceroy through the mud was the last man to put up in his place. Where he could not submit to be ruled others would not submit to him. If his success in ousting Lord Curzon is a proof of strength, that is not the sort of strength which India wants to stem the rising tide of insurrection.

While I am all for law and order, I should like to see a little less intolerance for the causes which are at the bottom of the unrest both in India and Egypt, for I believe that sympathy would do more than force to remove those causes. How can we blame either Indians or Egyptians for wishing to gain the liberty which we have fought and bled to obtain for ourselves? "The aspiration of every true patriot is that of independence—such as England herself enjoys." So wrote Mohamed Bey Wahid, the leader of the Egyptian Liberal Party, a few days ago to the British Chargé d'Affaires in Cairo. Can Lord Cromer put his hand on his heart and say that he ever moved a little finger during his twenty-five years' rule to help the Egyptian people to realise this very legitimate aspiration?

Mr. Hobhouse informed Mr. Sandys last Tuesday that the market value of British securities in the Suez Canal has reached the figure of £35,295,000, the annual return from Lord Beaconsfield's investment being £1,250,000, which is 31¼ per cent. on the original outlay of £4,000,000. In 1883 the Canal Company directors promised shipowners that when the dividends reached 25 per cent. further profits would be applied to the reduction of dues. The company has not kept its promise in spite of the shipowners' protests, only trifling and occasional reductions having been grudgingly made since the canal was opened in 1874. Having no other remedy, British shipowners are asking the Government for a rebate out of the sum which is extorted from them for the benefit of the Exchequer. I think they have a good case.

Little has been heard of late of those grievances of British Indians in the Transvaal which, with consummate hypocrisy, were put forward as a count in the indictment of the Kruger Government. The grievances, however, remain. Neither Lord Milner nor Lord Selborne removed them during the period of Crown Colony administration, nor have they disappeared since self-government was granted. By the immigration and registration laws together the Indians in the Transvaal, irrespective of educational or property qualifications, are treated as undesirables in the same sense as paupers, lepers, criminals, etc. In a letter on the subject the Secretary of the South Africa British Indian Committee, after quoting from an article which appeared in TRUTH in 1908, says:—

> The passive resistance struggle carried on by this small band of self-sacrificing people in order to maintain their communal self-respect and to protest against their being treated as savages and criminals has resulted in between three and four thousand imprisonments with hard labour, financial ruin to scores of merchants and traders, and the forcible deportation of hundreds to India. The treatment the prisoners have received in the gaols in order to terrify them into not returning has been such that men and boys have emerged at the completion of their sentences physical wrecks. At least two deaths can be attributed to the neglect and ill-treatment endured in the gaols. The imprisonments have been supplemented by deportation. The method adopted is ingenious, if somewhat foreign to British principles and traditions. The order for deportation is made administratively, i.e., it is not a judicial order from which an appeal could be made. The deportees are entrained in the Transvaal and travel in custody into the neighbouring territory of Mozambique. They are then ostensibly released, being immediately seized by the Portuguese authorities for being in their territory without permission. They are by them retained in custody, and eventually are put aboard a ship and landed in India. The Transvaal Government pays all expenses. About 120 such deportations have occurred during the last couple of months. The deportees were in every case lawfully domiciled in South Africa. Many of them had lived in the Transvaal twenty, thirty, and forty years. One-third of them are young men actually born in South Africa, some even being Transvaalers by birth. Their wives and families or parents have, of course, been left behind, in many cases destitute and deprived of their natural supporters, compelled to subsist on charity or to become hawkers to avoid starvation.

THE UNHAPPY M.P.

I saw him when the last "long" day was done,
"Remote, unfriended, melancholy, slow,"
In that unhappy frame of mind when one
Feels one's own self de trop.

Said I, "I scent an interesting tale,
And into him I'll casually bump,
And ask of this most miserable male,
Why he has got the hump."

"Come, sir," I said, and tapped him on the breast,
"Some sorrow lurks within your massive brain;
Some secret anguish rends your virile chest,
Or else you have a pain.

"Or what occasions this untoward distress?
Have you forgot at such a time to laugh?"
And with a heavy sigh he answered, "Yes";
Adding the words, "Not half!"

Then, as I still persisted, with a face
Expressive of unutterable woe,
He briefly gave the facts about his case
Which I report below.

"Sir, you may think that hours of slothful ease
Bring to this weighty form a lighter touch.
I'm not" (he pointed to the rest) "like these;
"Not me," he said; "not much!

"I find my fondest pleasures here at hand,
The lounge, the talk, the jests, the lunch cigar;
The House is calmer than the country, and It's drier, too, by far!"

A sagacious journalist has been congratulating Lord Loreburn on his good luck in becoming possessed of the old Great Seal, which is described as a valuable and interesting piece of silver. As a matter of fact, the Great Seal which was manufactured when King Edward came to the throne is made of fine steel. Of course, a steel seal practically lasts for ever, whereas the old silver one wore out after about twenty years. During the reign of Queen Victoria there were three Great Seals of silver, each disused one becoming a perquisite of the Lord Chancellor who was in office at the time.

The Watlington Park Estate, in Oxfordshire, has been sold to Mr. Arthur Renshaw, of Portman Square, by Mr. J. F. Symons-Jeune, who purchased the property in 1876 from the Tilson family. The manor of Watlington was at one time Crown property, and it was granted by Edward II. to Piers Gaveston, and by Charles I. to the Stonors, who held it until 1753, when the estate was sold to the Tilsons. The house, built during the reign of Queen Anne, is very handsome, and it is finely placed near the top of a spur of the Chilterns. The Market House and Free School at Watlington were both built by Thomas Stonor during the reign of Charles II.

The Braemar Gathering has been abandoned this year in consequence of the death of King Edward. This Deeside gathering has lost nearly all its old importance since the death of Queen Victoria, and during the last reign it was always held some time before King Edward's arrival at Balmoral.

It was stated in TRUTH last week that the Stewards of the Jockey Club had been instructed to change the date of Ascot races next year from June 20 to June 13, in order that the meeting might not clash with the Coronation, which is practically fixed for Wednesday, June 21. The King has since requested that the date of the Royal Agricultural Society's Show at Norwich may be changed from the week after Ascot (when it is usually held) until a week later. The show will therefore be held (under the presidency of King George) from Monday, June 26, until Friday, the 30th.

It is curious to note the different views which are held in different quarters as to the best means to prevent the country "going to the dogs." Some very old-fashioned ones found expression at a meeting of game preservers held at York last week with the object of forming a county association for the protection of sporting interests. A Mr. Everitt, of Norwich, the honorary secretary of a kindred society, advocated its formation on the ground that in these days, when a Socialistic cloud overhung the land, all should be united to uphold field sports, because "without sport, as they understood the term, the best tradition of the English nation would fall to the ground." What Mr. Everitt understood by the term was soon made clear. One gentleman complained that people seemed to think that they could wander where they liked over the heather, and it was really difficult to deal with them without unpleasantness. Thereupon Mr. Everitt explained that in Norfolk the best traditions of the English nation were upheld by a gamekeeper taking the trespasser by the scruff of the neck to put him off the heath and if he returned obtaining an injunction against him.

A little later, answering a question as to people on a moorland footpath watching grouse shooting refusing to move on when requested, Mr. Everitt said persons had a right to walk on a footpath but not to loiter on it, and if they did they could be run along by the keeper. Personally I should not think that these high and mighty methods of dealing with the people who do not own grouse-moors constituted the best traditions of the English nation, nor even the best traditions of English sport. They strike me as more likely to bring the lightning out of the Socialist cloud dreaded by Mr. Everitt.

The sale season at Christie and Manson's closed last week, when a panel of Beauvais tapestry, representing children bird-nesting, with a landscape, was sold for 2,800 guineas. This had been picked up a few years ago at a country sale for £30.

Surprise is often expressed at the fondness of English people for spending their holidays in any country but their own. There are many reasons for going abroad, but I suppose the most potent of them is that you get better value for your money. The following figures throw light on this side of the question. They are given to me by a gentleman who has been investigating the cost of twenty-six days' holiday in August for a party of four adults. These are the hotel terms in England, Ireland, and Brittany respectively—in each case the best hotels, and all extras included, down to morning baths and afternoon tea:—

TO A PRETTY PERJURER.

(After Horace. Odes II., viii.)

Could I but see you, perjured Clare,
Once for your falsehoods come to harm,
By faded looks, by grey-streaked hair,
By any other loss of charm,

I might believe your word. But, oh!
When by your broken vows you score,
Tell fib on fib, yet scathless go,
Nay, shine e'en lovelier than before;

When each fresh youth who comes your way
Still swells your charmèd circle's round,
While former swains in vain essay
To break the bands by which they're bound;

When mothers rack despairing heads
To save their hopefuls from your ban,
And every wife instinctive dreads
Lest you should catch and keep her man;

When e'en the gods, whose name in vain
You take, no vengeance on you hurl,
But rather favour you—'tis plain
That lying pays a pretty girl.

The Warden and Fellows of New College, Oxford, have presented the Rev. P. J. Kirby to the Rectory of Saham-Toney, near Thetford. Mr. Kirby is a Fellow of New College and a lecturer at Hertford.

The Chair of Divinity and Biblical Criticism in Glasgow University has fallen to the gift of the Crown by the resignation of Professor Stewart, who has held it for thirty-seven years. He was appointed by Mr. Gladstone in 1873, when he was minister of St. George's in the Fields, Glasgow, and he has filled the chair with conspicuous ability and success, and has also taken an active part in the general administrative work of the University. He held the important office of Clerk to the Senate for several years, and since 1895 he has been Dean of the Faculty of Theology. The chair is worth between £550 and £600 a year. It is understood that a vigorous attempt will be made by a section of Scottish Liberals to procure the appointment of a minister of the Free Church.

The Governors of Winchester College have presented the Rev. Walter Smith, who has been for fourteen years vicar of All Saints, Hull, to the living of Andover, which is of the net value of about £300 a year, with residence. The large and imposing church at Andover was rebuilt about sixty years ago by Dr. Goddart, who was headmaster of Winchester College.

The Bishop of Manchester has presented the Rev. Alfred Redman, vicar of St. James's, Heywood, to the important living of Todmorden, which is vacant by the resignation of Canon Russell, and of the net value of about £400 a year, with house.

Archdeacon Buchanan has announced his intention of resigning the Archdeaconry of Wilts, to which he was appointed by Bishop Moberly in 1874. The Archdeacon, who was for many years rector of Poulshot, near Devizes, was collated to a residentiary stall in Salisbury Cathedral in 1895 by Bishop Wordsworth, and he will retain his canonry. The Archdeaconry of Wilts is worth £200 a year.

The Bishop of Lincoln is to be succeeded in the office of Examining Chaplain to the Bishop of Manchester by the Rev. Peter Green, Rector of Sacred Trinity, Salford, who resembles his predecessor in that he is a scholar, a very popular clergyman, a High Churchman, and a decided Radical. The appointment has given much satisfaction in the diocese.

The Bishop of Lichfield has just consecrated a church which was the late Lord Burton's last gift to the town of Burton-on-Trent. The church has cost about £45,000, and the parishioners have raised an endowment of £300 a year, besides building a vicarage house. It is very satisfactory, but unluckily quite exceptional, to hear of a new parish for which an adequate endowment has been provided. As a rule every penny is squandered in building and ornamenting the church.

The Rev. J. S. Pennington, who died suddenly on Wednesday, was a well-known figure among the parish clergy of London, and he will be greatly missed, especially by his poor neighbours, to whom he was always kind and generous. He was beneficed in Kent for some years, and in 1889 the late Lord Exeter presented him to St. Clement Danes. Mr. Pennington showed a laudable anxiety to preserve the numerous historical and literary associations of St. Clement's, and he caused stained-glass windows to be placed in the church commemorating Dr. Johnson (whose pew is still to be seen) and other worthies. He carried on much valuable social work in the parish, and he was a man of large mind and wide sympathies.

The cripples' homes at Southend which were referred to in last week's TRUTH belong, it seems, to the Ragged School Union. It is no credit to a prominent London charity that its children should be dealt with in this way. From what I have since heard, the unwholesome results of the propinquity of the corporation gasworks were in no degree exaggerated by my original informant. The two premises are so close that the homes might as well be in the yard of the gasworks, and whatever may be the effect of the gas on inmates of the homes, the dust and dirt from the works cannot be healthy, and nurses and attendants suffer from the annoyance equally with the children. I understand that the gasworks were there first, so that the managers selected the site with their eyes open—if not their noses. The natural inference is that cheapness was considered as a set-off to nastiness, which is altogether wrong in such a case. The subscribers to the Ragged School Union should look into this matter.

In answer to Mr. Mitchell-Thomson last week Mr. Haldane let the cat out of the bag about the cost of moving the Duke of York's School to Guston. The £215,000 which has been spent on the new site and school is to be written off as a bad debt against the Military Works loan. This is what I always said would happen, as Londoners never had any intention of allowing the Chelsea site to be sold for building. But what makes matters worse is that Parliament sanctioned the Works loan for specific purposes, of which the move of the Duke of York's School was not one. All I can now say is that if the Auditor-General jumps on the Treasury it is only what the Treasury deserves for gambling with public money with the hope of uncertain gain.

But what about the school? A military friend at Aldershot has shown me a letter from a "Dukie," who describes the Guston site as "awfully wild, the wind nearly blowing you into the sea; but there is a lovely swimming bath, and some day we are to have a beautiful garden." It seems to me that the school need not have been moved to Guston at a cost of £215,000 for the sake of a swimming bath, which could have been made just as "lovely" in the Chelsea site of eleven acres. And as to beautiful gardens—well, they are costly luxuries at all times, and particularly when made at the top of a chalk cliff 400 ft. above the sea.

---

I continue to receive letters from Line officers, who say that in the matter of promotion they are as badly off as their brethren of the Artillery. For reasons which I gave recently, I do not think they are; but nowhere in the Army are promotion prospects promising. During the Boer War many comparatively elderly subalterns—young men of twenty-three to twenty-five years of age—were taken into the service, and are now serving as lieutenants on 7s. 6d. a day, with no chance of promotion for years to come. Raising the age for the compulsory retirement of majors from forty-eight to fifty has not improved the prospects of captains who are down in the Royal Warrant to retire at the age of forty-five unless previously promoted. As time goes on steps must be taken to relieve the growing stagnation, and the first of these steps will probably be to raise the age of compulsory retirement for captains to fifty.

The block in promotion is one of the many legacies which the Boer War left behind. Similar blocks took place after the Napoleonic and Crimean wars, when all kinds of devices were invented to restore promotion to normal conditions. These devices cost money, but they are the price which all nations must pay when they use force, not reason, to settle their differences.

An officer of the P.W.D. in Burma calls attention to the rank absurdity of the system on which men in the public service there are now assessed for the rent of quarters provided by Government. Formerly a rent was fixed by adding together the interest on the capital cost, the sinking fund payment, and an allowance for repairs; and the occupier of the house had to pay this rent up to a maximum limit of 10 per cent. of his salary. Last year, however, the Burma Local Government introduced a new scheme, under which every officer is debited with 8 per cent. of his salary for rent. This plan has the merit of extreme simplicity, but as the charge of 8 per cent. is arbitrarily levied regardless of the extent and quality of the accommodation afforded, it leads to the most glaring anomalies. On the one hand, officers on the best stations often get their houses much below their real value; on the other hand, others less fortunately placed frequently have to pay two or three times the true rent of the wretched dwellings in which they are compelled to live. The all-round 8 per cent. deduction is indeed admirably designed to produce irritation and discontent among a large section of the service.

"An Old Soldier" writes from India:—

> While admitting that the new system of classification for musketry may have its use in raising the standard of marksmanship, I should like to bring to notice a most undesirable effect which it has upon the minds of soldiers. Should a man fail to qualify under this new and difficult course he forfeits his proficiency pay. A large body of ignorant men have naturally come to the conclusion that the Government has invented this new musketry course in order to save expense by cutting their pay.

I see no reason to blame the objectors for their ignorance. They have a perfect right to object. If I were to tell a clerk in my service that he must in future conduct his correspondence in French, and to dock his pay because his French was defective, he could sue me for breach of contract. The Government engages its soldiers for seven years on certain terms, and it has no right to vary the terms adversely to the men by suddenly raising the standard of proficiency and reducing their pay until they can reach this standard. If it wants to make them better marksmen it must find some other means of stimulating their exertions than through their pockets.

Readers of TRUTH know all about the methods adopted by the firm of J. N. Masters, Limited, of Rye, to obtain payment for goods which they have supplied to soldiers on the instalment system, but the following example of polite letter writing is unique. The letter is enclosed with one addressed to the C.O. of the regiment in which the supposed debtor is serving, requesting that it may be handed to him, and it seems extraordinary that any firm should imagine that any officer would undertake the delivery of a document of this character.

Vice-Admiral Sir George Callaghan, second in command of the battleship squadron of the Mediterranean Fleet, will next Tuesday replace Vice-Admiral Sir Archibald Berkeley Milne in the command of the Second Division of the Home Fleet. He will hoist his flag on the Edward VII., with Captain Everett, late of the cadets' training ship Cumberland, as flag captain.

Rear-Admiral Jerram, who replaces Sir George Callaghan in the Mediterranean, will hoist his flag on board the Duncan next Tuesday, with Captain Field as flag captain.

The voluntary retirement of Admiral Angus MacLeod, C.V.O., puts Vice-Admiral C. J. Barlow, D.S.O., at the top of his rank list, Rear-Admiral F. S.

Inglefield at the head of the lower flag list, and Commodore C. G. Craddock, A.D.C., at present in command of the Portsmouth Naval Barracks, at the top of the Captains' list. Owing to this retirement, Captain J. de Courcy Hamilton, who recently left the command of the London Fire Brigade, becomes a Rear-Admiral.

The selection of Rear-Admiral Sackville Hamilton Carden as second in command of the Atlantic Fleet, in succession to Rear-Admiral Sir Colin Keppel, has given general satisfaction throughout the Navy, he being one of the most popular officers in the Service.

A rumour, to which I referred some months since, to the effect that Admiral Sir Arthur Wilson favours a return to three years' commissions, continues to live and to travel. An echo of it reaches me from a naval correspondent at Malta. The report probably originated in the fact that the present First Lord was opposed to the reduction of the term of a commission. Now that the two years system has been in force long enough to prove its merits a reversion to the former principle is most improbable. Shorter commissions mean employment for a larger number of senior officers. They counteract the tendency to "staleness" which is apt to develop when a crew are boxed up too long in one ship. They also simplify the efficient maintenance of ships by furnishing more frequent opportunities for paying-off rights.

Keyham College was closed on Saturday, as it has now ceased to be a place of training for engineer officers of the fleet. An enormous sum of money has been laid out on the place, and only fourteen years ago a new wing was added to the building at a cost of over £30,000. The money might just as well have been shovelled into Plymouth Sound. The Navy is now saddled with another white elephant in the shape of a great pile of buildings for which there is no use. There was already one fine example in the Royal Naval College at Greenwich. The Tory Government which was responsible for the squandering of upwards of £30,000 at Keyham in 1896 ought to have known that the time for using establishments of this description has passed away.

---

We have heard a great deal about the lack of "Dreadnought" docks on the East Coast. Yet when, two years ago, a commercial company had gone almost as far as turning the first sod of a graving dock at Dover big enough to accommodate any ship afloat, the Admiralty prohibited the undertaking. The contention was that this dock would have attracted big merchant ships and caused congestion. Their Lordships do not appear to have considered its value in war time, but they will now have opportunity to reflect upon this. Eminent counsel has advised that the Admiralty veto will not stand in face of the powers conferred by the Act which the promoters obtained, and the work is to go on accordingly.

---

This development has aroused the utmost interest in the naval ports, where the mercantile interests are arbitrarily subordinated to naval needs, real or imaginary. At Portsmouth all the merchant shipping is huddled into a basin at the back of Portsea slightly less commodious than the Round Pond at Kensington, whilst at Plymouth the Admiralty killed the great Cattewater wharf scheme, although warships have never used this waterway.

A Service correspondent writes:—

The Royal Navy viewed with some little resentment the appearance of Mr. Grahame-White in Torbay. The fleet was there to receive the King. Naturally the occasion drew a great concourse of visitors. Amid them, uninvited, but with pæans of local press advertisement, came "the intrepid airman." He buzzed around the Royal yacht, and divided the honours of the occasion with the Royal visitors and the attraction of the imposing pageant in the Bay. Small wonder if the opinion was freely expressed that intrepidity may easily develop into "swank."

There is at present a shortage of engineer officers in the Royal Indian Marine. This is no matter for surprise, for the service is not by any means attractive, and the Government has long remained deaf to the growls and remonstrances of the staff. The present state of things, if not speedily remedied, is likely to go from bad to worse, for it aggravates the grievances of the staff, whose heavy duties are considerably increased by ships being under-officered. One reason for this is that in the R.I.M. the engineers have to do nearly all their repairing work themselves, having no artificers to help them, as in the Royal Navy.

When the R.I.M.S. Dufferin lately came home the engineer officers were busily occupied for a great part of the time that she lay at Southampton in renewing propeller blades that had been broken during the voyage home. This work was agreeably diversified by their being called upon to supervise the unloading of the baggage of the troops she had carried, which had to be done at night, in very cold weather and heavy rain. No shipping company would set its engineers to work of this sort. The Indian Government pays its marine engineers mere mechanics' wages, and apparently argues that the less they are paid the less consideration they are entitled to expect. Naturally, in these days qualified men find that they can do better for themselves elsewhere.

An Inverness correspondent directs my attention to a remarkable fee-grabbing practice of the Post Office in Scotland. To obtain your letters on a Sunday you must call for them at the Post Office and pay what is quaintly styled an express delivery fee of threepence. In reality it is a preliminary inquiry fee, for the threepence is demanded and retained even if it turns out that there are no letters for you. The same thing happens if you ask for correspondence arriving after the first and only delivery on national and local public holidays. Of course, the sight of a postman going his round would be a horrible desecration of the Scottish Sawbath. I have always understood, however, that a Scotchman's attachment to his bawbees is not less strong than his attachment to the Sawbath, and it is surprising that he submits tamely to the downright robbery of this postal fee dodge.

CHARING CROSS HOSPITAL, W.C., CONVALESCENT HOME, Limpsfield, dependent on £15,000 a year from voluntary sources. Contributions urgently solicited.

EXTENDED HOLIDAYS.

(By a filial Schoolboy on reading a recent Extract from the Lancet.)

A happy thought the Lancet's caught,
With manifold advantage fraught.

In its belief and to its grief
Our summer vac.'s unduly brief.

In six weeks' span no parents can
Cheap sojourns by the briny plan.

All trips, you see, are bound to be Arranged contemporaneously.

Which means—'tis clear—apartments dear,
And those perhaps in back-streets queer.

Of course, that's bad. But if each lad
A thirteen weeks' vacation had,

Our trips we'd spread, this crush instead,
And save our paters being bled.

If such should be—though, as for me,
I view the scheme indifferently—

For Pa 'tis best; and so with zest
I'd hail it in his interest.

"Grave disapproval" has been expressed by the Local Government Board in regard to the action, or, rather, inaction, of some of the officials at Newington Workhouse in regard to a young girl admitted while suffering from puerperal septicæmia, and kept there for two days—not only in danger herself, but a danger to every one with whom she came in contact—before being transferred to the infirmary. Mere reproof seems scarcely adequate for such laxity.

Emblazoned on some of the tramcars at Portsmouth is an invitation to the burgesses to apply for loans to the Equitable Advance Co. The Corporation runs the tramcars, and their employment as vehicles for the mischievous advertisements of a common usury shop is distinctly discreditable to the municipal management. A few years ago this was recognised by the removal of similar advertisements after a protest in Truth, and I hope that the same course will be followed on the present occasion.

The Worshipful the Mayor of Wigan has been easing his mind to a local reporter concerning some criticisms passed upon him in his magisterial capacity in Truth last week. He describes me as "evidently one of those who rush madly in where angels fear to tread." I can understand the angels being afraid to approach the Mayor's judgment seat, but I don't know why he should boast publicly about it.

An application was made last week to the Cleethorpes Bench for summonses against the Urban District Council, the Great Central Railway Company, and other parties under the old Lord's Day Observance Act for exercising their ordinary callings on the Sabbath. The applicants were a number of Sunday traders who are regularly fined every week at the instance of the Council. They did not get their summonses, however, and really they might have known that what is sauce for the ratepaying goose is not sauce for the municipal gander.

I am credibly informed that Major Christophers, D.S.O., has been seen in London within the last week or two. It may be remembered that this individual lately brought a libel action against Truth on the strength of certain criticism of a bookmaker's business which he was conducting in London, and particularly his connection with a business of this kind while acting as secretary of Tattersall's Committee. A few weeks ago he booked a passage for New Zealand, and undoubtedly left England, and immediately afterwards an order was obtained dismissing his action against Truth. I am now informed that he did not get further than the Mediterranean.

If this information is correct, his temporary departure would only be in keeping with the rest of Major Christophers' proceedings. Having a small account for costs to settle with him, I should be glad to know his exact whereabouts. So, possibly, would the Secretary of State for War, if, as I trust we may take for granted, the War Office intends to invite the gallant officer to show cause why his name should not be removed from the roll of the Distinguished Service Order.

In an entry in the Truth Cautionary List relating to a rotten concern styled the Imperial Crown Insurance Co., Limited, of John Bright Street, Birmingham, Thomas H. "Glynn" is mentioned as a director. "Glynn" was a misprint for Slynn, an error which it may be useful to correct in view of some proceedings just reported in an insurance journal. At the instance of Mr. John Fox, of the Registry of Friendly Societies, summonses were issued against the British National Friendly Collecting Society, Limited, and the British National Insurance Society, Limited, and also against Thomas H. Slynn, managing director, and Harold T. Dabbs, secretary of the latter concern. Both societies have the same address as the Imperial Crown. The Collecting Society was charged with omitting to exhibit at its office a copy of the last balance-sheet—an omission explained, perhaps, by the fact that the management expenses of £1,777 were actually £200 in excess of the subscription income for benefits. The Insurance Society and its officers were prosecuted for failing to furnish the Registrar with the annual return of receipts and expenditure.

For what were stigmatised by the Birmingham Stipendiary as "very grave irregularities against Acts of Parliament passed as safeguards to the public," penalties and costs to the amount of £88 were imposed. A police officer stated that he had received from Wigan and other places a number of summonses in respect of claims against the societies, and also writs for distress, which latter had been returned marked "No effects." It will be interesting to learn whether people are still being gulled into paying subscriptions to these insolvent societies, and if so whether some more drastic steps cannot be taken to put an end to the scandalous business in which Slynn and others are engaged.

The National Home Employment Association, of Albermarle Works, 10, Staines Road, Hounslow, otherwise J. Theobald and Co. (No. 531 Truth Cautionary List), are very busy just now in advertising their notorious home employment scheme. Perhaps the best commentary on their suggestion that 30s. a week can easily be earned at converting transferable pictures into magic-lantern slides is the simple fact that they are perpetually on the look out for fresh "workers" to pay 5s. for the necessary outfit, and have been so for years past. A work which children of fourteen or fifteen or old people of sixty or seventy can do at home, as stated by the circular, would not need continuous advertisement.

So many advertising tricksters have fallen into the hands of the police during the past few months that I am hoping that the time is not far distant when the Imperial Art Supply Company (No. 525, Truth Cautionary List) will meet with his deserts. The company is a man named Ernest Dudley, and it is years since he first started his swindle of advertising home employment in colouring prints as an excuse for selling to would-be employees an outfit for 7s. 6d. There are one or two ingenious touches in Dudley's scheme, one of them being a stipulation that the money shall be returnable if the print colourer shows no sign of promise. Of course, all the efforts of the purchasers of the outfit show signs of promise, and are thus debarred from getting their money returned. But it is equally certain that with the majority of them their promise never reaches the stage of procuring for them remunerative home employment.

A short time ago Gilbert King, a bookmaker, formerly of Cambridge, announced his removal to 65, Edgware Road, London, "owing to the objectionable attitude the college authorities have taken up." One of King's customers sends me some interesting accounts and correspondence. In the first week the customer won £1 4s. 4d., but King wrote that he was "keeping the first week's balance in hand, as usual." In the second week the customer's net winnings grew to £2 8s. 1d., and King then wrote that he was now "satisfied with deposit," and anything won would be sent week by week. Some further bets increased the amount due to £5 3s. 1d., but it was not paid, and the customer reports that his applications for a settlement have not been answered. It would seem from this that "the objectionable attitude" of the authorities has been neither a loss to Cambridge nor a gain to London.

In a circular dated from 129, Warwick Road, S.W., H. Wiseman proposes to supply racing tips on condition that he is paid the odds to 20s. on each winner, "one point for any previous loser" to be deducted from the amount due. "You will see from this," he says, "that I have nothing to gain unless you make a profit." No, but the greenhorns to whom this sort of thing appeals do not perceive that he has likewise nothing to lose. Of course, the sum and substance of the arrangement is that this wise man gets his fancies backed at the risk of other people, sharing in the winnings, but bearing none of the losses. It is an ingenious method of gambling.

Persons who have the misfortune to figure in records of judgments, bills of sale, etc., are now being favoured with a circular from E. Cogswell, 119, Victoria Street, S.W., who, on the strength of "over forty years' experience as an accountant both in bankruptcy and in effecting arrangements to avoid that extreme resource," kindly proffers his professional advice "how to act," and likewise his assistance in raising a loan. The current edition of Truth Cautionary List contains a reference to "R. Crawford," 119, Victoria Street, an alias registered by Rachel Cogswell Crawford, of Glead Thorpe, Twickenham; but Cogswell himself has not come under my notice for some years past. According to the register of moneylenders at Somerset House his private address is St. Romans, Kingston Road, Teddington. It is a curious circumstance that in the document filed the name originally inserted as the real name of the person applying for registration was "Percy Fitzherbert," but this was altered in the same handwriting to "Edmund Cogswell."

If he chose to do so Cogswell might boast of much more than a mere accountant's experience in regard to judgments, bills of sale, and bankruptcies. He knows what it is to be a debtor and bankrupt himself. I am sorry to say, however, that this venerable tout's own financial troubles have not inspired him with the fellow-feeling that makes one wondrous kind. On the contrary, he is an old harpy who should be shunned by anybody disinclined to jump from the frying pan of temporary embarrassment into the fire of absolute insolvency.

The Henvilles, mother and daughter (Nos. 79 and 80 Truth Cautionary List), have recently removed from Basingstoke to Hughenden Cottage, Abbey Road, Eynsham, Oxfordshire, but they are still carrying on their old game of begging letter writing. A recent letter of Miss E. G. Henville was addressed to a clergyman whose death had shortly before been announced, thanking him for past favours, and asking for assistance "for the last time." The letter was obviously intended to fall into the hands of the deceased's relatives, who had no knowledge of the Henvilles. This is a favourite trick of the professional mendicant.

Another family name which has long appeared in Truth Cautionary List is that of McVeigh. The present bearer of it has Caroline before it, and she dates her begging epistles from Ullesthorpe, near Rugby. Last year she begged so long for funds to enable her to bury her father that I was almost tempted to communicate with the local medical officer of health. Now she tells the usual tale of ill-health and lack of means as a reason for offering for sale books which had been left her by her dear father, in order that she may perform the filial duty of erecting a monument to the memory of the late lamented McVeigh. She certainly shows a filial reverence for her parent's example.

Officers in the Army in all parts of the kingdom have been bombarded recently with circulars enclosing concert tickets for a benefit performance to be held on behalf of a Mrs. Annie Shingleton, described as the widow of a Freemason who held her Majesty's Commission, and who is now in the workhouse. The circular is dated from 26, Waddon Road, Croydon, and bears the names of R. Seamour and A. E. Foster as "Hon. Secs." I do not know who these gentlemen may be, but I do know that 26, Waddon Road is the abode of one R. H. Pattenson Wilson (No. 111, Truth Cautionary List), who has been engaged in swindling the public in one way or another for the past twenty years. Further, Shingleton was the maiden name of Mrs. Wilson, otherwise Evelyn St. Maur, who for many years was the object of her husband's appeals. I presume Wilson has found that his wife has failed to draw, and has been obliged to fall back upon his mother-in-law.

A variant of the Working Boys' Home trick has lately been worked in the neighbourhood of Tunbridge Wells. A circular headed "The Poor Orphans' and Peasantry Girls' Work, agents H. Fielding and Co., 2A, Northampton Park, Canonbury, London, N.," is left at a house with a couple of d'oyleys. These articles are represented to be the work of the girls connected with the institution, and they are offered for sale at 2s. the pair. As a matter of fact they are ordinary manufacturers' goods such as may be obtained at any London shop for about a quarter that price, and there is absolutely no justification for the suggestion made in the circular that the sale will benefit any institution. There are no Poor Orphans nor Industrious Peasant Girls to be found at 2A, Northampton Park, Canonbury, which is the address where a Mr. Max Feldmann lodges. In fact, the whole business is nothing less than a scheme of Feldmann, alias Fielding, for getting rid of goods at exorbitant prices on the pretence that they are sold in the interests of charity.

The reference in Truth on June 29 to the patent expert Crozier was followed by his appearance at Bow Street on July 6 to answer a summons issued at the instance of the Public Prosecutor for obtaining money by false pretences. Meanwhile evidence of the way in which this worthy makes use of his ghostly capitalist in duping clients continues to accumulate, and the latest instance is such a complete example of his methods that I summarise the facts here in case they may prove of use to the Public Prosecutor. This transaction dates from 1907, when a gentleman got into communication with Crozier through an advertisement with a view to disposing of an invention. Crozier thought well of the idea, and recommended that it should be provisionally protected. This was done at a cost of £4 4s. Then the "capitalist" made his appearance in the correspondence. He was willing to consider purchase of the patent, but could not possibly deal until the full patent was allowed, so the inventor paid £10 for taking out the full British patent. Crozier told his dupe that he had asked £500 for the invention, and the capitalist did not think the price too high, but when the fees for the British patent had been paid it appeared that the capitalist wanted also the French and Belgian patents and a further £20 was extracted from the inventor to procure these.

Even this did not satisfy the capitalist. He next expressed through Crozier a desire for proof of universal novelty, and suggested that the German patent should be taken out. Crozier got £10 for this. But objections were raised to the German patent, and the cost of contesting these involved payment of a further £3 15s., and £1 had to be provided for the sealing fee of the British patent. Altogether the inventor provided £48 19s. After the lapse of some months all the patents were granted. But when all the supposed purchaser's requirements had been met Crozier wrote that his capitalist suggested that the British, French, Belgian, and German patents should be assigned to him without any definite royalty or without payment of any sum down in cash. In other words, the capitalist who had not thought £500 too high a price for an unprotected invention wanted the same thing, protected at a cost of nearly £50, given him for nothing.

If the capitalist had any existence at all, such an offer would be quite enough to discredit him in the eyes of an agent who was honestly attempting to find a market for his client's inventions. Yet it is this same "capitalist" who has been dangled before all Crozier's clients as willing to purchase anything, from an ointment to an aeroplane, which has been patented. Crozier will now, I take it, be compelled either to produce his capitalist or suffer the consequences of his failure to do so, and I shall be particularly interested to see whether the nameless individual whom he produced at Truth office goes into the witness-box in his defence.

Only last week I called attention to a fresh batch of begging letters which Todd-Potts, Litt.D., of Gorleston, was issuing with copies of his "Lays of Faith and Love." Meanwhile, those who have already purchased copies of the poems are receiving another of Todd-Potts' circulars inviting subscriptions of 5s. for a new prose work entitled "With the Flag in Spain," now in the printer's hands. This is to be "a Biographical Geographical History of the Conquest of the New Word," designed more particularly for the use of young people. Once again Todd-Potts trots out the mother and three little children dependent upon him as a reason why his books should be purchased. It might be supposed that when this worthy procured from America the dignity of Litt.D. he interpreted it as equivalent to Doctor of Begging Letters.

The London Jewellery Syndicate, of 61, New Oxford Street, is the latest competitor for the patronage of the credulous. It sends out circulars to people in the country announcing that it has £5,000 of high-class jewellery to give away and inviting recipients to call at the office in Oxford Street and receive their presents. Should they be unable to do so and wish their presents forwarded, they may send a postal order for 2s. 7d. for an "extra piece of artistic jewellery," and they will get the present and the purchase together, and then—it may be added—they will realise that the London Jewellery Syndicate will have made a handsome profit on the whole transaction.

I am continually receiving inquiries from sufferers from rupture regarding the widely-advertised cures of various rupture specialists. These are nearly all variants of the same form of treatment. The system adopted is two-fold, first the provision of some form of truss or support for the affected part, and, secondly, a local application of an ointment or embrocation. Divested of technical phraseology, the idea seems to be to give support to the broken abdominal wall, while a local irritant is employed, the effect of which is to close the aperture which forms the rupture with a growth of fibrous tissue. Whether this form of treatment is likely to have any permanent result is a question for the medical rather than the lay press, just as the question whether it is likely to prove beneficial to any individual case is a question for a medical practitioner rather than for an advertising "specialist" to decide.

I note, however, that amongst the literature sent out by one of these rupture-curers—the Stuart Plaster Pad Company, of 66 and 67, Shoe Lane, E.C., where a number of other quack cures are sold—is a certificate from Dr. A. B. Griffiths, of 78, Stockwell Park Road, S.W. (No. 637 TRUTH Cautionary List). Griffiths is a reputed analyst, who sells certificates at a guinea a time to vendors of quack remedies, and in regard to the Stuart Plaster-Pads he testifies that "their therapeutic action proves them to be the very best remedy for hernia, and renders them perfectly safe and reliable." It is no part of an analyst's work to deal with the "therapeutic action" of an article submitted to him for analysis, and no analyst with any respect for his reputation would think of so far trespassing outside his professional sphere. Nor would a firm with a reputation to lose think of circulating an analyst's opinion as to the curative effect of its goods, since they would be aware of the real value to be attached to it. In Griffiths' case the value is precisely one guinea, and the public should be made aware of the fact.

Amongst the many cures for drunkenness now on the market I do not suppose that there is one which receives as much gratuitous advertisement as the Normyl Drink Cure. This is no doubt due to the belief in its efficacy which is shown by a number of eminent persons, including amongst them a London stipendiary magistrate and well-known clergymen and writers, none of whom are pecuniarily interested in its sale. In fact I believe that the only person who makes anything out of it is the original inventor of the cure, to whom a fixed sum is paid by the philanthropic body of gentlemen who handle the cure. This distinguishes the Normyl Cure in some degree from the ordinary secret remedy.

Nevertheless, I am not quite satisfied that this remedy ill do all that its friends claim for it. A week or two ago the Daily Mail devoted a leading article to extolling its virtues, and this was followed by letters from those interested in the cure to the same effect. It was even claimed that 99 per cent. of cures followed its administration. This is a truly marvellous percentage, and if correct cannot be too widely known. But is it correct? I have just been in communication with a medical man who in his desire to benefit his patients had put aside the normal professional distrust of secret remedies. He tried the Normyl Cure on four patients, taking precautions that the directions should be strictly adhered to. Number 1 went through the month's treatment. On the day it ended, when he should have developed an aversion to alcohol in any shape, he got more drunk than he had ever been before in his life. Numbers 2, 3, and 4, after brief periods, the longest of which was less than two months, all relapsed into their old habits. Now, if one medical man gets 100 per cent. of failures, how is it that laymen interested in the remedy can report 99 per cent. of successes?

My medical friend explains it in two ways. He takes the view that people who are interested in a cure usually find what they look for, and that in the ordinary course of events the uncured inebriates would not communicate their failure to combat their craving to those who were striving to assist them. His experience has shown him also that the word of the victim of either the drink or the drug habit is not always to be trusted when he reports himself cured, and that evidence, to be of real value, must be the evidence of those in close touch with cured patients at least twelve months after the cure has been effected. I have not the slightest wish to throw cold water on the efforts of any one to combat inebriety either with Normyl or any other treatment, but both sides of a question should be heard. The medical gentleman in this case embodied his experience in a letter to the Daily Mail, but it was not published. For that reason I have called attention to it.

The prompt repudiation by members of the newly formed Academic Committee of Literature of any desire to transform the newly formed body into anything approaching a British Academy of Literature is reassuring to persons, like myself, who do not believe in academies, and who would find it particularly difficult to swallow an academy which had been conceived in the womb of the Royal Society of Literature. The Royal Society of Literature has long been the laughing stock of everybody who has any acquaintance with literature, its membership consisting chiefly of those undistinguished persons who desire to affix a string of letters to their names, and do not mind paying a guinea or two a year for the privilege. When last I looked at its list of members nearly all professions but that of letters seemed to be represented, from dentists to dog fanciers. One would as soon expect an Academy of Literature to arise from such parentage as a phœnix to hatch out of the egg laid by an ordinary fowl of the barn-door variety.

THE CALL TO THE COAST.

Gentle reader, would you hear a thrilling story of an era
  Dimly vision'd through the ages by a purely classic Bard?
If it be your aspiration, lend me light imagination
  To assist me while I tell you ere my feeble brain retard.

Well, it chanced in days called olden that are reckoned, too, as golden,
  When the princely Imp of Ida was enthroned in heavens high,
That Poseidon, and another, once rebelled against his brother,
  And debated how to kick him helter skelter from the sky.

But the cloud-compelling Father was a clever fellow—rather!
  And he managed just to nip the vile rebellion in the bud;
And Poseidon, sick with flurry, left Olympus in a hurry,
  And I think he came to Hellas with a most alarming thud.

Then the Thunderer commanded that Poseidon when he landed
  Should upraise the towering ramparts of the hapless town of Troy,

"Just to keep him," hinted his chief, "for a little out of mischief,"
Which is latent both in god and man, and woman, beast and boy.

So Poseidon, somewhat nettled, runs the legend, went and settled
Where to build the famous city to appease the angry god;
And he started, but Apollo beat his puny efforts hollow,
For he sang it up in no time; which was not a little odd.

Now, the Trojans had a ruler: none were craftier or cooler,
For he promised compensation to the sea-god on the spot
When the trifling task was ended—more, in fact, than he intended,
For he bade Poseidon get along without it, and he got.

But the town was after fated to be yearly devastated
By a dragon which devoured a lot of dainty Trojan she's,
Till Hesione, a pretty little princess of the city,
Was delivered from the creature, which was slain by Heracles.

When you hear the ocean rumble, and you watch the billows tumble,
And the shoreward foam arising, and the current flowing free,
And the white-flecked sea horse ride on, will you think about Poseidon
And the Myth of Ancient Hellas and the story of the sea?

SCRUTATOR.

THE SERVICE OUTLAW.

THE result of the Archer-Shee case has caused profound satisfaction, not merely among the general public, but still more among Service men and their families. The public naturally sympathise keenly with a boy convicted, while scarcely in his teens, of the most dishonourable conduct upon utterly inconclusive evidence, and kicked out of the public service in a way calculated to mark him and prejudice him for life. But the feeling among Service people, and among all who are familiar with the seamy side of Service life, goes much beyond this. The Archer-Shee case, from beginning to end, is typical of the official method of dealing with members of the military and naval Services when once they have come into conflict with their superiors. All the incidents of the case are familiar—the unfavourable judgment of the superior officer, founded on little more than suspicion; the farcical "official" inquiry which disregards the rules of evidence and the elementary principles of justice; the arbitrary decree ruining the victim's career; the obstinate non possumus opposed to every demand for reconsideration and fuller investigation; the ultimate resort to the abominable doctrine that no servant of the Crown has any legal rights against his employer. The pages of TRUTH for twenty or thirty years past contain the records of dozens of cases such as this. The pages of Hansard tell of not a few more. In most of them the victim has gone under in the end, crushed by the weight of the official hoof, from which neither the Press, nor Parliament, nor any power on earth can deliver him. Now, for once in a way, the tables have been turned. A little child has proved too strong for all the powers of Whitehall. Mr. Archer-Shee may well be congratulated on the victory he has won for himself and his boy.

One would like to see this victory used for the benefit of others. That will only be done if some member of Parliament will bestir himself at once to alter the whole legal status of members of the Services in relation to their employers. An admirable speech was made on this subject last Friday by Mr. T. M. Healy. The case cannot be better summed up than in his words:—

> The Crown was the greatest employer in the three kingdoms, and it was a lamentable and parlous state of things if the law were, as he was afraid it was, that any injustice could be committed, no matter how great, and there was no right of action on the subject. This antiquated system of petition of right should be abolished . . . . . and any person having a grievance should have a right to take process against the Crown, in the same way as against any employer of labour . . . . . The First Lord had said that private rights and interests had to be sacrificed to the public good, but he thought the phrase was not well considered. It was more important that the British and Irish sailor and soldier should have confidence that if wrong was done redress would equally be done than that the majesty of the Admiralty, the grandeur of the Army, or the views of high officials should be vindicated.

Mr. Healy concluded by expressing the hope that the Government would make it impossible for another case of this kind to arise by instituting some method of appeal against official decisions. There is very slender hope of that kind until Parliament forces the subject on the attention of Ministers.

It cannot be too clearly understood by those who are interested in this question that, as regards the law, the Archer-Shee case decides nothing. Mr. Archer-Shee made his claim by way of petition of right—the only procedure open to a subject for preferring a claim against the Crown or its Ministers. In the ordinary course this petition came into the King's Bench Division for trial. The representatives of the Crown met it with a "demurrer"—that is to say, a preliminary legal objection, on the ground that a servant of the Crown had no legal rights whatsoever in respect of his contract of service. It was also objected that Mr. Archer-Shee, as the father of the cadet, had no locus standi in the case. The demurrer was upheld by the learned Judge when the case came on for trial. Against this decision the petitioner appealed. The Court of Appeal found reasons for ruling that the evidence should be taken, but—and this is the important matter—it did not decide the point raised on demurrer. Sir Rufus Isaacs, quite rightly, reminded the House of this when the proceedings were under discussion on Friday last. If, therefore, the trial had gone on to its conclusion, and the jury had given a verdict for the petitioner upon the evidence, there would still have remained the legal question whether upon the facts found by the jury the petitioner could succeed in his claim. Mr. Archer-Shee succeeded, not by right, but by grace, the Admiralty abandoning their resistance after the impossibility of establishing the cadet's guilt had been pretty clearly demonstrated.

So far as my experience of these matters goes, I should think it is practically certain that had the Admiralty stood to its guns the Crown must have succeeded on the point of law. It has been ruled again and again in the Law Courts that an officer has no legal rights against the Crown in respect of his dismissal from the Service, or any other grievance arising out of his employment. The servant of the Crown is, for these purposes, an outlaw. This is the "lamentable and parlous state of things" referred to by Mr. Healy, and this is what requires to be amended. It is a survival from political and legal conditions that have been obsolete for centuries, and its perpetuation in the altered circumstances of the present day has no relation to the maintenance of discipline, the interest of the public, or the well-being of his Majesty's Service. On the contrary, it is the foundation of a system of intolerable oppression, and the fruitful source of incessant abuses and scandals—in the Army perhaps more than in the Navy. Not one of those cases of the "breaking" of officers by confidential reports and other means with which Major Adam recently astonished the House of Commons would ever have occurred but for the fact that the holder of the King's commission has no legal rights against his employers. It is this that inflates "the insolence of office," and makes the efforts of every aggrieved officer to obtain redress against an official edict the mere butting of his head against a stone wall. The evil has become aggravated by the increasing subserviency of Parliament to the Executive, which has impaired the one check that the Constitution provides against abuses of official authority. It follows that reform will only be brought about on the initiative of the Services themselves. But whenever they choose to exert themselves they have an unanswerable case; and, represented as they are in Parliament, they ought to have no difficulty in enforcing attention to it.

THE STATE AND THE CRIMINAL.

As might have been anticipated, the sweeping reforms in methods of dealing with offenders against the laws outlined by the Home Secretary in Parliament have aroused widespread interest. It says much for the sanity of Mr. Churchill's views that his proposals have found very general acceptance, while meeting with almost enthusiastic approval from earnest prison reformers. Those proposals fall naturally into two sections. On the one hand there are a series of suggestions for the prevention of the manufacture of criminals; on the other, a proposed extension of educative methods to those who rightfully find themselves subjected to penal discipline. In regard to the first of these sections, Mr. Churchill admits the justice of criticisms which for years past have been passed upon magisterial benches in these columns. The failure of magistrates to avail themselves of the provisions of the Probation Act; the haste with which they commit offenders of all ages to gaol in default of payment of fines; the imprisonment of youths of the working class for offences which in the sons of other classes entail no such penalty—all these are evils which it is proposed to remedy by legislation. Many of such offenders—probably the majority of them—find their way to gaol for contravention of by-laws and the commission of statutory offences which in no way merit the description of crimes, and it is as unfair as it is irrational to make no distinction between the treatment of the mere by-law breaker and the real criminal. In the promised legislation it is to be hoped that due attention will be paid to this point, and that the fullest opportunity will be provided for the mere statutory offender to pay the statutory penalty before imposing upon him the prison alternative. As regards the imprisonment of youths, a much more difficult problem remains to be solved. Mr. Churchill's suggestion of "defaulter's drill" has in it the germ of an idea, but that is the most which can be said of it. It may be taken for granted that it would be found impossible to treat each offender individually, and the question would at once arise whether the congregation of youthful offenders in a defaulter's regiment for punishment drill would not accentuate the evil it was intended to mitigate. In addition to this there are such questions as interference with work, and the means for enforcement of the penalty which do not seem easy of solution.

As regards the second section of the Home Secretary's proposals, these may roughly be described as a sweeping extension of the Borstal system and an application of the lessons taught by Borstal to other grades of prisoners than young offenders. To thoroughly understand this it is necessary to know exactly what Borstal stands for in penal economics. Most people know vaguely that Borstal is a prison where the occupants are subjected to reformative efforts as distinctive from mere penal discipline, but there their knowledge stops. They do not know what is being done nor how it is being done. Valuable information on these points may be obtained from a pamphlet just issued by the Borstal Association, of 15, Buckingham Street, Strand, entitled "Borstal in 1910."

The Borstal system was designed to catch the young offender and to turn him into a decent member of society; to take him at that critical period between his sixteenth and twenty-first year when he showed evidence of settling down into a criminal career, to develop his latent powers, correct his undisciplined habits, and build him up morally and physically. For this end it employs means which are as unlike the old penal system as it is possible to conceive. For instance, the Borstal prisoner gets physical drill every morning for half-an-hour, and an hour's gymnasium under a fully qualified instructor three times a week. But no slacking is allowed. His dietary is carefully arranged to produce the best physical results. If he has not passed Standard V., he goes to school for five hours a week until he can do so. His tastes are consulted as to the work at which he is put—gardening, farm work, smith's work, building, shoemaking are some of the occupations open to him. But he has to apply himself, the object being to accustom him to a hard day's work when he is released. He is induced to stick to his work by a sensible system of rewards. In five months the lad who does his best to reform himself passes upwards into the special grade. Here he is trusted until he shows that he cannot be trusted. He is permitted to meet the other lads in the same grade on several evenings in the week to play games and read magazines and newspapers, and on Saturdays he is taught to play cricket and football. He is given lectures with or without lantern slides, and is instructed in a variety of subjects with the object of getting him to take an intelligent view of life. The life, in fact, is wholesome, invigorating, and full, and although the majority of lads who are sent to Borstal are below the average in physique and education, yet on their departure many employers have testified to their briskness and workmanlike ways.

But, though a good thing in itself, the Borstal Institution would lose much of its power for good if after their period of training the lads were turned loose to shift for themselves in the world. To this end the Borstal Association was founded. Before a boy is due for release his relations and former employers are visited, and arrangements are made for his future. When he comes out he finds clothes, work, and if necessary a home provided for him. He is visited frequently, and encouraged to keep in close touch with the visitor who has him in charge. The net effect may be gauged best from the published results for the year ending on March 31 last. During that year 236 boys and 5 girls were received by the association on their release from Borstal Institutions. Of these 164 were known to be doing well in May, and 16 were believed to be, but could not be corresponded with at the moment as they were abroad, 7 were lost sight of, 20 were unsatisfactory, 30 had been reconvicted. Such in bare outline is the outcome of a year's effort to combat recidivism. The figures tell their own story—164 lads, who under the old system were marked down for a criminal life, are "doing well." It is this useful training that the Home Secretary proposes, in the last resort, to extend to the young offender who cannot otherwise be controlled. What Mr. Galsworthy calls "that perfect incubator of the criminal germ"—the three-day, six-day, or ten-day germ of imprisonment—is to be abolished. Nothing less than a month's imprisonment is to be imposed on the youth, but that imprisonment is not to be mere aimless occupancy of a cell, but a definite period of hard, useful work devised not as a punishment but as a medicine. In the case of older offenders it is at present but a moderate extension of Borstalism which Mr. Churchill proposes, such as the shortening of the term of solitary confinement, a tentative experiment with concerts and lectures, and, most important of all, the substitution for the ticket-of-leave and its incidental police supervision of an entirely new means of looking after the discharged prisoner by calling in private philanthropy to the assistance of the State. Borstal has shown that this can be done with good effect on a small scale, and there is every justification for a more extensive trial of the experiment.

DELYANNIS ON RUBBER.

Just a month ago I had the pleasure of administering a parting kick to Mr. Demetrius John Delyannis, on the dismissal of a trumpery libel action which he had brought against the proprietor of TRUTH. I did not suppose at that time that I was bidding adieu to Delyannis for ever; gentry of this type, as long as they are at large, rarely desist for long from practices of one kind or another respecting which the public requires to be informed or warned. But I hardly supposed that it would be necessary to devote further attention to this Grecian hero in the course of another month. That, however, is the case.

It seems that for some weeks past there has been published at a small room in Mincing Lane a journal called the Rubber Investor—one of the by-products of the late "rubber boom." It is one of those sheets which are chiefly circulated free of charge, and apparently people whose names are on the registers of rubber companies find themselves favoured with it. One of the objects of producing and distributing the thing is to obtain shilling postal orders from investors in return for "information and expert advice on rubber securities." I first heard of the publication a week or two ago in consequence of sundry uncomplimentary allusions in it to the City Editor of TRUTH. Personalities of this character—at any rate, when they appear in mushroom City papers—invariably emanate from individuals whose sins have been brought to light in this journal, and I naturally became curious to know what particular ornament of the TRUTH Cautionary List was behind the Rubber Investor. Under ordinary circumstances this would not be a matter of any difficulty. For the protection of the public against anonymous libels the law requires that the proprietor of every newspaper, unless it is owned by a company, shall be registered at Somerset House within a certain time after its first appearance. A reference to the Somerset House register, however, showed that the proprietor of the Rubber Investor had not as yet complied with the law in this respect, although it was within a few days of the time allowed to him for doing so, and the publication had then been appearing for fourteen weeks. A further protection is, however, provided for the public by law in these cases. The printer and publisher are required to disclose their name and address in an "imprint" appearing on every publication. The imprint on the Rubber Investor purports to comply with the law by the following statement:—"Published and Printed for the Proprietors by the British and European Press, Mincing Lane House, Mincing Lane, London, E.C." A visit to Mincing Lane in search of the British and European Press revealed that its premises consisted of a small office occupied by a lady typist. Obviously the paper is not and cannot be printed there. The name of the firm does not appear in any directory. There was no occasion, however, to spend time in hunting down the printer. The young lady in charge of the printing and publishing office was obliging enough to refer the inquirer for further information to the editor of the journal, "Mr. Fraser," at the Anglo-Foreign Investment Agency, Limited, 54, New Broad Street. The cat, so carefully concealed, then emerged from the bag—a remarkably fine old Tom in the person of the aforesaid Demetrius John Delyannis. The Anglo-Foreign Investment Agency is a stock-and-share-dealing and company promoting concern, against which readers of TRUTH have already been warned. It advertises in the Rubber Investor that it has on hand "a fair assortment of such shares" (rubber and oil) "in various dividend-paying companies and promising undertakings," and it begs the reader to "communicate with us before investing in shares standing at high premiums." Thus the same shop is offering its own specialties for sale side by side with "information and expert advice on rubber securities" at 1s. a head. The name of Delyannis does not appear in connection with the Anglo-Foreign Investment Agency, any more than in connection with the Rubber Investor. He has good reason for keeping himself in the background. But he is the active spirit in the office. The secretary is the secretary of his previous enterprise, Cosmopolitan Publications, Limited, and the offices are those formerly occupied by that company and its twin sister, the Atlas Banking Corporation, Limited, until in the fulness of time they removed from New Broad Street to the office of the Official Liquidator of public companies.

When we had once got to the Broad Street office there was no difficulty in learning everything else that required to be known about Delyannis's latest venture in financial journalism. It seems that he got the few pounds necessary to start his Rubber Investor from a confiding merchant in the City, apparently a foreigner. Another foreigner, and the principal shareholder in the Anglo-Foreign Investment Agency, appears to be connected with the management of the paper. Although it has not been deemed expedient to register the proprietor's name at Somerset House, the precious copyright was registered at Stationers' Hall on April 21. For this purpose one Peter Gregory Adams, of 24, Burma Road, Stoke Newington, was registered, both as proprietor of the copyright and also as publisher of the paper. Possibly this makes Peter Gregory Adams in the eye of the law the responsible proprietor of the journal. From that point of view it is of interest to know that he is a mere lad who has for some time past been employed in the Delyannis establishment in New Broad Street. So far as I have been able to discover up to the present date, his real name is Adamopoulo. He seems to have been sent from Greece to a school in England within the last two or three years. His father apparently knows Delyannis, who looked after the boy, according to his lights, while he was at school, and subsequently took him into his office. The lad's parents may feel proud to know that, under Delyannis's scientific system of culture, their son has already been forced into bloom as a London newspaper proprietor. They may take for granted that he has been learning a good deal in New Broad Street, though whether it is learning by which he is likely to benefit may be open to doubt.

It would be unreasonable on my part to complain that Delyannis should use his journal—or Master Adamopoulo's, or whosesoever it may be—for the purpose of reviling Truth and all connected with it. His roguery has been persistently exposed in these columns for several years. He has brought an action for libel against Truth, and had to abandon it in order to escape answering interrogatories. He will shortly have to pay up the penalty in the shape of costs. He would be more than human if he did not feel vindictive. Being not only human but Greek, it is but natural that he should seek to revenge himself by stealth, after taking every possible precaution against being detected. I much prefer that he should relieve his feelings by anonymous abuse than that he should use the method more favoured by the southern European nations of lurking behind a corner in the dark and sticking me or one of my staff in the back with a stiletto. I hope, therefore, that he will continue to revile Truth, personally or by deputy, to his heart's content. Everybody in this office will feel easier as long as that safety valve is open.

It concerns me, however, that readers of Truth should take seriously anything that emanates from Delyannis's bucket shop—or, indeed, any other bucket shop—in relation to their investments. For this reason, and this only, I have given them the foregoing information. The character of this Greek adventurer is no longer a matter about which there can be any doubt. The justice of all that has been said in Truth about his Cosmopolitan Financier and his "Atlas Banking Corporation" is sufficiently established by the abandonment of the libel action which he brought—obviously for no other purpose than to silence criticism which impeded his predatory operations. Incidentally, I may remark that when he instructed one of his solicitors to write the other day to Messrs. Lewis and Lewis that he was unable to swear an affidavit in answer to interrogatories owing to his severe illness and his complete lack of funds he was evidently lying, for he has been constantly visible since that date at his office in New Broad Street, and he has no difficulty in obtaining money for the production of his Rubber Investor and the other enterprises with which he is connected. But, apart altogether from his relations with Truth, the man stands revealed in his true colours by the public disclosures during the liquidation of his "bank," and still more by the proceedings in the Central Criminal Court during last June. Those proceedings turned upon a scathing exposure of his whole career in Greece and in England, published by a man who had been in his service. The damaging nature of the allegations is sufficiently shown by the fact that they were made the subject of a criminal prosecution, and that a magistrate sent the writer for trial. The jury found that the libel was justified, and that its publication was for the public interest. In so doing they found by implication that much of the evidence that Delyannis himself gave in his endeavour to convict his former clerk was perjured evidence. There is no more to be said about Delyannis after this. If any one chooses, with knowledge of these facts, to accept such a man's advice and opinions about investments, or about Truth, or about any other matter, he is quite welcome to do so as far as I am concerned.

Before leaving this matter it is desirable to point out that the law with regard to the disclosure of the proprietors and printers of periodical publications is not as effectual as it purports to be. Here is a case in which a man of bad character is producing what purports to be a financial newspaper in the office of an obscure financial and share-dealing company, and also using the paper for the purpose of disseminating very malicious libels. Yet nobody injured by this publication, unless he happened to possess, as I do, special means of information, could discover either the proprietor or the printer of it—or, at any rate, could only do so by a considerable expenditure of time and money. The printer, it is true, has broken the law, but up to the present the proprietor, so far as I can see, has not, whatever may be the case in future. The law in regard to the registration of proprietors of newspapers is extremely loose and clumsy. But whether in regard to the proprietor or the printer, the law, however strict and effectual in theory, can always be disregarded in practice with a fair chance of impunity as long as it is left to private individuals to go to the trouble and expense of enforcing it. Whenever the law requires, for the public protection, that certain information shall be made accessible to the public, whether by registration at a public office or otherwise, it ought to provide for the enforcement of its requirements by official authority whenever complaint is made that these requirements have not been fulfilled.

SHYLOCK IN THE LORDS.

It is now the turn of Shylock to thank God that we still have a House of Lords. In its judicial capacity that House has dexterously rescued him from the exceedingly awkward fix in which he was placed by the decision of the Court of Appeal in Whiteman v. Sadler. My readers may remember the case. Arthur George Whiteman, a member of a notorious family of City bloodsuckers, was doubly registered under the Moneylenders Act—first on his own account as "Cox and Co.," and secondly in partnership with his father as "Cobb and Co." Sadler obtained a loan from "Cobb and Co." on the security of a bill of sale. The Court of Appeal, reversing a judgment of Mr. Justice Bray, found that Whiteman had contravened the Act (1) by carrying on business otherwise than in "his own or usual trade name," and (2) by carrying on business "in more than one name." A moneylending transaction in breach of these provisions of the law being prohibited and made criminal, the Court held that it could form no ground for a civil action, and the bill of sale was set aside.

In regard to the points which I have numbered (1) and (2) the Law Lords are in complete agreement with the Court of Appeal. A name which a moneylender assumes for the first time for the purpose of registration cannot be his "usual trade name" within the meaning of the Act. As Lord Macnaghten put it, "a disguise which a man assumes for the purpose of concealing his identity cannot properly be described as his usual attire at the time, even though he means to wear it in future as long as it serves his purpose." Consequently all the hundreds of registrations of new aliases since the Act came into operation ten years ago have been entirely contrary to its requirements. "Publicity," says Lord Macnaghten, "is the very object of the Act and its chief weapon." It was intended that usurers not already using trade names should be compelled to use their real names, and Lord Macnaghten is of opinion that even in the case of firms the style or title of the firm should indicate the names of the individual partners. "It may be inconvenient if the partners are numerous, but certainly it is not impossible," and after all it cannot be specially inconvenient to moneylenders who "mostly hunt in couples, not in packs." On the other point the Lords' judgment is equally emphatic. If a man under different names carries on one moneylending business as an individual, and another as a member of a partnership firm, he does, contrary to the law, carry on business in more than one name. This may seem a self-evident proposition, but until the question came before the Court of Appeal the opposite view was taken in the administration of the Act.

It will be seen from this that on the two fundamental points involved in Whiteman v. Sadler the House of Lords endorsed the judgment of the Court of Appeal. Their lordships then proceeded, however, to work round to a different result by a process of reasoning too subtle and complicated for detailed examination within my limits of space. Put as briefly as possible, the main argument was that inasmuch as the Act requires the Commissioners of Inland Revenue to make regulations respecting the registration of moneylenders, it imposes upon the Commissioners the duty of seeing that moneylenders do not register themselves wrongly. Here is what Lord Macnaghten said:—

> It would be a strong thing to hold that a person . . . . . becomes liable to fine and imprisonment and the absolute loss of all his contracts, not for trading without registration, but for trading in a registered name—registered, I admit, wrongly, but registered by the authorised exponents of the requirements of the Act and the statutory custodians of the register. . . . If he is registered by the Commissioners, and registered improperly, the fault does not lie with him alone. The Commissioners are at least equally to blame. . . . . Their regulations ought to be clear and explicit, and the forms of application for registration ought not to afford room for evasion.

With all deference to the House of Lords, one cannot but feel that in allowing this appeal ingenuity in the interpretation of the Act was strained in order to avoid a result recognised in the Court of Appeal as "immoral and demoralising"—namely, the possibility, not to say the probability, of a widespread and wholesale repudiation of debts due to moneylenders found to have been wrongly trading in assumed names or in more than one name. There is much to be said for this view of the matter—at any rate, from the standpoint of the usurers who had many hundreds of thousand pounds at stake. But it is certainly difficult for the layman to discover from a perusal of the Act that it places the Commissioners of Inland Revenue under any sort of obligation to explain its requirements and restrictions to persons applying for registration. Some passages in the judgment seem to imply that not only should the Commissioners do this, but that if they allow a moneylender to register himself, and he registers wrongly, the fact that he is actually registered absolves him from the pains and penalties provided by the Act. This would, of course, reduce the law to an absurdity.

While so far satisfactory to the moneylending fraternity, Lord Macnaghten's judgment (which was endorsed by four other eminent judges, Lord James of Hereford alone dissenting) ended with a nasty blow for them. Observing that the Act as administered by the Inland Revenue "loses half its virtue," his lordship said he hoped "they would repair the error they have committed by removing, on proper notice, names wrongly registered, and taking care that in future, so far as in them lies, the requirements of the Act shall be complied with." Remove names wrongly registered! Why, this means that hundreds of usurers will either have to throw off the mask of aliases and come forth in their real names —"A. Brooks" revealing himself as Jacob Szejnberg, "Rosslyn Stuart" as Josiah Abrahams, and so on—or else they must convert themselves into joint stock companies. The latter course has already been adopted by Harris Blumberg, formerly "H. Burton," and now "H. Burton, Limited," and several others; and I expect that their example will be generally followed. It is a simple and not very costly process to form under the Companies Act a private company which may be to all intents and purposes a one-man undertaking; and a company so incorporated can give itself any name or title it pleases and then register it under the Moneylenders Act. After all, therefore, the publicity in regard to the real names of the lenders which Lord Macnaghten described as the chief object of the Act can be quite easily evaded.

TURVEYDROP v. TERPSICHORE.

There is, I suppose, no reasonable doubt that Mr. Turveydrop knows a vast deal more about dancing than did Terpsichore, in whose benighted times, poor thing! America was yet to be invented. Thus, while Mr. Turveydrop can posture and caper and slide in cake-walks, Washingtons, and Bostons, Terpsichore, I am sure, never capered, never postured, did not know her steps, and certainly never danced with a man's arm round her waist. It shows, therefore, all the more gallantry and magnanimity on the part of Mr. Turveydrop that at the height of his triumph—the Congress of the Imperial Society of Dance Teachers—he should elect upon the official programme to represent Terpsichore crowned instead of putting forward—as he was quite entitled to do—his trousered self.

At the same time, there seems to be no doubt that Mr. Turveydrop has his troubles, among which are the unwillingness of schoolmasters to place dancing before football, and the degeneracy of the ballroom generally. For it is, alas! too true that with the recrudescence of public dancing of every kind, from pseudo-Oriental to the Apache, private dancing has reduced itself to something between a "barge" and a slide, in which the man saves himself from the consequences of "barging" by using his partner as a breast-plate. The general taste in dancing, indeed, seems to confine itself between the narrow limits of the bare-leg and the bear-hug. The Boston-Apache waltz leaves positively no room at all for Mr. Turveydrop, consisting merely of two "positions"—one in which you recline upon your partner's shirt front, and tickle his nose with your back-hair; the other in which you both incline your heads forward in opposite directions in order to resemble as far as possible an oil-and-vinegar stand. Your modern young man has never heard of the Lancers—now only danced by kings and kitchen-maids—and I feel confident that if a Bostonian should by chance have heard of "Sir Roger" he would do his best to rid himself of the horrid thought.

The gallantry of Mr. Turveydrop with regard to Terpsichore is the more amazing in that, publicly at least, Terpsichore has recently shown a tendency again to come into her own. But Isadora Duncan never had the instantaneous and sustained success in this country as has been accorded to Anna Pavlova, who is the apotheosis of the Turveydrop school, and Mr. Turveydrop has been able, with a quiet mind, to hatch new dances at the Hotel Cecil, in the gallant hope that one of them at least may catch on next season.

On the whole I am inclined to agree with Mr. Turveydrop that the male dancer is responsible for the reductio ad absurdum of the ballroom, but for other reasons than his. For while dancing may improve a male circulation, while it may teach him not to tumble over drawing-room chairs or upset his teacup, the trousered toe has about it still just a suggestion of the ridiculous. It is this sense of the ridiculous which causes a boy to "pick up" dancing from his sister, or at least to take lessons without mentioning the fact. Also the best dancers, as dancing is misunderstood to-day, are the young men with powdered noses and a monosyllabic wit, upon whom a virile spirit is practically bound to look down.

The essence of "mixed" dancing is that the man shall have a different step from the woman's, and that while she flits and glides, he shall in some way suggest his manly strength and dignity. I do not think that Terpsichore could ever have danced with Mr. Turveydrop, but, then, Mr. Turveydop in a pas seul would certainly have excited remarks from Terpsichore. At the same time, not all the new dances invented by the Imperial Society of Dance Teachers will serve to relieve the monotony of an English ball programme as long as ballroom dancing stands for a legitimate method of making love to your neighbour's wife. Terpsichore was a success in her time, because she represented a more or less natural vent to the feelings; Mr. Turveydrop, with the best intentions in the world, is, strictly speaking, a failure, because he is an artificial vent for feelings which for the most part are unfelt.

ART AND THE ADVERTISER.

To the student of the evolution of advertisement the International Exposition now making Brussels a centre of universal interest is a happy hunting ground. With profound apologies to those from whom have emanated the striking examples there displayed, I, as a mere layman, find that the majority, while apparently aiming at the original, the startling, the arresting, succeed in arriving at a perfectly sublime hideousness. In fact, the art of advertisement as hitherto employed is very doubtful art altogether.

In the Citadel at Namur, covering the ancient walls of the castle of the once-puissant Comtes de Namur, there is a really wonderful collection of mural posters of the past half-century. Among the signatures may be noted many belonging to the first rank of Continental artists. Yet I cannot recall one of which the homely exclamation, "How pretty!" would be excited. I assume beauty to be quite the last consideration that moves the designer of this form of illustration. And the second last must surely be to illuminate the spectator as to his purpose. From a noted French artist I recently received photographs of his designs for the Reims aviation week in 1909. They are applied to a book-cover, and display an immense amount of imagination. But what it all means, or even which way up to hold the thing, I have not yet mastered. This is not all stupidity on my part, for I have not met any one else who could enlighten me, and the matter is too delicate to refer to my friend the artist, the one person able to explain the mystery. Advertisement proper is a method of drawing public attention to the advertiser's wares, trade, or performances. It is obvious that if it does not accomplish this end it ceases to have a raison d'être. The argument might be made that if it does accomplish this end the means are immaterial. But, from the point of view of an æsthetic sufferer, I ask is there no other means save through the medium of pictures and designs which are an offence to good taste and intelligence?

Of course there is, and they have been discovered, and most cunningly employed by a very prince in the real art of advertising. His name is Edouard Taymans, his trade a coal merchant. So very much a coal merchant is he that he has earned for himself the proud title of "Le Charbonnier" of his country—Belgium. Now, nowhere in all Belgium do you find one single poster eulogising Taymans' coals, or drawing attention to Taymans' prices. But in uncountable thousands of homes, of every degree, you can see beautiful bas-reliefs, replicas of the works of some of the foremost sculptors in France, Holland, and Belgium. The original marbles were bought and reproduced, first in copper moulds, and finally in delicate white plaster, at great cost by "Le Charbonnier," and to every customer he sends them, with the simple legend on the artistic box that encloses them, "Avec les hommages d'Edouard Taymans." On the dainty plaques themselves is no defacement suggestive of coals, the sculptors' signatures being the sole lettering thereon. It is true that other aims besides those of advertisement are in M. Taymans' scheme. He is an idealist as well as a self-made, self-cultured man. His love of the beautiful amounts to a passion, and, remembering the days when he began the struggle for life, a penniless peasant lad, he would give to all out of his riches some of the good things he longed for in his own poverty. By sending his choice gifts to his customers, merely as a graceful token of gratitude, he now disseminates broadcast to all who will receive these beautiful examples of contemporary art. His idea is that if the poor man has something beautiful to look at he will like to look at it, and in time he will learn to appreciate and understand it. A Utopian idea, but one strongly to be encouraged amongst advertisers. To each of 5,000 miners, who were brought to the Exposition the other day for a pleasure excursion, Taymans presented a replica of Constantin Meunier's fine bas-relief "Le Mineur," a subject whose rugged simplicity must reach the hearts of these rough men, of whom it depicts so well a type.

I possess five of these evidences of M. Taymans' generosity: — Meunier's "Mineur;" "L'Aube Radieux" of the French sculptor, Derré; the fine portrait of Leopold II. by Devreese; "L'Aïeule," also by the latter, a delicate conception of an old peasant grandmother; and de Rudder's relief commemorative of the entente between Belgium and Holland.

I see in the initiative of "Le Charbonnier" something worthy the consideration of all advertisers. He sends his clients something so intrinsically worth possessing that not only does it run no risk of being thrown away (the fate of the calendars and other abominations dumped on a helpless public!), but its certain exposure in a prominent place ensures it being noticed—admired—remarked upon. And herein lies the cunningness thereof. For what more natural than for the owner, in extolling the generosity of the sender, to imply that such a tradesman is equally admirable in his commerce!

I was told some years ago that a certain well-known firm of meat-extract makers spent ten thousand pounds a year on advertising. Think what riches in Art could be launched upon us with ten thousand pounds! I even nourish dreams of the plates of Old Masters being purchased, and an original engraving, handsomely framed, becoming mine by the simple process of acquiring a box of pills, or a bottle of hair restorer. I am not sure that I would not take the one and use the other to attain so desirable an end.

UNDER-SECRETARIES AT WESTMINSTER.

EVER since I entered the House last February I have studied the habits and ways of Under-Secretaries, because perhaps I may become one myself some day. If I am good and love my Whips, that is. I have made a point of finding out how one gets to be an Under-Secretary. The best way is to persuade some big Cabinet Minister, like Mr. Asquith or Mr. Lloyd George, to appoint you his private secretary (unpaid). That "unpaid" is very important. It means that you are a real sort of virtuous apprentice who, by scorning delights and living laborious days, may presently woo and win Fortune and a seat on the Treasury Bench. It also means that you are conscious of a virtuous superiority over Ministers who, unlike yourself, get paid for their work, though in that feeling there may possibly be a tinge of envy. During the private secretary stage you are privileged to sit immediately behind your master, to the exclusion of much older and more esteemed members of the House, to dance attendance on him in all his moods, to fetch and carry for him, and to act as the medium between him and his official advisers who are congregated behind the Chair when he is replying for his Department in debate. The unpaid secretary is neither official nor private. He must engage in none of the irresponsible escapades of the rank and file, but his speeches carry no special weight apart from any qualities with which he may be able to invest them. The bulk of the House look on him with some suspicion and jealousy as one marked out for special favour, and wonder what he has done to deserve it. But he cares not, knowing that presently his drudgery will meet with its reward, and that he will be promoted somewhere. One morning he blossoms out as an Under-Secretary, and promptly suffers a sea-change. His walk alters. The average member is glad enough to hurry to his seat unobserved, and without treading on anybody's toes or passing between the man who is speaking and the Chair. Unless, that is, he happens to be Mr. Gibson Bowles or the Chairman of a Select Committee, in which case a little consequential swagger is expected of him. But the Under-Secretary has his own style of entering and leaving the House. He takes long, deliberate, thoughtful strides, his shoulders bowed with the burden of responsibility, his brow seared with anxious care. He looks neither to the right nor to the left, and barely recognises old acquaintances. He sinks on to the Treasury Bench with the air of a weary Titan, and stretches his legs confidently in close juxtaposition to a pukka Cabinet Minister. It is a beautiful studied effect, which is acquired with surpassing rapidity. The models are, of course, the Secretaries of State themselves.

> There goes the parson; O illustrious spark!
> And there, scarce less illustrious, goes the clerk.

Secretaries of State are a law unto themselves. They are seen to best advantage after a big division. On an ordinary night most of them have been invisible—immured, according to popular belief, in their apartments with piles of official documents to deal with. That so many of them elect to put on evening dress to perform their work looks suspicious at first glance. Towards eleven o'clock they begin to come out into the light, and when the division is called mingle loftily with the common herd. On leaving the lobby they move up the floor so slowly, so majestically, with such Olympian grandeur that it is good to watch them. The Under-Secretaries do watch and try hard to imitate the great ones. The only Ministerial people who find it becoming to move quickly are the Whips. They have to hustle and to skip about nippily "like troutlets in a pool."

There are Under-Secretaries and Under-Secretaries. Some wear a long time; others are used up very quickly. Sir Edward Strachey belongs to the first kind. He has represented the Board of Agriculture and Fisheries in the Commons ever since 1906, and the Old Hand says that it is because he makes such an impressive display of "the Department and my noble friend." It isn't every Under-Secretary who has a noble friend as a chief. Most of them are plain misters and right honourables. But Lord Carrington, most lovable and unconventional of Peers, sits in the Other Place speeding the plough and looking after the small fishes, and Sir Edward is his shadow upon earth in the Commons, with this difference: that the shadow has not a particle of humour, whereas the substance is bubbling over with it. Sir Edward is a model Under-Secretary. He never says an original thing nor undertakes an independent act. He leaves everything to "the Department and my noble friend," and, if the storms gather, shelters himself securely behind the formula. Therefore he has endured. Other Under-Secretaries have led more eventful lives. Some of them have known the joys of office for a period all too brief, and are back again in the private ranks, and these are apt to prove not the least candid critics of their whilom colleagues. Others, more fortunate, have been moved upwards to other Departments. Mr. Burns has known four since he first went to the Local Government Board. Viscount Morley is even more extravagant, and has sampled five at the India Office. His first lieutenant, the Old Hand reminds me, was Mr. John Ellis, a long-established member, whose appointment was no small surprise. Mr. Ellis is a Quaker, and, like John Bright, finds a difficulty in mating his family tenets to an eager, impulsive temperament. To such a mind the methods of the India Office, with its underlying principle that, in the end, the rule is by the sword, can hardly have been congenial. At any rate, Mr. Ellis tendered an early, abrupt, and unexplained resignation of his post, and retired to the back benches.

He was succeeded by Mr. Hobhouse, who was remarkable for the fact that he had actually visted India. As a consequence he was quite Anglo-Indian: well-informed, curt, and stand-offish. His qualities soon suggested a wider sphere of action, and they shipped him off to the Secretaryship to the Treasury, which is the Department of the Parliamentary Maid-of-All-Work, and he still sits at the corner of the Treasury Bench, primed at all points on public accounts, and wrestling with the Nationalists over Irish old-age pensions. Then came Mr. Buchanan, an amiable and painstaking worker, who, on Mr. Morley's translation to the Lords, was left single-handed to bear the repeated onslaughts of Sir Henry Cotton, Dr. Rutherford, and the other "members for India" in the last Parliament. The ordeal was too severe for a frame far from robust, and Mr. Buchanan has, to general regret, been obliged to abandon public life. The fourth Under-Secretary was the Master of Elibank, whose placidity was not to be disturbed by any number of irritants, and he would probably be at the post to-day had not Mr. Pease unexpectedly fallen in the fray of the General Election, and it became necessary to appoint a new Chief Ministerial Whip in a hurry. The Master is now a rotund and comfortable Patronage Secretary, and gets on capitally with "Alec." At the same time, it was incumbent to find Under-Secretary Number 5, and Mr. Asquith scanned his ranks. His eye did not have to travel far. Immediately behind him sat Mr. Montagu, the Prime Minister's private secretary (unpaid). The transition was obvious and ordained. Mr. Montagu, son of Lord Swaythling and member of an opulent Jewish banking firm, stepped to the Treasury Bench with all India in his fee. On Tuesday he made his trial flight in introducing the Indian Budget, and acquitted himself well. A tall, vigorous man, with a powerful voice, he gripped his subject with both hands, and could hardly have sounded more dogmatic and authoritative had he been an actual Secretary of State. The Indian Budget is usually the signal for an empty House. The Old Hand confesses to sneaking away to the smoking-room when it comes on. But on this occasion many of us remained to watch Mr. Asquith's latest selection, and were well pleased with the newest of Under-Secretaries.

THE NEW MEMBER.

NOTES FROM PARIS.

ECHOES OF 1870.

M. PICHON officially announces that we are to have ten volumes of State papers, with copious notes and editorial addenda, about the war of 1870. The editors see "fatalities" which contributed to this event as far back as the marriage of Marie of Burgundy, and even of the early successors of the Carlovingian Empire. But for convenience the compilers, who bring the papers culled from Foreign Office archives into one panoramic view, will not go farther back than the second war of the Danish Duchies. Ten volumes from Foreign Office archives will not, I fear, be lively reading. But we may expect them to provoke any amount of hot controversy. What does not plainly appear in the few forewords of M. Pichon is that the ten heavy volumes are to be in answer to the ten lighter ones of M. Emile Ollivier on the origin of the war in question. He brought out this work to justify himself. M. Pichon, in the half-veiled terms that I suppose become his situation, gravity, and it may be future membership of the Academy, more than alludes to the incentive furnished by M. Ollivier. "Certain of the personages," he says, "who had charge of the State in those days of mourning (the days of 1870) have published fragmentary accounts of that war, and had in editing them no lack of art or incapacity to interest. Their recitals generally are in many respects valuable, but incomplete, and in most cases with a drift." I should have italicised the last two sentences as showing they are meant for M. Ollivier.

When any one is asked in French company what such or such a young lady engaged to be married looks like, a bland and quite non-descriptive answer is given if she is plain. For instance, it might be: "Beauty is in the eye of the observer. What I should think a most agreeable face would not, perhaps, seem so to many others. But one thing is certain. It is that Mlle. Unetelle is amiable and accomplished." If she had not amiability or accomplishments one might be told that she was "devoted to her mother and likely to create a happy home." The nicely embroidered cap that M. Pichon means chiefly for M. Emile Ollivier will not be accepted by that irrepressible octogenarian. When a Frenchman who may shortly be brought into the Academy praises a historical work for the art and interest that recommend it he means that it wants one thing needful: a religious respect for truth.

Another paragraph in the forewords should prepare us for those dry-as-dust papers which are better for Blue or Yellow Books than for private reading. Most of the interesting diplomatic letters are those meant only for the persons to whom they are written, and are not a bit stilted. The formal despatches are generally wordy and as non-committal—that is to say, vague—and dull as the writer can make them. Lord Palmerston, in writing privately to his brother and Sir Henry Bulwer, was not the same person as when he sent indited despatches for Blue Books. At a time when there were no Yellow Books in France and no Parliamentary Committees for Foreign Affairs, French Ministers and diplomatic agents abroad (ambassadors were for special missions) each kept up a highly entertaining correspondence with his chief, or with the King himself. He wrote with the utmost freedom to be really informing. His pen often led him on. After the Yellow Book came to stay Foreign Ministers, on leaving office, often treated such correspondence as private property. M. Rouher, as non-official Vice-Emperor, skimmed the cream or what remained of it of these archives, taking them to his country house and storing them up there. He made a great haul of confidential letters and other papers coming from London by Berlin, Rome, Brussels, Madrid, and St. Petersburg in the closing weeks of the Empire. The Duc de Grammont had taken off a good deal that he did not want any successor to see. A squad of Uhlans who entered M. Rouher's château at Brunoy under a smart lieutenant came upon a room filled, as it seemed, with sacks of straw. The Uhlans on emptying them were going to bed their horses with the papers the sacks had contained, when the lieutenant in command thought of looking over some bundles of them, which he took at random out of the piles. He at once saw their importance, sent them on to Versailles with other papers found buried in zinc cases in the cellars. Finally, they were forwarded on to Berlin, and are now in the pigeon holes of the "very secret documenta" of the German Chancellerie.

Likewise, M. Emile Ollivier is credited with ingenuity and address in getting up his case. While this meed of praise is given, he is almost charged with neglecting nearly every document that could go against him. I dare-say this is true. It is the way of most of us when we are at once judge and party. We must not expect that he will cry peccavi in answer to the impeachment. On the contrary, we ought to look out for the flying of feathers, as when one combative bird meets another in hostility in a cockpit. If Ollivier is eighty he has still a hard beak and talons, with a fighting spirit stronger than when fifty years ago he was one of the "Five"—a forlorn hope corps in the Corps Legislatif.

Queen Victoria was an industrious writer, but by no means an artistic one. Her "Correspondence," translated by M. Jacques Bardoux, has been greatly advertised but little read in France, save the few nuts gathered from her letters to her uncle, and given in the journals. I know not where the editors of the forthcoming ten volumes have found data for their judgment on her determination to dominate in foreign affairs. Her steadfast will in this matter is touched on in the forewords already mentioned. What is more, the present state of Europe and the naval expenses under which Great Britain staggers suggest to them the idea of a long-delayed retribution. For what? For the conduct of that Power in the Duchies crisis in 1863-4. If Great Britain decided not to go to war, she ought not to have put pressure on Denmark to withdraw from a strong position on the Schlei, and this done, from the yet stronger one of Duppel. Why the author of the preface should have coupled Lord Palmerston with the late Queen as at one with her at this great turning point I am at a loss to think. I was acquainted then with various near relatives of Lady Palmerston, one of whom had been his official secretary. They said the contrary. His hands were tied by the unreliability of the French Emperor, the disunion among the Scandinavian States, the weak will of Alexander II.—who besides had been brought round to the Prussian side, though its union with Austria in some degree disaffected him—and the strong volition of the Queen. Did she not write to her uncle in reference to that crisis, as I gather, "No power on earth can ever make me deviate from whatever he (the Prince Consort) wished or desired?"

The conduct of the Augustenburg family is touched upon in first selling their eventual rights to the Duchies for a very big sum ("une très grosse somme"), and then turning round, bankrupt to their covenant with full pockets, to coalesce with Prussia and Austria. That family had a warm advocate at Windsor in the Princess Louis of Hesse. She was tooth and nail for "Freddy." His father had abdicated after the sale of his reversion in this Augustenburg's favour.

The Prince of Wales, who became the idol of France ten years ago as King Edward, was strongly anti-Bismarckian. His pressing advice to act against Bismarck brought on him rebuffs, and he gained no compensating advantage. On the occasion of his eldest son's christening he met with a rebuff from his great uncle Leopold for going over to the French Ambassador and entering with him into friendly talk.

King Edward, to use a French neologism, is to be "statufied;" Paris and the State are to unite in paying this tribute to his friendship. The site will be a private square where the cab company has its stables and coachhouses. It lies between the Rue Basse du coachhouses. It lies between the Rues Basse du Remand Caumartin. The King, on the horse that figured at his funeral, is to be placed in the central garden turned towards the Boulevard de la Madeleine, with which the Rue Basse will be fused. His good humour, affability, and utter freedom from vanity gave Parisians at the Hôtel de Ville a new idea of good regal manners. Nobody who conversed with him there thought him a phœnix, to use a Parisian colloquialism. But all saw that he had good sense, and that his knowledge of the world had in no wise quenched his natural kindliness. I am afraid that an equestrian statue will not render what struck one most at first sight, or when one saw him after a long absence. While there was nothing in his appearance or air to encourage familiarity, there was so much of common humanity that French Republicans saw in him a representative of that "Fraternity" which comes into their sacred trilogy. He produced the effect of a fine day without seeking to do so.

Sculptors move according to tradition, and have to do so. A painter would be more qualified to give us a memorial image of the friendly King and Emperor, who found one of his greatest pleasures in seeing thousands of happy faces. A sculptural horse, with King Edward as the rider, must be a stumbling-block to the artist. To seat him in bronze or marble on a prancing horse would never do. A slow-going or a standing war-horse takes from the interest of the personage in the saddle. We see this very clearly in the equestrian statue of the Duc d'Aumale at Chantilly.

King Edward liked Rodin, and did his best to feel his virtue as a sculptor. I should be sorry to see his statufication confided to that artist. Rodin must faire grand, be emphatic, take away the breath of those who gaze at his work for the first time. To my thinking it might well be a medallion in, say, a small marble temple, circular and elegantly unpretentious, and yet not meagre; a drinking fountain—for he had a utilitarian bent—might stand in the centre. There would be no objection to the fox terrier being brought into the composition. The initial point of the late King's popularity with the French democracy was the generous course he took at the Universal Exhibition of 1878. Why not inscribe under the medallion on a black tablet the words: "Confiding in the good feeling of the people of Paris, I shall send my Indian collection uninsured to their Universal Exhibition." The feeling this fine confidence called forth drew him from Imperial to Republican France.

King Edward used to bear when coming here the incog. title of Duke of Lancaster. It was, during one of his visits, pointed out in these Notes that a Duke of Lancaster, eldest son of John of Gaunt, when an exile in Paris, worked hard underhand, and with some success, to form a party willing to make him king in return for parliamentary control over the finances. This party, which comprised most of the burgesses, the whole of the Sorbonne, the Duke of Brittany, and some other illustrious personages, worked some years later for Henry V. They would have seen in him what the seventeenth century Whigs saw in William of Orange. After this appeared in TRUTH King Edward never again gave prominence to his Lancastrian title.

The rumour that has come from London of a project for setting up there an Academy of Forty Immortals excites some interest here. Is there the wherewithal? The whole atmosphere of London is so different from that of Paris as to make one fear the copy will be a poor one. To have forty authors, were they all illustrious, is not the one thing needful. A good copy might have sprung out of Wills' Coffee House had there been a dominant social element elsewhere in which the influence of amiable, accomplished, and capable ladies predominated. But compare the beauties who surrounded the Merry Monarch, the Mashams and the Jennings who climbed to the first places in the Court of Queen Anne, with the French women of rank who were the nurses of the French Academy. Mary Montagu had a brilliant mind, and was next second to none as a light and lively writer. But her unamiability can no more be called in question than that of the Duchess of Marlborough. Apart from her smart pen, she was a person rather to be shunned than courted.

The French Academy was no copy, but grew up spontaneously. It was originally a junction of the drawing-rooms of the Marquise de Rambouillet and her daughter, Julie d'Angennes, Duchesse de Montausier. The salon as a meeting-place for conversation and the production of beaux esprits and writers hardly existed before these ladies opened that of the Hôtel de Rambouillet. Prior to this social event women of tiptop quality and rich bourgeoises received their company in their bedrooms. There was nothing answering to the English parlour or the Italian hall of conversation. The bed, as in the sleeping-room of Louis XIV., was surrounded by a balustrade, outside of which gentlemen who had dropped in to visit remained standing. It would have been shockingly unmannerly of them to step over the barrier. The lady of the house, dressed in her best déshabille, sat on the edge of the bed. Ladies calling went within the balustrade and sat on folding stools, or hassocks, according to rank and age. Mme. de Lafayette painted from life in describing in "La Princesse de Clèves" a conversation on love, in which the Dauphiness took the lead, reclining on her bed.

At the new Hôtel de Rambouillet the bedrooms were specialised for sleeping and quite informal receptions, and the salons en enfilade in the Roman style. Lustres almost for the first time hung from the ceiling and girandoles were attached to the piers between high-pitched windows. Wax candles, another novelty, gave out smokeless light. Venetian mirrors dated from the opening of the Hôtel de Rambouillet to the literati of France, and revealed the Frenchwoman to herself. The aim of the Marquise was to purify language from barbarous latinity, Rabelaisinism, and the rank grossness due to a long period of civil wars. She showed the door to the indecent Thalia, whom Scarron and Molière too well liked. By the time the latter had his skit on les Précieuses Ridicules, the work of the Hôtel de Rambouillet was nearly done. Conrart in his little flat followed closely on the Marquise and her daughter. In purifying and cultivating the art of delicate shading they both really helped to create one of the greatest instruments for free thought that modern times have known—the French language. The Gallic genius needs a free tongue for its free mind. The Anglo-Saxon requires free elbows, hands, and free business action. For want of the social freedom, or freedom of the tongue, French visitors to London find that conversation at dinner parties there is distressingly tame and formal. I have heard it said by one of them that West London has a vocabulary of about 150 words, and that "nice," "awful," "awfully," and "clever" are as hard worked as a maid of all work in a small middle-class Parisian home.

An Academy in London might well have grown out of Wills' Coffee House, under the auspices of Addison and Bolingbroke, had not the Countess of Warwick been such a dreadful person, and Bolingbroke and his accomplished, witty, and amiable French wife forced to live in France. She was a cousin, need I say, of Mme. de Maintenon. But we must not too much emphasise the "might have been."

I hear from the Palais de Justice: President Dreyfus sweated his brains awfully through a whole week in writing out his judgment against Rochette. It covers in the very smallest type a whole page of the morning papers. His object was to leave no loophole for appeal. Bardou cannot help promoting him after this. He is one of those jurists who can drive a coach-and-four through statutes and precedents without affording any case for appeal, is ambitious, and keeps the nether half of his face masked with his beard and moustache, so that nobody can see the sardonic smile that must often play round his mouth. It is impossible for him to trim them before a glass without seeing in it the image of the Captain whom Jaurès helped to release from l'Ile du Diable. His judgment is a triumph for Berr and Lépine and a rap on the knuckles of Jaurès. What business had he meddling with the affairs of the Prefecture de Police and Berr? Non bis in idem. We cannot have another Steinheil affair to cover this phase of the Rochette one. But expect some thundering scandal on the eve of the next meeting of the Jaurès Committee at the Chamber. Government by derivatives is the fashion.

THE NEW PEPYS.

July 25: Come home this day my new suit of cloathes, which I am to wear at Goodwood. And it is a sweet, chaste piece of workmanship in neutral grey, mighty well cut, especially the trowsers; so that I cannot but discover some pardonable pleasure in thrusting out my leg to survey the hang of them.

Also took occasion, while I am in my dressing room, to try on the Balbriggan hose which I have bought to wear with my Harris tweed breeches, for the shooting. Which did please me mightily, and the shape of mine own calves no less, and stood upon a chair before the pier-glass to get a better sight of them.

Talkt again with my wife of our holiday plans. But of Margate in August—which was my proposal for her—she will not hear. Whereupon I agree with a good grace that it shall be Folkestone, which, albeit something expensive at this season, is a bright pleasant healthy place, and I can divert myself there well enough for a few days until the telegram come calling me away to Ostend on an urgent business concern. But of this I still said nothing; since I would not lay upon her the burden of distress anticipated; but it will be time to break it when the telegram do arrive.

Come in my uncle, the Canon, who l ve been at the christening of the Westminster baby. And he fall to telling stories of christenings in general; one mighty facetious, which was this:—The Canon officiating at the christening of the child of a navvy at his church in the country. The navvy a rough, illiterate fellow, after the manner of his kind, but have got himself coached in the responses by the parish clerk, so that he shall know what to say when he is questioned. Anon he is asked, according to the rite, whether he do believe the Articles of the Christian Faith as recited to him. To which he bellow his response, mighty proud of his proficiency, "I renounce them hall."

July 26: To Goodwood with Bet by motor, and a pleasant run till we come to Horsham; where was trouble by reason of our chauffeur fouling a school-urchin. Up a constable and took our names and addresses. I in a fine tosse; since if the lad should succumb to his injuries, we must needs be called to bear testimony at the crowner's quest, and my name coupled with Bet's in all the papers. The which did make me hot and cold to think of it. But after a little we do find the child is more frightened than hurt. So I was safely out of it with a solatium to his mother, and cheap at 10s.

Reached Goodwood hard upon one of the clock. Luncht in the car on abundant choice fare from Fortnum and Mason, and the champagne right good. Bet merry, and what must she do but drop a lump of Neapolitan ice inside my collar at the back; which, thawing with the warmth of me, did start a-trickling down my spine, and so continued, curst discomfortable, till all was melted. Yet I did soon cry quits by sifting powdered sugar into her back hair, whence nothing will dislodge it.

Anon strolling on the lawn, where I saw his Grace of Richmond, my Lord and Lady March, my Lady Helen Gordon-Lennox, my Lord Leconfield with a party from Petworth, and many others. Bet in luck this day, she laying £5 to £100 on Golden Rod for the Stewards' Cup; and against all expectations the colt get home. So more champagne and we home in high feather.

July 27: Luncht at the club with Squillinger, who have been over this Japanese cruiser, the "Ikoma," lying off Tilbury; he speaking in high terms alike of the ship and of the crew.

Home and catcht my wife at her davenport writing in a manuscript book, which she did thrust hastily under the lid of the davenport and lockt it, upon hearing my step; which vext me, for I abhor deceitfulness, especially betwixt man and wife, where all should be affectionate candour. Moreover, this manuscript book lookt to me very much as it might be a diary. And I am resolved that I will get hold of it by hook or by crook, and scrutinise it, and if my suspicions are verified I shall put my foot firmly down; since here is a pretty thing indeed for a wife to be keeping a diary privately from her husband, and would not make this secret of it unless she were guiltily conscious of its being stuffed with all manner of ill contents and malicious reflections.

July 28: To Holy Trinity Church in Sloane Street for the marriage of Herbert Asquith with Mistress Cynthia Charteris. A mighty fine ceremony, and fourteen bridesmaids, which is, methinks, so large a number as I have never before witnessed. My Lord Archbishop of York performed the nuptial office, and he is assisted by the Rev. Mr. Gamble. But, Lord! How crowded the church, and such a gathering of choice company as made my heart swell with pride to be of their number. Anon to my Lady Elcho's reception in Cadogan Square, where I was introduced to Mistress Winston Churchill; she looking vastly well in white, with a spacious white hat, "turned up" (as the milliners do say) with black velvet.

Returning home, my wife must needs hasten to Selfridge's in search of holiday raiment and a new hat-box, she having procured two hats for the seaside, the which no trunk in all our store will hold. And in a scoffing mood I bid her ask Mr. Selfridge if he cannot lend a furniture van to transport her wardrobe to Folkestone. She gone, I find this a convenient occasion for satisfying my mind respecting her diary, and do set myself to unearth her bunch of keys. But for all my ferreting in her private repositories I cannot find them. Which do but serve to confirm my suspicions. For what were her object in thus hiding them away, unless she have something discreditable to conceal?

July 29: My wife complayned this morning that some one have been rummaging in her chest of drawers; and is sure it must be our maid, Sarah, whom she discover to be a sly minx. I replying that I do fear the baggage is something sly (which is the fact).

I spent most of this day making ready for our journey to Folkestone to-morrow, where I have bespoke rooms for a week at the Pavilion Hotel, until I can chuse suitable apartments for my wife, wherein I can safely instal her upon my departure for Ostend. Lord! what a labour and vexation is this packing, and at the last I must to Piccadilly for a new suit case for the better stowing of my dress shirts, all my valises and my kit-bag being full to overflowing.

July 30: I shall lock up my diary in my desk this morning, before we do take our departure. For 'tis scarce safe, methinks, to have it with me on my holiday, and no means of keeping it secure from prying eyes. Moreover, the details of my trip to Belgium are like to be something too dry to be worth recording. So I shall write down nothing more till I do return.

LETTER FROM THE LINKMAN.

THE Tweedledums and Tweedledees of politics, dear Lady Betty—the Tories and Liberals—have been terrified alike by the crisis connected with the House of Lords. The circumstances of the nursery rhyme have been reproduced in every particular:—

"Tweedledum and Tweedledee
Agreed to have a battle.
. . . . .
Just then flew down a monstrous crow
As black as a tar-barrel;
Which frightened both the heroes so
They quite forgot their quarrel."

* * * * * *

The following letter has the advantage of being candid: "Sir,—I do not care for politics, but I wish to be a peer. The House of Commons is but the stepping-stone to the House of Lords; abolish the latter and none but lawyers and labourers will wish to enter the former."

* * * * * *

"A Canadian" writes:—

"Sir,—The Dominion of Canada and the Commonwealth of Australia are not colonies; they are Auxiliary Englands. There is a rapidly increasing objection in both to their being described as 'colonies.'

"It is not surprising. An ingenious peer recently said: 'America we understand—it is a nation; the emancipated East End forms the colonies, and a wide social gulf separates us from that.' The 'lower class' in England is in the closest touch with Canada and Australia; there is scarcely an obscure household in the Mother Country which is not in communication with connections or friends in both. Now that the self-governing 'colonies' no longer provide well-paid sinecure appointments for impecunious or outcast members of the 'upper class,' Canada and Australia are even less known to the West End than they were."

The phrase attributed to a peer by "A Canadian" has a companion. Another peer once said: "I have shot grouse in Scotland, and fished in Ireland all my life, but I know little of the people of either country—I had, of course, no opportunity of coming across them"!

Crippen has two claims to distinction. As he paced the deck of the Montrose the air-waves laden with messages affecting his safety must have passed through him. His situation, too, was peculiar. The whole civilised world knew the hour at which trouble would overtake him, whilst he had no warning even of its approach. How he ate, how he slept, how he looked, what he read, were common property in every capital in Europe, Crippen imagining all the while that he was unobserved.

Evidence has incidentally received a severe blow. All the accounts of the arrest differ materially. If so public and simple an incident is capable of being so greatly changed in the reporting, what reliance can be placed in the recording of more complicated circumstances? Inspector Dew seized Crippen; Inspector Dew did not touch him. The Inspector said, "Crippen, I want you;" the Inspector said, "I want to see you below." Miss Le Neve was on deck walking with Crippen; she was below in her cabin. Miss Le Neve had just reached the deck, and screamed; Miss Le Neve was on the bed in the cabin and screamed when Inspector Dew entered!

* * * * * *

"A helpless woman" is a phrase which must be abandoned. The ordinary woman of to-day is well able to take care of herself. "Only a Woman" writes a letter which deserves attention:—

"Sir,—If I step out of a carriage the polite man will touch my arm lightly, pretending to help me down. Without this assistance I can step to the ground easily; with it I am often greatly inconvenienced. The hard work of the house, however, he leaves to woman. If I am ill the men of the family are always disposed to think it is a trifling indisposition. The least illness of their own is to be regarded as serious. 'It is only nerves,' is said to me; the slightest sign of their nerves being affected causes them the gravest anxiety. Woman is supposed to wait at home the arrival of man at any time; if woman keeps man waiting an instant he is indignant, and says 'Why can women never be punctual?' All the superior qualities of the soul and heart woman is expected to possess; yet man is to be regarded as 'the superior creation'! Dependence is at the root of this inconsistency; man retains hold of the purse, and so long as he represents capital and woman labour she must continue to be considered his inferior."—Believe me to be, very truly yours,

MARMADUKE.

CORRESPONDENCE.

SEATS FOR WOMEN.

Sir,—Your correspondent, "Senex," is apparently ambitious to figure as a harbinger of the Silly Season. My personal objections to being legislated for by women would be in no degree mitigated by the fact that the women legislators were returned to Parliament by the votes of men. Why should they be? These objections rest on the fundamental distinction between the characteristics of the two sexes, which are very clearly stated by "Scrutator" in an article in the same issue of Truth. If they have any validity against women voting for men, they are equally valid against women legislating for men. I object to a male legislator elected by the votes of women. Why should I object any less to a female legislator elected by the votes of men?

The attempt of "Senex" to distinguish between the two things is all moonshine. He puzzles his head, and seeks to puzzle the heads of others, with a sophistical appeal to the principles of democracy. As a democrat, he claims the right to a free choice of his Parliamentary representative, irrespective of sex. Just before this he has incidentally admitted that he and his fellow-democrats are not free to choose as their representative a lunatic or a convicted felon. Apparently he acquiesces in this limitation of his democratic freedom. He must equally acquiesce in any other restriction which his fellow-democrats put upon him. What he fails to see is that any community has a right to decide who shall or shall not be qualified to make its laws. That the majority should decide this is no violation of the principles of democracy. The individual constituency is a minority which must conform to the wishes of a majority. Suppose that a constituency of practical jokers chose to make fun of the British Constitution by returning a jackass—with four legs, bien entendu—to Parliament, as the Roman Emperor, in a sportive mood, nominated his horse to the Senate. Would "Senex" argue that the principles of democracy forbid the rest of the community to exclude the jackass from the House? I apologise to the ladies at large for using this particular illustration; it is "Senex" himself who prompts the reductio ad absurdum. Whether it is a question of electing a particular kind of biped or a particular kind of quadruped, the rest of us—so long as we happen to be the majority—have a right to say that we will not have this particular kind in the Legislature, even though one, or twenty, constituencies contain a majority of fools with a fancy to be represented in that particular way.—Yours faithfully,

Pi.

Dear Sir,—There is much force in the argument of your correspondent "Senex." It appears to me that if a woman can convince a constituency of men that she is a fit and proper person to represent them in Parliament, her sex can no longer be reasonably regarded as a bar to admission. If, as is pretty sure to have happened, she has defeated a male candidate at the poll, she has, as it were, passed the test which shows her to be, in the judgment of men, the equal of men for this particular purpose.

I hold as strongly as anybody that women, taken collectively, are not the equals of men at what has come to be considered men's work—obviously because it is the work that men do best. But no reasonable man can deny that many women are exceptions to this general rule. It is to the interest of both sexes that we should avail ourselves of the services of those exceptional women, but it must be for men to decide when this shall be done. This is the case at present in those professions which are open to women. For example, a woman may become a doctor of medicine, but she is examined and passed into the profession by men. It is the same in France, where women have been admitted to the Bar. As your correspondent "Senex" points out, we employ women in various positions under Government, but men appoint them.

On the same principle we should be quite ready to welcome women to Parliament if men are ready to send them there. It may be taken for granted that only the exceptional and specially qualified women would ever come through the ordeal of a parliamentary election. But to give women the right to elect members to Parliament, whether of their own sex or ours, is a different matter altogether. The great mass of women, unlike the great mass of men, take no interest whatever in political affairs. They are ignorant of them, and evince no desire for knowledge of them. The business of government is one of the branches of "men's work," like commerce, industry, and everything that is called "business" par excellence. For a great part of the public service—the military and naval services and the police—women are physically disqualified. For the rest, they are only of use in humbler and subordinate positions such as they occupy in commerce and industry. For the higher grades only the rare and exceptional women show any aptitude. Under these circumstances, to suddenly confer upon women a potent, perhaps a paramount, voice in the business of government seems as absurd as to confer upon them a similar voice in the management of our banks, our railways, our shipping companies, or any or all of the business at present conducted exclusively by men.—I am, dear Sir, yours obediently,

J. W. D.

THE ARMY COUNCIL AND THE REGIMENTAL OFFICER.

Sir,—"E. C.'s" soldierlike defence of his friend, General Ewart, in last week's Truth is pleasant reading. I, too, can speak with first-hand knowledge of General

Ewart's personal attributes, which are as much in his favour as his official qualifications are against him. What does his record show? More than seventeen years of unbroken staff service spent chiefly among papers, not men, the last eight of these years having been passed continuously at the War Office! General Ewart's re-appointment to another headquarter post of four years' duration is contrary to the letter and spirit both of the Esher Committee Report and of the King's Regulations. But apart from this I repeat, Sir, what I said in my former letter to you, that an officer who has not commanded his battalion has an imperfect knowledge of regimental sentiment and usage. Because General Ewart was a good adjutant it by no means follows that he would have been a good commanding officer when "on his own." The Duke of Cambridge had an unwritten rule that no officer should be appointed to a higher staff billet unless he had commanded his battalion. It is a pity this rule is now in abeyance, for the present lamentable unrest in the Army is largely due to its armchair government by men who have lost touch of regimental life.

ROUND THE MARKETS.

A WELCOME RALLY—BUYING FOLLOWS LIQUIDATION—AMERICANS REBOUND—THE STRUGGLE FOR THE ROCK ISLAND CONTROL.

AFTER further severe depression the Stock Markets in the latter part of last week experienced a welcome recovery, so that members of the House were able to depart for their holidays without those fears of impending disaster, which at one time appeared likely to haunt them. Undoubtedly there was some severe trouble both at home and abroad, and the heavy liquidation was a matter of necessity; but so far as the London market was concerned the principal losses fell in quarters able to bear the strain, and to the relief of everyone the settlement passed off without any important failures. Once again the American market demonstrated its volatile character, and prices rebounded dollars at a time as soon as it was discovered that the big interests were coming to the rescue of the market, and that the embarrassed accounts were being attended to. The difficulties of the syndicate which was formed to obtain control of the Rock Island and other lines to inaugurate an Inter-Continental system, and was headed by Dr. F. S. Pearson, the controlling spirit of the Mexico Tramways and Mexican Light and Power Co., proved to have been the chief reason for the slump. Messrs. Kuhn Loeb, Sir Ernest Cassel, and their associates certainly scored a great victory, but the struggle was severe and had a widespread effect. With the necessity of further liquidation removed by the arrangement under which the Pearson Syndicate's holdings were taken over, confidence returned to the market, but such firework displays do not tend to attract the public here, and demonstrate the danger to the operator who dabbles in Americans but is not prepared to pay for and take up the stock when occasion requires.

Home Rails shared in the recovery, and were at last able to derive some benefit from the dividends. Some more very satisfactory announcements were made, and these coupled with better news regarding the attitude of the Great Eastern men, brought in buyers who while the depression reigned all round the House had not the courage of their convictions. The Gilt-edged section was quiet and without interest, while foreign stocks, which were only slightly affected by the depression, hardened up in the latter part of the week. Colombians rallied on the understanding that the cheque to pay the coupons had been received. There appears to be some mystery about this cheque, however, and it is stated that it has been sent to the Continent for an endorsement, so that in the meanwhile no notification for the bondholders to deposit their coupons has been made. Better crop reports helped Canadian Pacifics and Grand Trunks to recover, while Mexican Rails rose on the publication of the net statement for June, which shows an increase of $329,900 in net receipts for the half-year. Argentine Rails escaped in the general depression, and were a firm market throughout the week owing to improved weather reports.

RAILWAYS.

GOOD MIDLAND RESULTS—THE POSITION OF GREAT NORTHERN DEFERRED—THE NORTH-EASTERN'S DISAPPOINTING REPORT.

Of the list of Home Railway dividends announced last week, the Midland and the Great Northern were the most satisfactory. In the case of the Midland the results are really remarkable and exceed all expectations. The company's published increase in gross receipts was £152,000, but nearly a quarter of a million additional net revenue is accounted for. The dividend is at the rate of 5 per cent. on the old ordinary stock, as against 4¼ per cent., which gives the deferred stock 2½ per cent., as compared with 1¾ per cent., while £36,100, or nearly £12,000 more than a year ago, is carried forward. In addition, however, £90,000 is placed to a special reserve, whereas no such allocation was made last year. The extra dividend requires £147,800 apart from the special appropriation. Interest in the Great Northern announcement centres in the carry-forward, as no interim distribution on the deferred was anticipated. The rate on the ordinary of 3 per cent., giving the full rate of 4 per cent. on the preferred, is the same as last year, but the carry-forward of about £80,000 compares with £24,000, while £20,000 is allocated for special renewals for which no provision was made a year ago. A surplus of about £76,000 is therefore shown as compared with last year's figures, and this represents nearly 1 per cent. on the deferred. The deferred stock is thus practically upon a 2¾ per cent. basis, and at about 46 gives a yield of nearly 6 per cent.

Another good result was that of the South-Western, 4 per cent. being paid, as against 3½ per cent., while £10,000 against nothing is placed to reserve, and £32,000, or £3,000 more than a year ago, is carried forward. The report shows that gross receipts increased by £81,000, and working expenses advanced by £30,600, net receipts being £50,400 up. This showing is the more satisfactory taking into consideration that the working agreement with the Great Western was not in full operation during the half-year. For the first time the District Railway first preference stock is to receive a dividend, the rate now announced being 3 per cent., but this would, of course, not have been possible had not the arrears of interest on the guaranteed stock been funded. As it is, £8,500, as against £300, is carried forward after allowing for the preference distribution and placing £10,000, or the same as last year, to renewals. The Hull and Barnsley dividend at the rate of 3 per cent., with £24,200 forward, as against 1½ per cent., with £23,200 forward, was quite up to expectations, and a justification for the steady appreciation in the price of the stock. The North-Eastern report was as disappointing as the dividend, for it did not bear out the conjecture that the absence of an increase in the dividend was due to provisions for strike contingencies. Gross receipts advanced by £143,000, but working expenses rose by £116,400, so that the improvement in net was only £26,600. The advance in expenses occurred mainly in repairs and renewals of rolling stock and in fuel, the former requiring an additional £80,300, and the latter an extra £23,500.

POSITION OF ARGENTINE RAILS—A REVIVING TENDENCY.

Argentine Rails, after a period of neglect and dulness, have recently shown a reviving tendency. Traffic returns still leave something to be desired, though in the past week or two results have been more reassuring. The Buenos Ayres Great Southern and the Buenos Ayres Western are suffering from the fact that practically all the wheat crop has been carried this year, whereas in 1909 (when the crop was a much larger one) the carriage of that cereal went on for some months longer. The Central Argentine has a good maize crop to set against the smaller wheat crop, but maize on the two southern lines is not turning out well. There is every reason to expect that the "Bags," as well as the B.A. Western and the Central Argentine, will maintain its dividend for the financial year now ending, but the first-named company will be set a task in 1910-11, seeing that £6,000,000 4 per cent. extension shares become convertible into ordinary stock, involving an additional requirement from net revenue (if 7 per cent. dividends are to be maintained) of £180,000. Fortunately, the general outlook in the River Plate has lately undergone a distinct improvement. Private cables received from a reliable source lately state that abundant rains have fallen and that crop prospects are good.

Buenos Ayres and Pacific traffics are showing up better, for which the state of the wine trade in the Argentine Great Western's district is, I believe, largely responsible. I cannot recommend Pacifics just now; for it is hard to see how the company (after making allowance for the fact that gross traffics are much better than they look owing to the fact that they are not swollen this time by the carriage of the company's own material) can pay even 3 per cent. for the year just ending, though apparently the dividend is not to be less than 3 per cent., in view of the interim payment at this rate already made. For fifty-two weeks of the current year the company has a published increase in gross traffic of £151,000. It had carried (during the first forty-nine weeks) £240,000 less of its own materials for construction purposes (which are put in at bare cost), so that the advance in receipts upon which a profit is made has apparently been £391,000. This is a large addition, but on the other hand it must be remembered that a year ago, in order to pay a dividend of 5 per cent. upon Buenos Ayres and Pacific Ordinary, the board took £89,000 from reserve and charged a sum of £115,000 against reserve for permanent way and rolling stock renewals, or together £204,000. Moreover, in the year now ending capital charges rank for, in round figures, an extra £250,000, so that altogether £454,000 additional net revenue is required if the company is to pay 5 per cent., as it did last year, without trenching upon reserves. With a gross increase of, say, £391,000 that is obviously impossible. There has been talk of the dividend being brought up to 4 per cent. for the year, but to do that (after allowing for the saving of £70,000 incurred by a 1 per cent. reduction) the company would have to retain the whole of its gross increase as net increase, a thing it could scarcely accomplish without rigorously curtailing necessary outlays upon the property. It seems to me that it will be possible to pay 3 per cent. only at the expense of straining the company's resources. I should prefer the ordinary stock of the Argentine Great Western at 105½ to Pacific ordinary at 95. This stock cannot get less than 5 per cent. unless B.A. and Pacific 5 per cent. second preference goes short (a very unlikely contingency), and when dividends on Pacific ordinary rise above 5 per cent. those on Great Western ordinary will automatically rise as well. When the Pacific Company pays 5½ per cent. on its ordinary capital the ordinary capital of the Western Company will receive a similar rate; when the Pacific Company pays 6 per cent. on its ordinary capital the ordinary capital of the Western Company will receive a similar rate; when the Pacific Company pays over 7 per cent. the Western Company will receive 6½ per cent.; and when the Pacific Company pays 10 per cent. or upwards Western ordinary will receive 7 per cent. In view of the fact that Great Western ordinary is equally as well protected as Pacific second preference for 5 per cent., and possesses conditional rights (which Pacific seconds do not) to more than 5 per cent., the stock, one would have thought, would have been valued at least several points above Pacific seconds. Yet whereas the latter command a price of 103, Argentine Great Western ordinary is quoted at only 105½. This is obviously an anomaly, and the only explanation I can offer is that there are many investors who will buy a preference stock, but will not touch a stock with the label "Ordinary" upon it.

RUBBER.

The Brazilian Output—Plantation Prospects—Trust Companies and Autumn Developments.

Especially welcome at a time when prices, both for the raw article and for the shares of plantation companies, have been somewhat easier is the note of confidence which has been struck so unanimously at the recent meetings of the various rubber trust companies; and it was a matter of some satisfaction to me to find Mr. Maclaren in his clever speech at the Eastern International Trust meeting dealing in so masterly and enthusiastic a manner with some of those points as to the future of the industry with which I have recently endeavoured to familiarise my readers. When the "synthetic" gentlemen are silent over-production is usually the bogey which is trotted out to frighten quiet investors out of their valuable holdings; and I am afraid that even some of my readers have not yet recognised that the vast majority of the companies which have been floated within the last six months cannot add a single pound of rubber to the world's supply for at least four or five years to come. Some of these recently floated companies, of course, purchased already existing estates which would have become producers whether they had been sold to a company or not, but many have in front of them several years' development work, during which they are likely to give more trouble to their shareholders than to the raw rubber market. For Nature works slowly, and her processes cannot be hurried even by the most energetic board of directors. And who is to say what the demand for rubber will be when these new estates come into bearing?

The enormous expansion which has taken place in the demand during the last twenty-five years is well illustrated by Mr. Lampard's figures, dealing only with the Brazilian output, which I give below:—

Brazilian Output.

| Five Years ended | Total Output. Tons. | Average Annual Output. Tons. | Average Price obtained per lb. s. | d. |
|---|---|---|---|---|
| June, 1890..... | 73,060 | 14,612 | 3 | 1¼ |
| June, 1895..... | 93,510 | 18,702 | 3 | 0 |
| June, 1900..... | 117,620 | 23,524 | 3 | 10½ |
| June, 1905..... | 151,175 | 30,235 | 4 | 2¾ |
| June, 1910..... | 186,305 | 37,261 | 5 | 7 |

So persistently has the demand for rubber increased that since the year 1895 an increase of 100 per cent. in the Brazilian production has been accompanied by an increase in price almost as great; and if any of my readers can tell me of any other article of commerce which has for fifteen years steadily risen in price in the face of so heavy an increase in production we might arrange, I think, for Truth readers to have a boom of their own. Meanwhile, it may suit us to consider how long it will be before production is likely to overtake demand; and the following figures will show how relatively small a proportion plantation rubber has hitherto borne to the world's supply.

| Year. | World's Total Output in Tons. | Plantation Output in Tons. |
|---|---|---|
| 1906 ..... | 65,000 ..... | 531 |
| 1907 ..... | 69,000 ..... | 1,133 |
| 1908 ..... | 65,000 ..... | 2,000 |
| 1909 ..... | 69,000 ..... | 4,000 |

For the current year the world's output is expected to reach 75,000 tons of which the plantation product will, it is estimated, account for about 8,000 tons; and it will therefore be seen that, notwithstanding all the bumper dividends and the large increase in share values, the Eastern plantations contribute at present little more than one-tenth of the world's demand.

Of the present annual consumption of 75,000 tons, about one-half, say 37,000 tons, consist of rubbers of inferior grades which sell for 30 and 40 per cent. less than fine hard Para. Now this 37,000 tons of low-grade wild rubber will be the first to feel the effect of competition with the product of the Middle East, and must indeed be driven out of the market years before plantation rubber has to fight fine hard Para. But the best authorities estimate that the Middle East, even at its present substantial rate of progress, will not be able to increase its output to 37,000 tons before 1914, and were the output in that year to be 50,000 tons investors might still view the position without alarm. By 1914, which is so often spoken of as the critical year, how far will the consumption of rubber have risen? This year it is estimated that the consumption in the motor trade alone amounts to 35,000 tons, and I think that my readers will agree that this trade above all others is not likely to stand still. The gradual spread of motor traction is not limited to England or America—the increase is world wide, and we may safely venture to predict that with the steady displacement of horse-drawn traffic throughout the world the motor demand for rubber will in four years' time be double what it is to-day.

In the boot and shoe trade the present annual consumption reaches 15,000 tons, and pessimistic scribes who write about rubber as if the trade were confined to the supply of such miscellaneous articles as hot-water bottles and garden hose will find a rude awakening in the years to come when a world's output of perhaps 200,000 tons will be readily absorbed by manufacturers at prices which will handsomely compensate those who are now taking a part in the development of as promising an industry as the commercial world has ever known.

If investors would but realise it they have now a splendid opportunity of picking up shares at quotations which are likely to show magnificent profits within a year or two, possibly within a few months. In the heavy brigade Linggis, Selangors, Batu Caves, and Malaccas may be mentioned as specially attractive. Malaccas, after having suffered from early labour troubles, which are now being rapidly overcome, are now quoted at a figure which upon a price-per-acre basis stands out as being one of the cheapest shares in the market, and I expect to see a substantial improvement in price. Holders of Glen Bervie, Johore Rubber Lands, Kinta Kellas, and Merlimau are likely to see their shares touch much higher figures in the coming autumn. The tea-cum-rubber group have been well supported during the week on the improved prospects for tea, Beverley and P.P.K. both attracting buyers, while investment purchases of Northumberland Tea and Rubber indicate that investors appreciate the advantages of securing cheap shares in a company which distributes its risks by engaging in the cultivation of both products.

As I anticipated, the Prye dividend recently announced amounts to 10 per cent. in place of the prospectus promise of 5 per cent., and as this was earned from sugar alone holders may expect increasing dividends as the company's rubber comes into bearing.

The additional information given at the meeting of the Eastern International Trust meeting enables me to furnish my readers with the following comparison between the position of this company and that of the Rubber Plantations Investment Trust.

The MOST COMPLETE List of Rubber and Oil Share Quotations will be found in every Saturday's issue of "The Financial Times," 1d. daily. On sale everywhere.

The high rates of dividend which were earned by these two companies as the result of their first year's working are sufficient testimony to the skill with which their affairs have been managed. In both cases the directors are, of course, rubber experts of unquestioned standing, who possess exceptional opportunities of making large profits when markets are active, and although the difference between the companies' surplus assets and the premiums at which the shares are quoted is somewhat large, the return on the shares may be regarded as sufficiently high to tempt those investors who prefer an investment trust share to a direct holding in one or more rubber companies of which perhaps they have little or no real knowledge. There appears to be no valid reason why Easterns should be quoted lower than Rubber Trusts.

The Madagascar announces another shipment of over five tons of rubber, and at this rate of production the preference shareholders should receive their 100 per cent. bonus before Christmas from rubber sales alone, although it is well known that two subsidiaries are in preparation for flotation in the early autumn. Before the end of August the Crude Rubber Washing Co. expects to make an interesting announcement about its continental subsidiary, to be followed by another to acquire its North American rights. A very interesting and profitable phase of the rubber market is now coming on, and the present is emphatically not the time to make sales.

MINES.

A Better Feeling—Central Mining Meeting—Rietfontein's Troubles — A Couple of Rhodesian Dividends.

Not before it was due, but a little earlier than some people had expected, a fairly general recovery was experienced in the Mining Markets last week. Mining descriptions were among the first in the Stock Exchange to show signs of rallying, and it did not take very much fresh buying to advance quotations as soon as the liquidation appeared to be at an end. Although there was a fair amount of bear repurchasing before the holiday, the probability is that there are still not a few professionals committed on the bear tack. At the time of writing conditions are more satisfactory than for some time previously, but the immediate outlook is uncertain. It remains to be seen whether the forced liquidation is really at an end, and whether there will be sufficient fresh demand to enable the stock temporarily taken over from weak accounts to be resold without depressing prices.

While Sir Julius Wernher's views on Rand affairs are always noted with interest, it is probable that special attention was paid to this year's meeting of the Central Mining and Investment Corporation in the hope that this well-known authority would have something to offer in the way of consolation for the depressing conditions holders of Kaffirs have been experiencing the last month or so. Although there was nothing very striking about his speech last week, Sir Julius Wernher's remarks certainly helped to revive the market. He was able to point out that the Central Mining had increased by nearly half a million sterling its interest in South African and other companies, "which is an indication of our faith in values and prospects," and he went on to observe that "the great South African gold industry, in which we are principally interested, is in a flourishing condition"—

> The best companies (with the exception of a few companies with short lives) are still far, very far, from their ultimate attainments. Their progress may appear slow, but time is required to lift these huge undertakings, employing ten or twelve thousand men, to their full development, and there are numerous other concerns less ahead which will come into line as times goes on.

Paradoxical as it may seem, the conclusion has been arrived at that in some instances Rand costs are too low, the reduction having been achieved by mining the most accessible ore, and sometimes also an unnecessary amount of waste has been mined, so that profits have not been increased. Of course, low costs are desirable as long as they are perfectly legitimate, but, as another Rand authority has reminded shareholders, the question of the costs is entirely secondary and subservient to the desirability of making the maximum amount of profit per claim treated. Instances could be cited where managers have "brushed aside the idol of low working costs and have achieved excellent results thereby." Sir Julius Wernher told his Central Mining audience last week not to be frightened if they see costs increase a little; "the general tendency of costs will remain downward, and the increase, if any, will have the object of making the profit larger," which, of course, is what shareholders are chiefly concerned about.

The "Jungle" market has also derived some satisfaction from Sir Julius Wernher's speech, he having mentioned that the Central Mining has acquired a moderate interest in West Africa, "taken, after very careful investigation, by some of our engineers with large experience in gold mining." The Rhodesian market, however, seems to have been left out in the cold; at any rate, no reference was made at the meeting to that group, an omission which was commented on by some market men as significant.

The New Rietfontein has been doing poorly for some time past, and now news comes along that suggests matters may become worse instead of better. This mine, which is north of the Rand Main Reef series, and is working what is known as the Du Preez series, has always been much faulted, and it now appears, from a cable received last week by the Financial Times from its Johannesburg correspondent, that the big dyke threatens the entire cutting out of the reef at no great distance below the present central and western workings. This news accounts for the further drop in the market price of Rietfontein shares to half-a-sovereign. It is interesting to recall that similar fears were prevalent a few years ago. There were rumours that the dyke had cut off the reef, but at the meeting in March, 1907, the chairman was able to announce that a few days previously the reef had been struck below the dyke, and on the same occasion he expressed the opinion that "the life of the mine must be taken to be a very long one." The cable published last week states that drilling south of the dyke has so far failed to locate the reef, and whether history will repeat itself is "on the knees of the gods."

Globe and Phœnix Developments.

Globe and Phœnix have been a rather "sticky" market recently, which fact is attributed to a feeling of disappointment over the latest ore reserves estimate. The end-June figures announced during the past week are the best issued by the company, but I gather that people who for some time past have been well informed as to the mine's progress expected that the official estimate would show up even still better. The latest figures are given below side by side with previous official calculations:—

|---|---|---|---|---|
| Estimated Ore Reserves ...tons | 168,984 | 171,507 | 163,931 | 174,788 |
| Aver. value per ton.....dwts. | 22 | 31¼ | 31½ | 32 |
| Gold Contents ozs. | 185,882 | 267,828 | 258,192 | 281,928 |
| Gross Value..... | £782,892 | £1,124,878 | £1,097,000 | £1,184,097 |

It is calculated that the end-June estimate represents a profit in sight of approximately 22s. 6d. per share, or, say, half the present market value of the shares. Such a basis allows no scope for further appreciation, but it is believed that the official estimate will prove to be a very conservative one. With the ore reserves estimate the company has issued a detailed statement as to developments, which suggests that the recent criticism of the management for not keeping shareholders properly supplied with information has had some effect upon the directors. This development statement shows that while the north drive at the sixteenth level has remained in very high values for a distance of as much as 440 ft.—the average value is given as 168 dwts.—the seventeenth level has not yet reached the point where similar rich results are expected. Two winzes between the sixteenth and seventeenth levels, however, show very satisfactory values. Owing to the repairing of the main shaft development work cannot be resumed until about the middle of September, so that apparently there is nothing fresh for the "bulls" of Globes to go for so far as the immediate future is concerned.

Industrials.

Recovery in Shells and Kern Rivers—Cessation of Liquidation—American Cable Companies' Negotiations.

Business in the Miscellaneous markets during the past week was on a limited scale, but the better feeling which prevailed in other departments just before the holidays was also reflected to some extent in this department. Oil shares suffered in the general depression, there being heavy liquidation from Vienna and Paris. Shells were the principal sufferer, and at the carry-over showed a loss on the account of 7s. 3d. With the change in the position on the Continent and in the market's tone, however, they rallied. Kerns, of which there was also heavy liquidation at one time, also revived in sympathy with the better tone at the end of the week. Russian Petroleums, now that the reconstruction has been satisfactorily carried out, attracted some attention, and Lobitos improved on the favourable developments which have been proceeding on the property.

At the statutory meeting of the Premier Oil and Pipe Line Company the chairman had a good account of the position and progress of the company to lay before the shareholders. The Austrian Government is taking an increasingly active interest in the Galician Oilfield, and is adapting the locomotives on the State Railways for oil fuel. He reported that the company has eight wells sunk on its property, three of which are producing, three have almost reached the producing stage, while two may be expected to produce when the necessary depth has been reached, and that the present earnings of the company are at the rate of between £70,000 and £80,000 per annum.

Hudson's Bays, which were badly affected by the Continental difficulties, recovered later, and in this they were assisted by the better crop reports from Canada. Other Canadian land shares, however, remained heavy. Anglo "A" advanced on the statements made at the meeting to the effect that negotiations with the American Telegraph and Telephone Company are still proceeding. The parties are agreed as to principle, but details have not yet been agreed upon, while matters are complicated by the fact that the Anglo Company is partner with the Direct United States Telegraph Company and the Western Union Telegraph Company. Despite the surrounding depression Egyptian shares held up well and in some cases advanced slightly.

Tea as an Investment.

Now that the clamour of the rubber and oil booms has subsided a good opportunity is presented for considering the position of the market in Tea shares, which have recently been steadily advancing. By Tea shares I refer to the securities of Indian tea-producing companies which have not a rubber tree on their estates, and do not, so far as I know, intend to become interested in that industry unless it is by way of taking some shares in a rubber plantation company. For some time past people directly interested in the Indian tea-growing industry have been quietly picking up shares of the Indian companies with very good reason, for the past year's results of the Indian tea companies which have just come to hand are in themselves quite sufficient to account for the steady advance in prices, apart from the very encouraging outlook for the tea industry. For the information of my readers I will review the developments which have led up to the present prosperous state of the tea trade, so that they can better judge the strength of the position. During the past season there was an increase in the production of tea from India and Ceylon of nearly 28,000,000 lbs. as compared with that of the previous year, but despite this big increase a higher range of prices was obtained—a state of affairs which was, of course, ideal for the producer. The reason for the advance in prices of the commodity was increased demand, the extra output of tea being readily taken. A satisfactory feature is that the increased consumption has not been due to any sudden or temporary cause, but arises from circumstances which have every appearance of lasting. Not only did consumption increase in this country during the past year, but a considerably larger quantity of tea was taken for foreign and colonial markets. The quantity of British-grown tea taken by markets other than the United Kingdom, in fact, was a record, amounting to over 175,000,000 lbs. This is a strong point, as it is to the foreign markets that producers will in future have mainly to look for disposing of increase in supplies, although there is still scope for expansion in the home market. In the home market the institution of old-age pensions was a factor which favourably affected the demand for tea, while the policy of the big multiple-shop firms of pushing what is known in Mincing Lane as a cheap "canister" tea also had the effect of increasing consumption. Considerable criticism has been levelled at the cheap canister policy, but the fact remains that the consumption of what the market terms "common" tea has been considerably stimulated by it.

So much for the past. As to the future, the position is quite as strong, if not stronger, for there is not likely to be another increase of 28,000,000 lbs. in the output of British-grown teas this season. On the contrary, there are some authorities in the produce market who look for a shortage in supplies as compared with the demand, but even if this is not realised it is not expected there will be too much tea to meet the demand, because up to date this year total production has shown a falling off. Owing to unfavourable weather and, in a measure, to the growth of rubber in tea estates, Ceylon is about 8,000,000 lbs. short this year in its shipments of tea. This shortage in Ceylon shipments, however, is to the advantage of the Indian companies, which are not suffering in the same manner. The Indian season has only just commenced, whereas the Ceylon season began early in the year, and it is, of course, too early to say how matters will pan out, but so far the Indian production is rather ahead of last year. Demand for tea continues satisfactory, and there is evidence that the expansion in the export trade is going steadily ahead.

As to the positions of the companies I give below comparisons of the results for 1908 and 1909. In dealing with tea company securities, however, it has to be remembered that the market as a whole is a very limited one, and transactions in a large number of instances are a matter of negotiation. There are numerous companies doing very good business, but the shares are so tightly held that they cannot become popular public securities, and in view of this fact the Tea market is not one to be recommended to the man who is on the look-out for quick turns. For the investor willing to take speculative risks the position is different, but even so I must drive home the fact that should anything go wrong the holder of shares would find an even greater difficulty in selling than is now experienced in obtaining the shares. For this reason I have only selected companies which have the distinction of a daily quotation for their shares in the Official List, although even some of these cannot be said to have a free market. In the following table I give the production of fourteen companies for the past two years, together with the average prices obtained by them for their tea:—

* London Price. † Calcutta Price.
a Assam Tea. d Dooars.

It will be observed as regards average price that the companies whose tea commands about 7d. per lb. have experienced the best proportionate rise, this being due to the fact that it is this class of tea upon which there has been such a rush of late by the retailers. The general range of prices, however, is higher for 1909 than for 1908, and it is expected that the level will be fully maintained in the current year, if not raised. In the case of the Lungla there was a slight decrease, for which drought in the early part of the season was responsible, but this was more than counterbalanced by the higher price obtained. The position as regards profits, dividends, and yields, together with the advance which has taken place in the shares of the same companies, is as follows:—

| Company. | Net Profit. 1908. | Net Profit. 1909. | Ordinary Dividend. 1908. | Ordinary Dividend. 1909. | Price, Ord. Shares. Nomi. Value | Price, Ord. Shares. 3rd Jan. | Price, Ord. Shares. Now | Yield at Present Price. |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| | £ | £ | p.c. p.a. | p.c. p.a. | £ | | | £ s. d. |
| British India | 300 | 8,600 | Nil | 10 | 5 | 5 | 5 | 10 0 0 |
| Chargola | 10,700 | 21,200 | 7 | 10 | 1 | 1⅛ | 28/6 | 7 0 0 |
| Chubwa | 11,700 | 13,100 | 15 | 15 | 5 | 8¼ | 10 | 7 10 0 |
| Dooars | 45,400 | 58,500 | 20 | 25 | 1 | 2⅜ | 4 | 6 5 0 |
| Doom Dooma | 22,400 | 35,500 | 10 | 10 | 10 | 17 | 18½ | 5 8 0 |
| Eastern Assam | 7,900 | 14,200 | 10 | 10 | 5 | 7 | 7⅜ | 6 9 0 |
| Empire of India and Ceylon | 31,300 | 40,800 | 10 | 10 | 10 | 10½ | 13 | 7 13 9 |
| Jokai (Assam) | 21,200 | 36,200 | 8 | 10 | 10 | 11½ | 14 | 7 2 9 |
| Jetinga Valley | 5,500 | 10,400 | 4 | 8 | 1 | 1 3/16 | 1 | 8 0 0 |
| Jhanzie | 8,100 | 14,600 | 8 | 10 | 5 | — | 6⅞ | 7 8 3 |
| Lungla (Sylhet) | 18,900 | 24,300 | 7 | 10 | 10 | 8½ | 12½ | 8 3 3 |
| Makum (Assam) | 8,200 | 13,900 | 10 | 15 | 10s. | 1 3/16 | 1⅜ | 8 0 0 |
| Nedeem | 36,200 | 53,400 | 8 | 10 | 10 | 12½ | 17½ | 5 16 0 |
| Singlo | 15,600 | 20,500 | 5 | 6 | 10 | 7½ | 9½ | 6 6 3 |

For the purposes of comparison I have taken the profit on the sales of tea after deducting Indian and London charges and commissions. The comparatively low yield of the Doom Dooma is due to the good record of the company, a steady 10 per cent. having been paid for the past seven years. The yield on Nedeems is only slightly higher, but the company has had a more varied career than the Doom Dooma. The Dooars Co., which this year pays 25 per cent. for the first time, has never missed earning a dividend for the past twenty-five years on its ordinary capital, and the average annual distribution for this long period is 11.7 per cent. This company is also interested in rubber, as the holder of 6,000 shares in the Oriental Rubber Co., and 20,000 shares in the British Malay Rubber Co. The Empire of India and Ceylon Co., which is under the same auspices as the Dooars, is also interested in the British Malay Rubber Co. to the extent of 25,000 shares, but its record is not so good as the Dooars, although 10 per cent. has been paid for the past four years. Where the high yields are shown, the history of the company will often account for them. Thus the British India paid 10 per cent. for 1907, nothing for 1908, and 10 per cent. for 1909, while in the past ten years the Chubwa dividend has ranged from nothing to 15 per cent. The yields in the steadier companies certainly compare favourably with those on many industrial shares, but in the case of the high yields the buyer must, of course, take the speculative risk.

MISCELLANEOUS NOTES.

The Bogus Solicitors' Letter.

As I surmised, the mysterious letter recently addressed to Truth in the name of Swann, Bradley, and Co., solicitors, of East India Avenue, was an impudent and clumsy fabrication. Whether the forger simply intended to perpetrate a practical joke at my expense or whether he more cunningly desired to do an ill-turn to the person mendaciously described as "our client" I do not know; but anyhow he only made a fool of himself. His choice of the name of Swann, Bradley, and Co. has brought me some interesting information from Mr. J. H. Byrne, chartered accountant, of 81, Gracechurch Street. It seems that the firm of Swann, Bradley, and Co. was dissolved some twelve months ago, and that in March last a receiving order was made against Bradley, who thereupon fled to the Continent, where he committed suicide. Subsequently Swann was made a bankrupt, and he is now awaiting trial on a charge of misappropriating trust funds. Mr. Byrne, who is trustee in both the bankruptcies, states that the liabilities are between £30,000 and £40,000.

Calcutta Tramway Troubles.

Apropos of a recent paragraph, I am told that the Calcutta Tramway Co. is heavily handicapped by the loss on the Howrah trams, which, however, may become profitable when a permanent bridge is built over the Hooghly and the two tramway systems are thereby linked. My informant, who is a member of a well-known Calcutta firm, goes on to confirm the statements I published as to the wholesale peculations of the company's employees. He has heard from his own native clerks that thousands of babus travel to their work every morning for one pice when the legal fare is four or six pice. Everybody in Calcutta knows that the company is systematically swindled, and there is little doubt that inspectors, conductors, and passengers are all concerned in the frauds, but the management—which appears to be less energetic and efficient than in the time of the late Mr. Martyn Wells—takes no serious steps to deal with the evil. My correspondent believes that whatever checks may be adopted the native employees will somehow contrive to wax fat at the expense of the shareholders until the company adopts the plan of charging one uniform fare for all journeys and making passengers enter through turnstiles. Meanwhile, as a counterblast, perhaps, to the charge of picking and stealing, the conductors lately started a strike—which, however, soon fizzled out—on the ground that they are underpaid.

Absentee Shareholders and Reconstruction Schemes.

The following letter from a naval officer furnishes a striking example of a hardship which often arises under reconstruction schemes:—

> I was a holder of 225 shares in ——, Limited, and went on foreign service. On arrival at Honolulu in April, 1909, I got four mails, one saying that the company had gone into liquidation, and was reformed, and I was entitled to 150 ten-shilling shares in the new company, 6s. 4d. paid. I sent cheque for amount asked for, but on arrival at Coquimbo I received a letter saying my shares had been sold, as I was too late. On arrival at Colombo in September I got five mails, the first saying that they had managed to get some shares for me, the fourth saying as I had not replied to the first mail they had sold them again. On arrival in England in November I wrote pointing out that they knew I was on the China station, and could not possibly have answered anyway, and as they had a hundred and fifty 6s. 4d. of mine, would they either give me £50 or its equivalent in shares. To this they replied that my case would go to the directors at the next meeting. I waited till the end of June, and then wrote again, and got the reply that as I had not applied in the time fixed by the court no question of compensation could be considered, so that, through being on foreign service, I am mulcted of my shares, which the company pockets, and I am told this is legal.
> I have spoken to many naval officers on the subject, and none knew that if they were abroad, and could not get a letter home and back in a fortnight or so in similar cases they lost their money. If you publish this it might inform heaps of others.

No special blame attaches to the company mentioned in the letter—a well-known manufacturing concern—and I have therefore omitted its name. The course adopted was that ordinarily followed in all cases of reconstruction, and for that reason the matter needs ventilation. Reconstructions are everyday events, and ordinarily the members of the company are notified that if they do not take up the new shares within a certain date—usually not more than a month—they will be deemed to have declined them, in which case they will be sold by the liquidator. Obviously it is necessary that a definite date shall be fixed, and, as a rule, it is desirable in the interests of the undertaking that it should be a comparatively early date. But it surely ought to be possible to provide some means of meeting the claims of shareholders who, owing to their absence from the country, cannot reply within the stipulated period. At present, I believe, liquidators and directors are powerless to help them, and there must be every year scores of cases similar to that of this naval officer. Pending an alteration of the law, however, shareholders going to distant parts of the world might perhaps do something to protect themselves by giving a power of attorney to their bankers or brokers to act for them in the event of a reconstruction.

Bananas from a Bucket-shop.

The new-born bucket-shop with the imposing title of the Industrial Development Corporation, whose flat-catching advertisement I noticed last week, has now come out with a "Special Three-day Offer" of shares in the Lami River Rubber, Cocoa, and Banana Plantations, Limited, a company floated some weeks ago to acquire an estate in Fiji. The sort of simpleton for whom the offer is designed may be judged from the fact that the Corporation does not think it necessary—or, at any rate, desirable—to mention that the shares are of the two-shilling class. What it says is that "other first-class shares range from 55s. to 355s. (see list below). We charge you only 3s. 6d." The list below includes shares quaintly misdescribed as "Batn Caves" and "Batn Tiger" (sic). Equally remarkable evidence of the value of Lamis is afforded by a table of "profits based on actual results," from which it appears that, in bucket-shop parlance, mere estimates of what "should" be earned in future years are the same thing as "actual results." The table exhibits some astonishing examples of arithmetic—e.g., £4,425, subtracted from £33,425, leaves £26,000, which is "equal to" 65 per cent. of £50,000; while £4,825, subtracted from £45,425, leaves £46,000, which is represented as 90 per cent. of £50,000! But little mistakes of that kind are of no consequence whatever in a bucket-shop circular, and I daresay that lots of these banana shares—particular stress is laid upon the banana side of the show—will be unloaded on the public by the Industrial Development Corporation. What with cover-gambling and share-pushing, this concern will, at any rate, do something towards the development of intelligence amongst its customers.

McKinley, Alexander, and Sons.

It is now nearly two months since McKinley, Alexander, and Sons asked the subscribers to Trust No. 7 to "exercise patience" in regard to the payment of profits, this plea being advanced after the issue of two circulars successively ascribing the delay, first, to the "clerical work" involved, and, secondly, to the "disappearance" of part of the ledgers. Correspondence just to hand shows that the patience of some of the subscribers who were obliging enough to wait has not yet been rewarded, profits due to them on May 27 being still unpaid on July 29. This fact deserves the attention of the management of the Daily Mail and other newspapers which continue to publish the advertisements of this firm.

In lieu of cash a number of subscribers to Trust No. 7 were gulled into accepting a "preferential allotment" of shares in the Consolidated Oilfields of California, Limited, a promotion in which one V. Carter West played a leading though quite unobtrusive part. This individual has been very intimately connected with McKinley, Alexander, and Sons' bucket-shop. Persons who foolishly allowed this firm to discharge a portion of their liability by procuring an allotment of shares in the oil company—an allotment arranged in a most peculiar manner—have since had to meet a first call of 2s. 6d. per share, and a second and final call of the same amount, making the 10s. shares fully paid, was due on August 1. They have therefore not only failed to obtain the amount to which they were entitled from the so-called Trust, but have actually parted with money for shares in a company whose very parentage is quite sufficient to damn it in the judgment of intelligent investors.

Recent Publications.

"M. O. A.," or "Mines of Africa," is an old friend under a new name. Ten years ago, when it first made its appearance, "M. O. T.," or "Mines of the Transvaal," was an adequate title, but something more comprehensive was obviously needed in view of the increasing importance of the information the volume gives with reference to Rhodesian and West African companies, and its latest edition, "M. O. A.," is an admirably arranged and extremely useful work of reference on the mines of Africa. The estimates of the lives of mines form a particularly valuable feature of the volume. It is edited by Mr. R. R. Mabson and published (price 21s.) at the office of the Statist, 51, Cannon Street, E.C.

Mr. Effingham Wilson has sent me a copy of "Hawke's Systematic Telegraph Code," including a key of no fewer than one hundred million cipher words specially arranged to fulfil the conditions of the latest international telegraphic regulations. The price of the code, which has been compiled by Mr. William Hawke, is 42s.

NEW ISSUE.

The Ivory Coast Corporation, Limited, has been formed to acquire a concession granted by the French Government over an area of 667,000 acres of land in the San Pedro district, Ivory Coast. The concession confers the absolute ownership of the land. The total yield of rubber from trees and vines for 1910-11 is estimated in the prospectus at 400,000 lbs., and for the following year at 1,600,000 lbs. Profits are also estimated from other products, including timber, palm oil, and piassava. The capital of the company is £330,000 in £1 shares, of which 194,000 are offered for subscription.

Inquiries in regard to* Rubber shares must not be included in letters relating to other classes of securities.

3. Name and address, which must accompany all inquiries, should be written on the communication.

4. A nom-de-plume or initials (the former preferably) should be given if it is desired that the real name shall not appear in the paper.

6. Communications received after Friday may not be replied to in the following issue.

Railways.

Dupleaze.—1. To lock up you might buy Atchisons, Baltimores, Chesapeakes, or some of the other dividend-payers. 2. I prefer English Rails to the bonds just now.

Mines.

Albert.—Eventually they may recover to the price mentioned, but on the principle that it is not advisable to have all one's eggs in one basket, I would suggest that the additional money be put into another share. Alberta.—They might be kept as a speculation on the chance of some further recovery. Ajax.—Your mining queries were duly answered in Truth of July 20 under the heading "Mines."

Crimson Rambler.—1. Hold for the present. 2. Rather more so than a good many other dividend-paying Kaffirs, as the price discounts possibilities some way ahead. C. B. S.—Sell on a recovery.

Dublin.—You are entitled to the dividend. Some recovery is not unlikely, but they are not suitable for a permanent investment. I would suggest Charter Trusts.

Hans.—Fair speculation for a small profit. Hayton.—Too speculative for a lady.

Rex.—Prospects rather speculative, but some improvement in price may occur within the next six months.

Sapper.—I should not care to put any money into the concern. Scribe.—I see no reason to expect much early advance in the shares named, though they may have some improvement in sympathy with markets generally. Ship.—I think both will have some recovery, and would hold. Strop (Camberley).—I cannot decipher the whole of your pseudonym, and trust this will meet your eye. I have not yet heard any details of the concern to which you refer.

Thistle.—There is no fixed rule. Some brokers charge half commission (plus the contango) on carrying over and then half on selling.

Mixed Securities.

Appo.—1. I have a very poor opinion of them. 2. Prospects of appreciation depend very much upon how the company's various interests turn out. I cannot predict an early return to the price you paid, but would not sell just now. 3. Hold. Ambleside.—1. Sell. 2 and 3. Hold.

Cicestrian.—1. Very speculative. I should be inclined to sell on any recovery. 2. Fair speculative holding for a rise in an active market. 3. I am not greatly attracted by these. 4. Sell these on a favourable opportunity. Cannon.—1. Sell. 2. An absolute gamble. 3. You may be quite certain that no honest and trustworthy firm ever offers such "guarantees"—in other words, undertakes to risk its own money in order to enrich strangers.

Essex.—1. Hold for dividends and a moderate rise. 2. Sell on any advance. 3. Hold. 4 to 6. A separate letter is required for rubber inquiries—see Rule 2.

Fairfax.—1 and 2. No. 3. Only as a lock up.

Gerry.—1. I see no reason at present to expect much recovery, and holding must be regarded as very much of a speculation. 2. Sell.

Hainault.—The suggested stocks are all sound. Exchange out of 1 but hold 2. Horatius.—1. Fair, but not specially attractive. 2. Market too quiet at present.

Ibrox.—1. I have no information. 2. I cannot fix you a limit.

Jas.—Hold all three.

Kitson.—1. The company's prospects do not appear bright, but the shares may have some recovery with other South Africans. 2. As soon as there are any natural developments. 3. Hold. Kim.—1. See "Mines of Africa," published by the Statist, for estimates of Rand lives. It is impossible to estimate the lives of Australian mines. 2. A separate letter is required for rubber inquiries.

La France.—1. I do not recommend a purchase. 2. Hopeful as a lock up. 3. A fair holding for dividends, but there does not appear to be much scope for appreciation. Lee.—1. Hold them if you are prepared to pay the call whenever it may be required. 2 and 3. I prefer the Chilian bonds to the others.

Mac Teer.—1 and 2. Hold both. 3. Mexican Southern Railway stock is a fair purchase.

Northlands.—Hold them all. Nox.—1. I do not look for much advance in these, but they are a fair holding for dividends. 2. If you desire appreciation rather than dividends you might make the exchange. 3. Fair.

Puzzled, Sebastian.—4. Hold. 5. Sell on any advance. 6. Very much of a gamble. Puer.—1. Such systems should be left alone. 2. Seem high enough. 3. Fair as a lock-up.

Reader.—1. Great Northern Deferred. 2. Brakpans. 3. Ashanti Goldfields. 4. Cuban Government New 4½ per cent. bonds. 5. Lyons 6 per cent. Preferred Ordinary. New York Telephone New 4½ per cent. sterling bonds. Rhod.—New York Telephone New 4½ per cent. sterling bonds, Erie Railroad 4 per cent. prior lien bonds, Atchison Railroad 5 per cent. Preferred.

Santos.—Of your list I should omit 2. The others are somewhat speculative, more particularly 8, 9, and 10. Snooks.—1. No. 2. See no objection. 3. Interest is contingent on the profits of each year, and earnings for some time have been very poor. (a) The mines which the railway serves are becoming rapidly worked out. When they cease the occupation of the railway will also be gone, so that it is necessary for shareholders to allow a sinking fund out of the dividends they now receive. (b) I have no information. (c) They are American share dealers, and not members of the London Stock Exchange.

Thurles.—1. As the company objects to publication of its ordinary dividends I do not care to recommend the preference. 2 and 3. Fair securities.

Oil.

Blanchette.—1. Hold for the present, but no share of this class can be termed as "safe." 2. Sell on any revival in the market.

Chester.—1. Hold. 2 and 3. Sell. Clericus.—1. Hold. 2. Sell. 3. Hold them all.

Esperancia.—Hold them.

Fed Up.—Sell them.

Gaulus.—I have a poor opinion of them. Sell.

P. J. S.—1. Sell. 2. Hold. Photo.—Sell on any recovery.

Strophanthus.—Hold.

W. P.—I can only repeat my former reply. It is ridiculous to talk about "insisting" upon the return of the money unless, as I said, you are prepared to engage in litigation, and I should recommend you to be on your guard if you are asked to contribute to the costs of any such action.

Rubber.

Asaram.—1. Hold these for recovery and a profit. Prospects good. 2. Retain these as an investment. 3. I still have a good opinion of this share. Information will be published during the next three weeks which will prove that the company is sound. Hold for a good advance. Anthony.—1. This method is adopted to assist the bears. Do not sell your Kamnas. 2. If you have them hold them for the present. It was a sound flotation, but I should take a profit when available. 3. You may hold these until markets improve, but you should make up your mind to sell them at the first favourable opportunity. Aquarius.—1-3. This is one of the best rubber investments. The shares should be worth at least £5 within a year. 4. Not this year, but perhaps next. A.—Have nothing to do with it unless you have some money you desire to lose. Aztec.—1. I should hold these for investment; at all events, do not sell under the price you gave. The prospects for next year are said to be excellent. It is too early to forecast the dividend. 2. Hold these for a better profit. 3. No; I should not buy these now. Agricola.—1 and 2. The year ends May 31, and the accounts are presented in November. The secretary probably knows now whether a dividend will be paid, but as the company is located in Edinburgh I am unable to express an opinion. 3. An excellent estate, in good hands, but no dividend for a year. Ace (Leeds).—1 and 2. In this case I should select Seaports. 3. When writing please do not abbreviate the names of companies. By so doing you inadvertently add considerably to my labour and also run the risk of getting an incorrect answer. I have nothing to add at the moment regarding this company. 4. I consider this to be a fair proposition, but I do not care to fix a selling limit. Amon.—See reply to "Old Hand." Am Anxious.—1-3. I advise you to hold your shares for recovery. With regard to Malaccas see reply to "Old Hand." 4. As to the Rubber Investor you will find some interesting information respecting this mushroom publication in a "Scrutator" article in another column of this issue of Truth. Appreciation.—(a) Kinta Kellas and Merlimau. (b) Crudes and Beverley. Ancient.—I should keep both. Ali.—1. You have a good list of rubber shares upon which you should see a good profit in time. 2. With this sum you had better average your Crudes. Aaron.—1. Probably not this year on account of the set-back they have had. 2. This company has good business in hand, but I have no information regarding the next dividend. 3. There is no market at present for these shares, and I do not care to suggest a selling limit. Aba.—1. I think it is probable that you may see a profit before the end of the year, but I also think that the price mentioned by your friend is extravagant. I do not care to fix a limit. Much depends upon the price of the raw material. 2. You must wait for the meeting. See reply to "Old Hand." Aaron Again.—1 and 2. It is obvious that some one thinks that the price of rubber will rise above the present quotation, or the Straits Bertam Company could not have sold forward at 11s. per lb. The best authorities anticipate an advance in September. 3-5. Hold all these for improvement. Anxious (Limerick).—1. I should not hold this share after the next market movement. 2. If you did not receive a copy of the circular recently issued by the Kamna Company you should write for one. Anxious (Herne Hill).—Thanks for your letter. I will look up this reference and let you have my opinion in a future issue. A. A. A.—The P.P.K. Company sold forward 50,000 lbs. of their 1910 crop. The remainder of your queries should be addressed to the secretary. Hold your shares for recovery.

Blanchette.—1-3. Hold until next March or April, then write again. It should prove a good investment. Bobdown.—1-2. Retain your shares and average should the price decline still further. 3. Meeting should be held in the early autumn. Bacton.—See third reply to "Anthony." Bix.—1. See third reply to "Asaram." 2. Hold these for a good profit. 3. In the course of a year or so you ought to almost double your money. Bridget.—I do not think well of 1 and 2, both of which I should sell upon a return of market activity. 3. This should ultimately prove to be a profitable investment. Basing.—You hold some of the best rubber shares in the list. Hold them all for the present. See reply to "Old Hand." Bananas.—I advise you to have nothing to do with this company. It is no more promising than the other companies to which the directors belong.

Clydd.—1. A good estate, well thought of in Mincing Lane. Not much market for the shares at any time. 2. Not a bad concern. 3. Worth holding for the guaranteed dividend, but there will be little rise in the shares. I assume that you have bought all these. If you have, keep them all for a time, but take a profit when available. Charing.—1. Retain for the meeting, which will be held after the holiday season. 2. You must write a separate letter when asking about mines. See Rule 2. Crudes.—See third reply to "Asaram." Cantians.—You might buy Linggis, Consolidated Malay and Malacca debentures, but please bear in mind that the yield you ask for is not obtainable at the moment, and can be ultimately got only by buying now and waiting. COCKSCOMB.—1. The bucket-shop whose circulars you enclose was dealt with in last week's TRUTH. 2. You need not worry about your shares. All of them are good to hold for recovery and a profit. C. B. A.—1 and 2. You may safely buy these and hold for a good profit or for dividends. 3. I do not advise you to buy this share, although I think it is possible that when markets become active speculation may cause a considerable advance in the price. CYPRUS.—1. See reply to "Eastling." 2. This company has good business in hand and the shares are cheap at anything under 10s. CHIN CHIN.—See reply to "Old Hand." CHINKY.—1. I should not advise a purchase of this share. 2. Belongs to a good group, but is not the best in that group. 3. No. 4. Malacca ordinary, Madagascar preference, and Beverley Tea and Rubber. 5. An excellent speculative investment at present price. 6. Don't touch. CANNON.—1. An excellent list. Add Madagascar preference. 2. Retain for dividends. 3. Probably next year. CANPAC.—You should divide the amount between Linggis, Malaccas, Madagascar preference, and Northumberland Tea and Rubber. CICESTRIAN.—Hold all your shares until next March unless you see a very good profit before then. Average your Crudes or Madagascar Ordinary. CECILIA.—I am quite sure that the secretary will answer any questions that you would like to put to him on the subject. CLERMAG.—1. Yes. 2. You need not believe either. A line to the secretary at 4, Lloyds Avenue, London, E.C., would set your mind at rest. 3. I suppose you mean in the near future. I think it is quite likely. CAVENDISH.—You should hold on for the present, but as the prospects are not very promising it will be well to sell when markets become active again.

DALKEY.—Retain both these for recovery. Both will ultimately prove to be good. DERRIANA.—Of the three you mention I would buy only Muhesa. DEVA.—1. Don't be alarmed. If you bought the shares 5s. paid and the transfer shows 17s. 6d. paid, you may rely upon it that your broker has paid the seller for the amount of the instalment, and will soon wake up to the fact that he has not yet debited your account. 2. See reply to "Eastling." 3. Average on any further decline. DALMON.—You should have written a separate letter for your first inquiry. See Rule 2. With regard to your rubber shares, 1 is in good hands, but there is no market for the shares. 2 and 3. I regard both of these as unsatisfactory concerns. See third reply to "Anthony." DECAY.—1 and 2. I have an unfavourable opinion of the prospects of these companies. DEVON (Plymouth).—All three shares are good to hold for much higher prices. DUNELM.—I should not advise a purchase. If you hold them, wait for a market recovery, then sell. DUNLOP JUNIOR.—See reply to "Old Hand." DOROTHY PERKINS.—1. Yes. Do not sell except at a good profit. 2. Last year dividends were paid in October and December DISAPPOINTED.—1. Do not sell. 2. I would not hold these. 3. Yes. DUNCAN.—1. Purchase price was based on a moderate five years' purchase scale. The capital of £150,000 is sufficient to bring 3,000 acres into bearing as proposed—say £50 per planted acre. 2. Yes, fully paid. 3. Certainly. A profit of £103,000 in cash and shares was made over the first subsidiary, and several more are in readiness for the autumn. Do not forget that you hold ten per cent. participating preference shares, and their first year's dividend is already secure.

EASTLING.—I believe that this company will eventually be a most satisfactory producer, but at the moment it seems to be under a cloud. Watch the market and average if a further fall occurs. ESTELLA.—Your broker gave you good advice. As a widow you ought not to risk your small capital in the way suggested. EASTNEY.—You have a good list about which you need not worry. Keep them all for the present. The only one about which I have any doubt is 4, which I should sell when markets revive. ESPERANCIA.—1. If you hold them do not sell under 36s. 2. These will go ahead in a month or so on account of the business in hand. May reach 10s. premium.

FIREFLY.—It will pay you far better in the long run to keep the stock you hold now. FUSILIER.—You have a good list of rubber investments, and the share you suggest adding is also an excellent one. FREWEN.—Do not sell. See third reply to "Asaram." FEE.—I should certainly not sell these at present. 1 and 2 are good for dividends, and 3 is a fair concern. All should stand higher before the end of the year. FLAGMARK.—1. Yes. Buy the Lingg's. 2. You might also buy this as a lower-priced share, but you will get no dividend, at all events before the end of next year. FABIAN.—1-2. I should hold these for considerably higher prices. 3. Clear out of these when you can do so without loss. FISHERGATE.—1. Wait for their subsidiary issue later this year; the last paragraph of the circular should assure you. 2. See reply to "Gwalia." 3. You have a fine list, certain to rise to higher prices than they have yet achieved. You overlook the main fact that rubber is only in its infancy.

GAULUS.—I have always regarded this as an unsatisfactory share. The reason that no quotation appears in the usual lists is that the shares are unsaleable. G. J. MCA.—Thanks very much for letter and enclosure. GREEN ROCK.—1. A good investment share, but you bought rather high. I do not suppose that you will get more than 7 per cent. on your money during the next year or so. 2. (a) It is early to calculate the dividends on this share for a series of years; (b) rubber. 3. Ten per cent. Yes. GARRYOWEN.—Hold what you have for recovery, and average if there be any decline on present prices. GUMMI.—Many thanks for your letter. See reply to "Anauxious." GWALIA.—Do not worry; both your holdings should rise substantially in the autumn. GLENIFFER.—Have good business in hand. Cheap at anything under 10s. Average.

HORTICOLE.—1 and 3. I am told that this is a fairly promising concern, but I would not hold the shares, and am not in a position to fix a selling limit. HUMPTY.—1. Retain. 2. You bought right at the top. Average on any further decline. 3. See third reply to "Asaram." HABBIE.—There is very little market for them, but I advise you to lock them up and take your 6 per cent. dividend. One day they will be quoted at a good premium. H. O. K. E.—1. Crude Rubber. 2. Should not touch this share.

ISOBAR.—1. Possibly not before the end of the year, but they are good to hold. 2. Retain both for recovery. ISMAEL.—1 and 2. See reply to "Old Hand." 3. Tapping will not commence quite so early as anticipated, but the estate is developing well, and you should hold your shares.

J. M. (Dundalk).—This is a respectable, well-managed concern, and I advise you to hold your shares. J. A. W. (Nunhead).—Arrange the list in the following order:—1, 4, 6, 5, 3, and 2. I do not care to fix selling limits for these just now. For the particulars of rubber companies perhaps "Rubber Facts and Figures," by Mathiesons, at 1s. 1d., would suit you. JUNKER.—Any estimate formed on published data would probably be somewhat misleading. You had better write to each secretary.

KEN. 1. The quotation may rise beyond the price you gave during the expected market activity in the autumn, but I hardly think the limit mentioned will be reached this year. 2. Retain these for a good profit. 3. Hold these until the meeting, when full information should be forthcoming. K. S. W.—See reply to "Eastling." K. M. S.—1 and 3. See reply to "Eastling." KAMNA.—Yes. KAMA.—This is not the time to sell, even when your holdings show a profit as yours do. Wait until the end of September, then sell half and lock the rest away.

LISMORE.—See reply to "Eastling." LILBURN.—Your best plan will be to buy Madagascar preference. LOT.—1. Hold for say 4s. premium. 2. Yes. Retain these for recovery.

MCINTOSH.—1 and 3. These are shares that I should not hold, although I do not advise you to try to sell just now. Wait for a market recovery and then sell. 2. This is a speculative share which may advance at any time, but I should take a profit when I could. You do not mention the cost price of the shares. MAK. Of the two I should prefer Merlamaus. Your broker will give you the price of these, or you can see it in any financial paper. Of course you understand that you will not get a dividend on them for a year or so. MAN. You need not be anxious. See third reply to "Asaram." MATULELA.—See reply to "Old Hand." MOGRABIN.—1. This was a slip. Sorry. 2. The meeting will probably be held in September or October. I have no information as to the dividend. MIGRANIN.—Retain them all and write again in three months' time with regard to selling limit.

NOMAD.—You do not correctly understand the meaning of the word premium. The amount of the premium is in addition to the nominal sum paid up, e.g., a £1 share 10s. paid at 1½ premium is worth 10s. plus £1 5s., i.e., £1 15s. You had better divide the amount between Madagascar preference and Vine and General Trust preference. NED.—Hold by all means. 2. See Rule 2. NOMAD.—You have a fair list of shares, but, as you are probably aware, these companies are not yet producing. I should hold all of them until next year unless before then I could see an opportunity of selling 5 without loss. NIGEL.—1. Wait for better markets, then sell. 2. I should not buy them. NEEDUM (Liverpool).—Sell when markets recover and buy the shares of a good producer. NIGERIA.—1 and 2. The shares are likely to prove an excellent investment, both from the dividend point of view and capital appreciation, say within twelve months from now. 3. The shares mentioned in question 1. NOVICE.—1. Hold for recovery. 2. I am told so.

OLD HAND.—In the Malacca Estate you have one of the finest properties in the East. Your broker's remark that the company "are bleeding their trees to the utmost extent in order to swell their monthly returns," and that "this policy will render the returns bad for the next year or two," is like the rumour of the company having to contend with serious labour troubles—sheer nonsense. At the meeting which will be held in a few weeks you will learn why the returns have not been equal to early predictions, and I think you will find that these reasons are satisfactory. You may safely average at present price. ORIENTAL.—1. Hold for dividends and a profit in the future. 2. At the end of 1911 or the beginning of 1912. OBERAM.—I have a very poor opinion of 2, 5, and 6, and think that you will be very fortunate if you get back the amount you paid for them, but do not try to sell for another month or so. 1 and 2 will one day show you a profit. 4. This is a doubtful proposition. Sell when you can do so without loss.

POUMAND.—1. Yes, on the safe side. 2. Useful, but generally in valuing a rubber share this source of income is practically disregarded. PUNTER.—1-4. Men of good standing. You have a guaranteed dividend until the estate comes into bearing. Probably there will not be much advance in the price of the shares for some time, as few shares change hands. Ultimately the shares should stand much higher. For the books you require you might try "Rubber Facts and Figures" and "The A.B.C. to Rubber Planting Companies in Malaya," both of which you can get from F. C. Mathieson and Sons, 16, Copthall Avenue, London, E.C. PUZZLED.—As "it strikes" you that my opinion is wrong it seems a pity that you waste your time to ask for it. PICKWORTH.—See third reply to "Anthony." PAMELA.—With the money you had better average the P.P.K. PEG.—1. In my opinion it would be neither "safe" nor "profitable." 2. I do not care to recommend this share, although I think it is possible that the corner may have been turned. The outlook seems better now than it did during the past year. 3. Ought to be worth 12s. 6d. next year. P. T. F.—Malacca ordinary, Madagascar preference, and Beverley Tea and Rubber. Thanks for appreciative remarks. I hope that your next venture will be as profitable. PLAINSPEAKER.—1. You would certainly do well to get out of this share as soon as markets harden. 2. Retain these for investment. PARSON.—1. See reply to "Old Hand." 2-3. Both should reach higher prices before the end of the year. POOR MAN.—The working of the estate is progressing satisfactorily, but for some time past there has been an insufficient rainfall. The company expect to make large shipments by the end of the year. PHOTO.—These are promising companies. Hold both for recovery.

QUERIST.—See reply to "Old Hand." QUIZ.—I have consistently advised correspondents that General Ceylon is a good investment share, but you really must spare me the labour of turning up the references to the company in past issues, although I should be delighted to do so if time permitted. QUESTIONER III.—Yes. Average.

RUSTIC.—1 and 2. Should reach that price again within the next year. Retain. 2. Probably be higher than that before next March. R. T. N.—I should average. R. R. (Birkdale).—The shares you name are all pretty certain to advance on their merits during the next twelve months, but you are asking too much in requesting me to pick out those which will increase in value 100 per cent. during the next two months. You do not say whether you hold any of these shares. RICHARD.—1. Hold all three for recovery, and average should the price decline further. 2. Your suggestion will be adopted when possible, but often there are special reasons which make such a procedure undesirable. REGENT.—1. It is too early to talk about a dividend, but see third reply to "Asaram." 2. I should not buy these now. 3. The rule is clear regarding mixed securities. One coupon is sufficient, but rubber queries must be written on a separate sheet of paper. ROBIN.—Keep all three for the present. Write again at the end of September with regard to limits.

SONI.—1. Not a share that I could recommend. No price obtainable. 2. I am sorry that I cannot trace this company. SHIP.—It is quite likely that the price of this share may advance soon, in which case sell. STROPHANTHUS.—The prospects, so far as I can learn, are unchanged. It will be well for you to make an exchange as soon as improved markets give you the opportunity. SNOOKS.—The remark would not apply in the case of the companies named, as they will all use machinery. SION.—1. I shall be pleased to give you all the information available, but I do not quite understand what you want to know. A reply to your question appeared, as you are aware, on July 6, and you subsequently obtained further details yourself. Were you not registered when the new shares were offered and the broker did not communicate with you on the subject? Is this your grievance? 2. You had better keep these for recovery. SOUTH BANK.—Of the three shares named I should buy Linggis. SIDLEY.—1. Both are good to buy and lock up for four years on account of the guaranteed dividend, but there is not likely to be any appreciable advance in the quotation. 2. Yes. SHANNON.—In the circumstances you name I do not care to advise you to speculate in rubber shares. As the money will again be required so soon you had better take an inscribed stock where there is no charge for stamp and fee. SARAH.—You have a good representative list of rubber shares, but I think the figure you have fixed as the ultimate income is a little high. SAVINGS.—1. Retain for recovery and then sell. 2. A good investment share. Should rise to about 10s. 3. You could not do better. S'IL VOUS PLAIT.—Hold for a time, but take a profit when you can. SEESTU.—1. I prefer not to concur in such a sweeping general assertion. 2. Ought to go to about 12s. S. B. T. (Westminster).—As soon as detailed accounts of the Madagascar outputs per machine arrive I shall be able to deal with the wild rubber group. SINGAPORE.—Leading directors of our largest producers have not sold a share, and express their determination not to sell this side of next spring. See Rubber Notes; the revival will come with a burst when the speculative position has been straightened out. See reply to "Gwalia." STAMFORD.—1. I did not recommend the issue, but I hear now that its concession is a most valuable one. Call on the secretary and see the maps and reports. 2. Premium is too high for a start; prefer Northumberlands. STEDALL.—The American crisis may slacken industrial demands, but the investment strength of rubber shares is too great for temporary setbacks. Read my last four issues and wait for an improvement. SUBURB.—1. Yes, but not this year. 2. Your question is rather vague. Both shares should rise considerably within the next twelve months, but as they are both investment shares I do not expect to see any great speculative advance during the next few months. SENTINEL.—Hold for recovery. SIMPLEX.—1. The position is simply this: that you will have to wait five years before you see any results. It is for you to say whether you think it worth while to hold on; at the same time, I think it very unlikely that you will be able to sell. STARKIE.—See reply to "Old Hand." SEAVIEW.—1. For the investment of this money you should buy only those shares which show a good yield on the dividends of the past year, such as Linggis, Federated Selangor, or Consolidated Malay. If for any reason you prefer the share you name there is nothing against your buying it except that future prospects of increase in capital value are not quite so promising. 2. I should rather call this an investment. 3. Very good indeed.

TRAMORE.—1. If you care to make this exchange I should not dissuade you. Keep these for the guaranteed dividend. 3. These will not move much before the end of the year or the beginning of next, when they should begin to advance upon the publication of results. TAFFY.—1. Beverley, Merlimau, and Kinta Kellas are worth keeping on their dividend prospects. The premium on the other share looks tempting if you got in at par. 2. You are entitled to any dividend that may be declared. TEVIOT.—Of the three shares mentioned Linggis are the best purchase at present prices. With regard to your other query, will you kindly repeat in full, as you mention "Straits Rubber," which means Straits Rubber Company, Limited, but you enclose a document relating to Straits Settlements (Bertam) Rubber Company, Limited. THE OWL.—1. Of the three I consider Beverley the most promising as an investment, although I may have a speculative advance in the near future. 2. Please repeat this inquiry, as I do not understand whether you require a share that is showing a high return on the dividend for the last completed year or will probably give a high yield in the near future. TURNBULL.—£10 is a safe limit for Lanadron. The final call will be made before January. They are never likely to have labour troubles owing to their ingenious profit-sharing schemes. Go and talk to the secretary. Shareholders forget that secretaries are only too pleased to encourage intelligent interest in their companies.

UNFORTUNATE ONE.—I advise you not to sell just now. 1 and 3. Should recover to your price within the next year. 2. See third reply to "Asaram."

VILLAGER.—Two to three months is the usual time, but there is no fixed rule. Sometimes it is six months. VOMER.—1. Wait before averaging. There may be a little further decline, but eventually they will recover. 2. Hold these for recovery. You have no doubt seen the circular. 3. See third reply to "Asaram." 4. It may be, but I should not buy. 5. Northumberland Tea and Rubber. V. C.—I do not see why your friend should be restive, neither do I understand your question as to whether you should average. At the time of writing you could not buy any more shares below the price at which the original investment was made. You will no doubt see a profit in the next few months, but I do not care to fix a selling limit. VIRIDIAN.—1. See reply to "Amanxious." 2. See third reply to "Asaram."

WIRRAL.—I should hold them without hesitation. I should be interested to learn from the friend of the manager the definite reason why he condemns the company. A more precise statement would carry weight, perhaps. WONDERER.—I should hold. There is no cause for you to worry about this share. WATCHFUL.—1-3. These should advance during the year, but I prefer not to fix limits for them until the trend of the market is more decided. 4. You will be lucky if you get "an early profit" on this. 5 and 6. Do not buy these now. WYKEHAMIST.—I confirm with pleasure the opinion that you have received from your friend, viz., 1 and 2 are "all right," and number 3 is "no good."

XENIA.—1. I should not worry about this share. I hear that the output will be considerably increased after October, and I should not be surprised to see an early advance to 20s. 2-3. I am sorry that I cannot comfort you regarding these two shares beyond saying that possibly the price may be pushed up a little if we have an autumn revival in the rubber market. Sell when you can.

YENOR (Ilfracombe).—I hope that I have read your pseudonym correctly. Your handwriting displays the artistic temperament, but unfortunately it is rather illegible. You need not worry about your Linggis. At present price, and on last year's dividend, they yield you over £5 12s. 6d. per cent. This is without any allowance for increased output. 2. One of the best, but I think that possibly the prospects of Linggi are better. 3. I do not think you need be anxious. Of course this share is in a different category to 1 and 2, but eventually the investment should turn out to be a good one. YEOMAN.—1. I advise you to retain these for recovery and appreciation. 2. You do not say what the shares cost. Keep until next March unless in the meantime you see a good profit.

ZOUAVE.—1. (a) An excellent investment. (b) A fair proposition, but a "long waiting" one. (c) May come out all right in the end, but I do not like it, and should sell later on in the autumn. 2. "Rubber Facts and Figures," 1s. 1d., which you can get from F. C. Mathieson and Sons, 16, Copthall Avenue, E.C., and the Financier. 3. You must ask the secretary about this. ZULU.—1. No. 2. See reply to "Old Hand." Full information should be forthcoming at the meeting on the other points you raise.

MISCELLANEOUS.

ASPHALTE.—Hold. ANON.—Many correspondents supply me with copies of the weekly circulars distributed by Duncan Forbes and Co., and I have already published numerous warnings against this bucket shop.

BIX.—Such an operation usually tends to enhance the price.

CAUTIOUS.—I see no attraction in them. CONTANGO (Devon).—I do not advise the operation. COODEN MOUNT.—Yes, the same individual and the same solicitors. I shall be obliged if you will let me have particulars of the syndicate. CULLODEN.—1. The Financial Times. 2. Yes; there is also a weekly edition of the Stock Exchange Official Intelligence, price 1s., or £2 per annum. Write to the managers, Copthall Buildings, E.C.

FIDELIO.—Doom Dooma and Lungla (Sylhet). FOXROCK.—Hold 1 and 2. Sell 3.

J. C. M.—Your friends are right. It is a concern of which I have a most unfavourable opinion. I imagine that it would be impossible to insure.

KABIJE.—I presume you mean Richard Hill and Co. (1899), Limited. 1. Price 9-16-½. 2. Stock Exchange Official List. 3. Cannot say.

NUX.—I do not recommend them.

OXONIAN.—1. No doubt the National Share Exchange "repudiates" the term bucket-shop, but it is a bucket-shop all the same. It is dependent for its own gains upon the losses in which it involves the greenhorns whom it lures into idiotic cover or option gambles—a fact from which you can judge of the value of its "tips." 2. A fair holding for dividends. 3. I do not recommend it. 4. Members of the London Stock Exchange.

PATERFAMILIAS.—I am carefully considering the items in your long list and hope to reply in an early issue.

SCOTIA'S SON.—I cannot trace the company. STARR.—Sell all three. STILWELL.—Sell. Continued decline in earnings account for the fall.

TENAKOR.—Hold.

UNEX.—1. Have no reason for doubting their honesty. 2 and 3. Recent crop reports make the outlook doubtful for these.

W. B.—All fair industrial companies, but you should not buy unless you are prepared for fluctuations in dividends. W. P.—Do not touch these shares, or any brought to your notice by such circularising concerns.

INSURANCE.

A GOOD POLICY ON COMING OF AGE—CONTRASTS BETWEEN RESULTS AND CONDITIONS OF POLICIES—THE UNFAIRNESS OF DISCRIMINATION—POLICY TWISTING.

A FRIEND of mine whom I have known all his life has just attained his twenty-first birthday. He is in the fortunate position of coming into the possession of a considerable sum of money, including some interest accumulated during his minority. He came to the sensible conclusion that it would be a good thing to use this interest as a single premium to pay for a with-profit endowment assurance policy, under which the sum assured would be paid at the end of twenty-five years or at his death if previous. His idea was that he could do without the interest upon this particular sum of money for the time being, that he did not want it to be too readily realisable for the purpose of buying a motor-car or other unnecessary luxuries, but that he wanted it to be available without loss in the event of real necessity. The single premiums for endowment assurance policies are seldom published in the prospectuses of life offices, so it was not possible for me to say exactly which company would be the best. I therefore ascertained the terms from five of the best assurance companies, together with particulars of the cash surrender values if it was desired to realise the money in the meantime. The results are somewhat striking. For a single premium of £1,000 the best policy guaranteed the payment of £1,682 at the end of twenty-five years or at previous death. This compared with £1,644, which was the least good of the five. Here the difference is not great. At the end of the twenty-five years, assuming the present rate of bonus to be maintained in each case, one office would give about £300 more than the other; this difference is not nearly so large as may be found under annual premium policies, but at the same time a man may as well get £2,600 instead of £2,300 in return for an original outlay of £1,000. All the companies from whom I obtained particulars were first-class offices; inferior companies would have given very much less.

Quite wisely, this particular policyholder laid more stress upon what he could obtain on the surrender of his policy if necessary than on the actual result at the end of the twenty-five years, when, in the ordinary course of things, he will be a good deal better off than he is at present. At the end of the first five years the surrender value was £1,120 under the policy which he actually took, as compared with £859 in the worst of the five. At the end of ten years he could obtain £1,374, the next best being more than £200 less, and the least good being more than £300 less. At the end of twenty years the cash value of the policy which he obtained is £2,057, an amount which exceeds by £770 the cash surrender value obtainable from another really first-class office.

I refer to this case for three reasons. The first is to suggest that a policy of this sort paid for by a single premium is a particularly safe and lucrative investment. At its financial worst it yields at the end of the twenty-five years the return of all the money paid accumulated at compound interest at £3 17s. 6d. per cent., free of income tax, with no possibility of anything but a large increase in capital value. Ordinary investments would hardly yield so good a return in the matter of dividends, compound interest would be practically impossible of attainment, and there would be a very good chance of depreciation in capital value.

My second reason for giving the details is to illustrate the great differences that exist between really good companies. Were the policyholder to live to the end of the twenty-five years there would be a difference of £300 on an outlay of £1,000; but the contrast is ever more marked in regard to surrender values, where a one point the surrender value under the policy actually taken exceeds by 60 per cent. that obtainable from another office. I want to make it clear that these are no extreme comparisons. I picked out five of the best offices, and between the very best and the least good of the five best there is a big difference. Had I the figures of the second-rate or inferior companies the contrast would be much more marked. It is impossible to overestimate the value of good policy conditions, and people would be well advised to pay much more attention to them than they do.

Then I have a third reason for referring to this matter. The agent of a company had been trying to obtain this proposal. The results under the policy which he had to offer fell short by more than £200 of the amount obtainable under the policy taken, and the surrender values throughout were greatly inferior. This agent represented a mutual office, and on being told the figures under the policy which was taken, the society which the agent represented offered to make up the difference of more than £200.

Now, what on earth is an honest man to say about a transaction of this kind? It simply and purely means that some policy-holders are to receive less in order that other policy-holders are to receive more, and the business is supposed to be conducted on a mutual basis, dealing fairly with all policy-holders. This, of course, is no isolated case, and I am perfectly well aware that things of this sort are being done every day. At the same time, I take the liberty of expressing the opinion that they ought not to be done, and that it is against the true interests of life assurance as a whole that these things should happen. I have no sympathy with the regulation of insurance by legislation and by State departments, but if British life offices cannot play cricket, I am greatly disposed to think that it might be a good plan to follow the example of the State of New York and pass a law prohibiting discrimination between policy-holders. Here are the terms:—"The people of the State of New York represented in Senate and Assembly do enact as follows: No life insurance corporation doing business in this State shall make or permit any discrimination between individuals of the same class, or of equal expectation of life, in the amount, or payment, or return, of premiums or rates charged for policies of insurance or in the dividends (bonuses) or other benefits payable thereon, or in any of the terms and conditions of the policy." There is also a provision that no agent shall give, directly or indirectly, an inducement to any person to insure or make any rebate of premium, or, in fact, do anything to put one policy-holder in a preferential condition as compared with the others.

This is a clean and decent way of doing business, and it is a pity that the British offices cannot agree among themselves that they will adhere voluntarily to the conditions imposed by law in the United States.

While I am dealing with the question of reprehensible practices I may as well comment on the letter of one of my readers. He has paid premiums for seven years out of fifteen years on an endowment assurance policy for £500. He has been approached by the agent of another office who has tried to persuade him to surrender his policy and take a new one from this agent's company. The original company is far better than the one the agent represents, even if the two offices are compared on a level basis, but when half the premiums have been paid the comparison is overwhelmingly in favour of the original office. If my correspondent took the agent's advice he would obtain a worse policy than he has at present and lose very heavily by the process. According to my correspondent, the agent says that the original company is not in a strong position—which is a lie—and the whole performance is typical of the scurrilous tricks of that curse of the insurance business—the policy-twister. I can only repeat what I have often said before, that the proper reception for a policy-twister is to kick him (preferably metaphorically) out of the house and have nothing whatever to do with him in the future.

COMPANY MEETINGS.

CENTRAL MINING AND INVESTMENT CORPORATION, LIMITED.

The fifth ordinary general meeting of the Central Mining and Investment Corporation, Limited, was held in the Board Room at No. 1, London Wall Buildings, E.C., on Wednesday, July 27, 1910. Sir Julius Wernher, Bart., chairman of the corporation, presided.

The Chairman said: Gentlemen,—The report and balance-sheet have been in your hands for some days, and we will take them as read.

You will have noticed that our profit is smaller than last year, but we are still able to pay the same dividend and to carry forward a substantial balance. The last year followed one of unusual depression, and we had a great revival, with phenomenal rises in prices. The year under review was, from a market point of view, an uneventful and even disappointing one; speculation was in other fields, and we were left somewhat in the cold. For this reason we had fewer opportunities to realise. On the contrary, we took advantage to increase our holdings in many instances, as the outlook industrially has greatly improved, and industrial conditions are guiding us much more than mere market considerations. As I have pointed out on previous occasions, our profits are subject to great fluctuations—the nature of our business brings that with it—but we are anxious to average dividends, and anyhow not to let them drop. We make large provision in good years so as to remain strong in moderate years. Last year we put £100,000 to reserve; our profit this year would be sufficient to do the same with a small carry forward, but we decided to carry forward a large balance and have a little more elasticity in our accounts.

I must also remind you again that with our system of accounts, and especially the way we stock our assets, we have a large internal reserve. Our profits are strictly realised profits, and the unrealised assets are never written up, but frequently reduced if the market price should come close to our book price or be below it. I am happy to say we had not much to write down that way considering our large and varied holdings, and, in proportion, we suffered more from our first-class investments than on the speculative side.

The gross profit for the year is £470,428 5s. 3d., against £592,645 2s. last year, and the net profit £135,000 less than 1908-9. The general expenses are somewhat higher, owing to expenses in connection with the redemption of our debentures and increased fees for professional services.

Turning to the balance-sheet, you will notice that our investments in South African companies, and other companies, or participations, have increased by about £450,000, which is an indication of our faith in values and prospects. Over half of that increase is on non-dividend-paying shares, but they are all of companies which are nearing the producing stage, and we consider them amongst our most promising holdings, and expect to class them soon with the dividend-payers. At to-day's prices they leave a margin which fully justifies, with our other assets, the premium at which our shares are quoted. Our so-called first-class securities and cash assets are down a full million. This is explained by the increased holding referred to, and by the redemption by purchase or drawing of £545,000 debentures, reducing the outstanding debentures to £330,000, which have been called in and, excepting about £8,000, redeemed since June 30 last. Our cash resources are still very ample. We hold £1,245,000 of British and foreign Government and other securities against £1,663,000 last year. We have realised some Colonials and Municipals with a profit, and £200,000 Consols with a loss, and still hold £500,000 of the latter. It is, of course, very annoying to lose on such investments, which used to be the most stable in the world. I have asked the secretary to prepare me a little statement showing our position in Consols since the day of purchase in 1905. Taking our balance of Consols at 82, and putting interest received against loss and depreciation, we have made about § per cent. interest per annum on our investment, which is bad enough. I notice the chairmen of several banks at meetings held lately have a similarly sad tale to tell, and otherwise satisfactory business results suffered in their case by these large depreciations. Of all the explanations given for this continuous fall, the best strikes me to be that, whilst the status of Great Britain as a debtor is better than it ever was, and unequalled, the credit of other debtor countries, especially of the so-called second-class States, has vastly improved, and people prefer a little more risk for the sake of higher interest. We have not even the satisfaction as tax-payers of seeing the national indebtedness materially reduced at a low price, for, with the ever-increasing public expenditure, the tendency is rather to decrease than to increase the operations of the sinking fund. Still, it must not be overlooked that Consols yield, at the present price, rather over 3 per cent.; unfortunately, people have got so accustomed to see them lower year after year, and so many have shared our experience, that the demand for high-class investments seems to drift in other directions. If we have sold a part it was with the intention of keeping our cash reserve strong, and no doubt we shall always be able to get for call money a rate of interest superior to that which we have so far made on Consols.

I do not think the balance-sheet requires further explanation; and perhaps you will allow me to say a few words on the business in which we are interested. Our principal interests remain in South Africa, but we are quite prepared to widen our scope. We have also a moderate interest in West Africa, taken after very careful investigation by some of our engineers with large experience in gold mining. We are interested in a number of syndicates formed for the purpose of studying business problems. This, of course, involves a certain risk, and we may even lose our stake, but without such risks—which are small in each case—we cannot expect ground-floor terms.

We retain our interest in the Diamond Syndicate, which has worked satisfactorily, and the syndicate has renewed its arrangement with the De Beers company for a term of years.

The great South African gold industry, in which we are principally interested, is in a flourishing condition. It has indeed become so much an established industry that it appears to have been somewhat less interesting from a Stock Exchange point of view. Many shares get into firm hands, and the holders are more interested in dividends than in daily fluctuations. This in part reduces the number of transactions, but it has given a greater stability, and I think the feeling of security was never greater than at present, and people are less easily alarmed by fluctuations, which often arise from reasons quite independent of the industry. It is the feeling which we share in our company, where we try to invest only on intrinsic merit. But there is still a great field for the intelligent observer; the best companies (with the exception of a few companies with short lives) are still far, very far, from their ultimate attainments. Their progress may appear slow, but time is required to lift these huge undertakings, employing ten or twelve thousand men, to their full development, and there are numerous other concerns less ahead which will come into line as time goes on. Improvements are going on all the time, and, though we sometimes seem to think that this and that side of our work has almost reached perfection, the active brains of our managers, engineers, or metallurgists still discover defects or shortcomings which lead to further improvements, and that will go on. Our final object must ever be to obtain the highest profit from our properties; all other questions, even the question of costs, have to be regulated by the profit factor, and, comic and paradoxical as it may sound, we have come to the conclusion that in some instances our costs are too low. To explain my meaning, allow me to quote from the speech of Mr. Schumacher at the Rand Mines annual meeting a short time ago.

Mr. Schumacher says: "I would like to take this opportunity to make it quite clear that our object is to obtain records as regards profits, and not necessarily records as regards low working costs. Managers of various mines have in the past during times of stress often been forced to mine the ore that was most accessible; low-grade ore in the hanging wall or footwall was eagerly broken down in order to keep the stamps running; sometimes also an unnecessary amount of waste was mined. The results in these instances were certainly lower working costs, and lower working costs for a long time remained the popular cry. But with low costs in many cases were combined lower profits and bad mining. Low working costs are undoubtedly desirable as long as they are perfectly legitimate, but they are entirely secondary and subservient to the desirability of making the maximum amount of profit per claim treated. I will mention here two or three instances where managers connected with our mines have, with the support of their directors, boldly brushed aside the idol of low working costs, and have achieved excellent results thereby. One is that of our present manager of the Geldenhuis Deep, Mr. H. M. Thomas, who last year was acting-manager of the City and Suburban Gold Mining Company for several months, and by organising his underground work carefully by narrowing his stopes and deliberately raising his working costs, increased the profits of the mine to an appreciable extent. Another instance is that of Mr. W. T. Anderson, who for the last six months or so has been at the Village Deep. He goes further than stoping as little waste rock as possible. He is convinced that it will pay to leave in the hanging wall of this mine some of the low-grade ore which had hitherto been taken. The result, it is confidently expected, will be higher profits and bigger dividends, and who will then care whether the working costs are raised or not?"

Putting it in other words, if you work unpayable reef the loss has to be borne by the payable reef, and it is wiser to avoid this loss if you can. Of course, this principle cannot be strictly carried out. There are intermediate stages dictated by special conditions. We all know that it is cheaper to work on a large scale, but there is a limit, and we may have worshipped low costs just a little too much, and we are trying to remedy it.

I draw particular attention to this question of cost per ton, for it is quite possible that this race for low costs will cease at least as far as certain groups are concerned, and if you should see a little higher costs do not be frightened—it will all be to the good; the general tendency of costs will remain downward, and the increase, if any, will have the object of making the profit larger, in spite of higher costs, and that is what shareholders care most for.

The labour question has given us a good deal of anxiety, as there was a decided shortage. For instance, a big mine like the Crown was at one time between 3,000 and 4,000 men behind requirements, and you may well imagine what it means to have only 8,000 instead of 11,000 or 12,000 at work; we have picked up during the last months, employing on the Rand about 25,000 natives more in June than in January, but we shall want a good many more, and I can only express the hope that we may find them. I know Government gives every possible assistance, and the Union Government is not likely to relax, for the mines are the great revenue producing factor until all other resources in the country are more fully developed. Governments have this in common—that they all like to take what they can get, and their interest is with us. I myself believe that we shall be successful in increasing our force. My experience of forty years is that, although the industries were periodically inconvenienced, they never permanently suffered, and I expect that this will be also the future condition. The increase of our white labour goes on apace. We have about 13½ per cent. more white labour than a year ago, with every desire to increase it. I think I am justified in saying that no white workman physically fit for miner's work need be without employment. Until he becomes fit for his job the pay may only be sufficient to keep him, but a worker can very quickly improve his position and earn current wages, which are high and allow him to save.

The development of our mines in depth is quite satisfactory. There are good and bad zones, as we always had them, and as you find in most mining, especially where you deal with such huge quantities. The annual mineral output of South Africa, including precious stones and coal, which begins to be an article of export, amounts to not very far from 50 millions sterling in value for a country with roughly 1½ million white inhabitants. This output is a great economic factor in the world's trade. It is in value sufficient to buy the world's annual output of copper at present prices.

Since we last met the Union of South Africa has been accomplished, and I feel more confident than ever that this political oneness and the community of interests will all make for the progress and happiness of South Africa, which offers, with its glorious climate, a home and a welcome to untold thousands of people provided they are willing to work and to push the country ahead.

Gentlemen, I will not detain you any longer. I am glad I can conclude with the words "the outlook is distinctly favourable." I now beg to move the adoption of the report and balance-sheet, subject to any remarks which shareholders may wish to make.

Mr. Rube seconded the motion, and, no questions being asked, it was put to the meeting and carried unanimously.

The Chairman next moved the following resolution:—"That a dividend be declared for the year ending June 30, 1910, upon the issued shares of the company at the rate of £1 per share, free of income tax, and that there be deducted from such dividend the amount of the interim dividend of 10s. per share paid on January 7, 1910, on account thereof, and that such dividend be payable to all shareholders registered on the transfer books on July 21, 1910, and to holders of coupon No. 3 attached to share warrants to bearer." He added that it was intended to pay this dividend on August 3, the cheques to be posted on the 2nd.

Mr. Rube seconded the motion, which was carried unanimously.

The retiring director and auditors having been reappointed, Mr. Harry Mosenthal said: I have had the pleasure of the acquaintance and, if he will allow me to say so, of the friendship of the chairman for a limited period of some forty-five years, and I may say that from the first day I met him until to-day I have never heard him say anything that was not worth listening to. (Hear, hear.) I am quite sure that with our present chairman and his colleagues we are in the best possible hands, and that having heard, as you have heard, the principles on which this business is conducted—the retention of large cash reserves, the investment in stocks, shares, and properties on their intrinsic merits, and all the other sound points enumerated by your chairman—we may safely and confidently look forward to a prosperous future. I have very much pleasure in proposing a vote of thanks to the chairman and the board.

Mr. B. Kitzinger seconded the vote, which was carried by acclamation.

The Chairman, in the course of his reply, said: We have one or two propositions in hand at present which perhaps are very promising, but it is rather too early to judge. On the whole, I think we have every reason to be hopeful for the future, and it will be our endeavour always, as it has been in the past, to do the very best we can for the company. (Applause.) I thank you, gentlemen, very much for your kind vote. If you will allow me now, I would like to offer a word of thanks to our staff, which is very efficient and up to its work. It is due to the alertness of our staff that we are in a position to present to you on July 20 accounts and balance-sheet of a year which ends on June 30. I think that is very unusual for a big corporation like this—(Hear, hear)—and I have great pleasure in proposing and asking you to give a hearty vote of thanks to the secretary and staff.

Mr. Allatini seconded the vote, which was unanimously accorded, and the proceedings then terminated.

RAPHAEL TUCK AND SONS.

The ninth annual ordinary general meeting of Raphael Tuck and Sons, Ltd., was held at Salisbury House, Finsbury Circus, on the 27th ult., Sir Adolph Tuck, Bart., the chairman and managing director, presiding.

The Chairman said that the improvement in the general trade of the country which had set in during the past year was promptly reflected in their own returns, and he was happy also to state that there was every indication from the figures of the first months of the next financial year, of which they already had cognisance, that this improvement was steady and continuous. He afterwards referred in detail to the various branches of the company's work which had contributed to what he hoped the shareholders would consider a fairly satisfactory result as a whole. Last season the output of the Christmas card department, which included birthday, menu, greeting cards, etc., showed a considerable increase, and its position remained unassailed. He had occasion last year to mention a personal gracious mark of appreciation with reference to the artistic nature of the company's work on the part of their Majesties the King and Queen of Italy. That day he was able to point with pride to the fact that last Christmas his Imperial Majesty the German Emperor—no mean an art critic—expressed himself, through his highest Court dignitary, in no less gracious and appreciative terms on the subject of the artistic nature of the company's work in Christmas cards, and further endorsed that gracious acknowledgment by a special mark of Imperial favour—namely, by the gift to the company of a fac-simile in oil of his famous portrait by Professor Laszlo, the value of which his Imperial Majesty further enhanced by graciously adding his autograph signature. (Hear, hear.) So far as the coming season was concerned—and this was the opinion expressed by the trade—the company were now showing the best and choicest collection of Christmas and New Year cards it had ever been the privilege of Raphael House to submit to an art-loving public. Their collection comprised over 4,000 entirely new designs, among them, by gracious permission, being their latest series of Royal cards which they had the honour last season of producing for their Majesties the King and Queen, the Queen Mother, and various foreign potentates. Having regard to the calendar, book, and art novelty departments, he stated that the picture department, in all its ramifications, was more than maintaining its impregnable position in the art world. This department recently had the honour of issuing the fac-simile of the Queen Mother's pathetic letter to the nation on the lamented death of King Edward, for the publication of which they received her Majesty's gracious commands. A similar honour was conferred upon their firm eighteen years ago by Queen Victoria, when the Duke of Clarence passed away, and King George had now honoured them with his commands to publish the fac-simile of the autograph letter addressed by his Majesty to the nation on his accession to the Throne. After alluding to the progress of the other departments, the chairman stated that the net profits for the year amounted to £33,336, to which had to be added the balance brought forward, making a total of £36,848. The directors now recommended the payment of a dividend, making 6 per cent. for the year on the ordinary shares, and leaving £4,914 to be carried forward.

The report was unanimously adopted.

THRELFALL'S BREWERY.

The twenty-third annual general meeting of Threlfall's Brewery Co., Ltd., was held at the Cannon Street Hotel, E.C., on the 28th ult., Mr. P. F. Feeny, J.P., in the absence of the Chairman (Mr. C. Threlfall, J.P.), presiding.

The Chairman said: Had it not been for the excessive additional taxation imposed upon the trade by the Chancellor of the Exchequer I should to-day have been able to submit to you a most gratifying record of our business for the year ended June 30, 1910. Treating our accounts in the same manner as in preceding years, our profit from trading account shows £173,142 13s. 9d., being an increase of £1,547 3s. 1d. on 1909. We have written off for depreciation £25,615 4s. 9d., against £25,239 3s., and we are carrying forward the substantial sum of £37,759 19s. 2d. Although we have actually made a profit sufficient to enable us to recommend a larger dividend than we did last year, we unfortunately are precluded from doing so, owing to this cruel and unjust taxation. The additional burden, apart from what we already contribute to the Imperial and local authorities, will mean an extra charge to this company of £25,820 per annum, and being retrospective as from October, 1909, we are obliged to make provision for three-fourths of it out of this year's profits. When our accounts were made up we had not received the demand notes, and we have therefore had to make a special item to the debit of our profit and loss account of £19,500, being the sum required to June 30, the end of our financial year. It is a source of satisfaction to me to report that our sales of beer have increased, but there has been a continued falling-off in the wine and spirit department. The Chairman, in the course of his remarks last year, said the time was not far distant when we should take into consideration, in the best interest of the company, the advisability of issuing the balance of our share capital. After very careful consideration your directors decided in February to offer these shares at par to the existing shareholders. The ordinary shares were over-subscribed, and when we had received applications for 50,000 of the preference shares we closed the list. You will notice that in our balance sheet there is the sum of £2,580 for calls unpaid at June 30, but these have since been paid. Now, I wish to specially bring the following paragraph before you—namely, that the whole of this issue was made without any cost to the company for commission, the only expense being for professional charges, printing, and stamps. The proceeds of the issue have been applied in paying off the temporary loan we obtained from our bankers when, you will remember, we purchased a large number of valuable licensed houses en bloc. The trade of these houses, notwithstanding depression and other difficulties, has materially increased, so I am sure you will agree with me that it was a most desirable purchase. The item loan from bank £97,415 therefore disappears altogether from the balance-sheet. We have without doubt passed through a very anxious year, but I am pleased to say that there are signs of a revival in trade generally, from which we, in common with other companies, should reap a benefit. You can rest assured that your directors will be on the alert to see that you get full advantage of the benefits which must accrue as a result of better times.

Mr. George Barker seconded the motion, which was carried unanimously.

Mr. Buszard, K.C., in moving a vote of thanks to the chairman, directors, and employees, said that shareholders did not object to pay the taxation that was necessary to maintain the honour and prosperity of the country, but what they complained of as brewery shareholders was that this taxation levied upon them was in excess of that which brewers, as part of the community, should pay in reference to the community at large. The rankling feeling at the injustice was, he ventured to think, aggravated by the fact that they felt they were singled out because, for some reason or other, those connected with brewing were people not supposed to be supporters of the present party in power.

PARKER'S BURSLEM BREWERY.

A Satisfactory Year—The Government Impositions.

The annual general meeting of the shareholders of Parker's Burslem Brewery, Limited, was held at Stoke-on-Trent on Friday.

Colonel W. W. Dobson, chairman and managing director, presided, and the other directors, Messrs. Samuel Lucas, F. M. Haig, M. G. Heeles and W. A. Cowlishaw, were also present.

The Chairman, in moving the adoption of the report, said they had gone through a very strenuous time, and that their anxiety had been very great. The difficulties they had had to face had, of course, been to consider the best method of dealing with the impositions contained in the Finance Bill. It seemed on the first blush that the easiest method of meeting it would be to raise the price of beer and so pass on the charge to the consumer. This had been tried in London and it had been advocated freely in Staffordshire. In fact, so anxious were the supporters of the Government for them to do so that last eletcion the part yorganisers issued a leaflet saying that they had a tax equal to 3s. per barrel levied upon them, and that they were raising the price to the consumers 12s. per barrel. But after carefully considering the matter with their tenants, they came to the decision that for the present, at all events, the retail price of beer should remain the same, even if it entailed a small sacrifice on the part of the tenants and a heavy one upon the company. He could not leave this subject without acknowledging the loyal sympathy and support they had had from their tenants. With regard to the accounts, they would notice that the balance of gross profit was just £7,000 greater than last year, and this was owing in a great measure to the fact that during the last six months their business had been very much better, and therefore they had been able in some degree to meet the heavy charges under the Finance Act. They had set aside the sum of £5,000 on account of the company's estimated liabilities for the preceding eight months. They had also charged £1,000 for loss of licences surrendered, and the contribution under the 1904 Act amounted to £3,217. These three items amounted to £9,217, or 4½ per cent. on their ordinary capital. The charges were very heavy, and they must feel that while the business was still capable of expansion, and while they owed money on mortgage, a certain amount of economy must be maintained. If there was one thing more pleasing than another it was the steady increase in the balance of interest account, which had now gone up from £1,348 to £2,225, or almost half the amount required to find the interest on the Four and a-Half per Cent. Debentures. Again, their mortgages had been reduced from £21,000 to £9,750, and he was hoping that the present year might again see a reduction if they were not wiped out altogether. To come now to the appropriation account, after making the provision he had enumerated there remained a net profit of £60,007, and after paying their debenture interest there was a balance of £41,733. This sum, with the balance of £6,079 carried forward, left a sum of £47,812 at the disposal of the directors, which they proposed to appropriate by placing £5,000 to reserve, making that item now equal to the amount of the ordinary capital, by paying the preference dividend, and by paying a final dividend on the ordinary shares at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum, making 7 per cent. for the whole year, and carrying £16,162 forward. All things considered, he was perfectly satisfied with the year's working.

Mr. Lucas, in seconding the motion, said they could congratulate themselves that they were one of the few brewery companies that had been able to meet the present crisis with something like equanimity, and that was entirely due to the conservative policy which the board had adopted in past years. They were not going to raise the price of beer, and certainly they were not going to reduce the quality.

In answer to a question, the Chairman explained that the reserve fund had been invested in the trade properties of the business and also used to pay off the mortgages.

The report was unanimously adopted and the dividends declared.

The meeting unanimously approved a proposal of the directors to make a grant of £300 to the rebuilding fund of the North Staffordshire Infirmary, and a cordial vote of thanks was passed to the directors and chairman.

GENERAL OIL AND FINANCE.

The statutory general meeting of the General Oil and Finance Corporation, Limited, was held on the 27th ult. at the Institute of Chartered Accountants, Moorgate Place, E.C., Mr. J. S. Smith-Winby presiding.

The Chairman, in the course of his speech, said the report showed that 250,000 shares had been issued, and that, in respect of the total amount of £125,000 payable thereon, there had been received down to July 13 the sum of £121,057 10s. The reception of the company's prospectus exceeded all anticipations, especially as it appeared at a moment when there was a distinct falling off in the exceptional activity which for some months had marked investments connected with the oil industry. Notwithstanding that their subscription list was closed for London within a few hours after the opening and for the country on the following day, the applications received amounted to more than £1,200,000. Each application was duly considered and an allotment was made in almost every case, the consequence being that they had a body of nearly 3,500 shareholders distributed over every part of the United Kingdom with quite a considerable number from France and other countries. Nothing could more plainly illustrate the increased interest taken in the particular class of business which this company was formed to conduct, and although during the three months that have followed we appear in financial circles to have fallen upon a period of comparative dulness and stagnation, it behoved them not to pay too much attention to these passing conditions, as there was every probability that things would soon right themselves and that they might shortly see a marked revival, eclipsing, possibly, any movement hitherto observed in this branch of investment. The search for petroleum in every part of the globe was being pursued with unabated activity, and would continue to be so by those who realised that the business of the world must go on in spite of the fact that Stock Exchange values might be temporarily under a cloud, because it was recognised now that petroleum was going to be employed for a number of purposes for which it had not been previously used, simply owing to the inadequacy of supplies, and further that the present sources of supply were insufficient to cope with the demands already being made upon them. These demands necessitated that the existing fields be further developed and fresh ones opened up, and for these purposes capital would obviously be required, which it would be part of their business to assist in providing. The Chairman went on to refer in detail to some of the important propositions in which the company was interested, and, in conclusion, said: I have thought it right to give you some of the grounds for the prevailing faith in the future of oil, and also an outline, at all events, of what we have been doing, in order that you may know that we have not been altogether inactive in trying to secure profitable business for the company. We have, of course, no results to lay before you to-day, but nothing has occurred since this company was established to alter the opinion we held when we were constituted your Board, that there is ample scope for the remunerative employment of its capital in furtherance of the objects for which it was formed, and that with reasonable care and management, and also a reasonable amount of good fortune, such as you will allow is necessary in dealing with commercial and financial operations of a more or less speculative character, we have prospects, if all goes well, of laying before the shareholders in due course of time such results as will satisfy whatever expectations may have been formed. (Cheers.)

SCOTTISH MAIKOP OIL WELLS.

Presiding at the statutory meeting of the Scottish Maikop Oil Wells, Limited, held on the 29th ult., Mr. Hugh A. Law, M.P., said: This meeting is held in compliance with Section 65 of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, and is purely of a formal nature. The information contained in the report is, I think, perfectly satisfactory, and calls for no remark on my part. I might, perhaps, say that since the date of the report a considerable number of calls shown to be outstanding have been paid. The balance still outstanding the directors will collect in due course. There are no agreements the modification of which require to be considered at this meeting. Whilst this is a formal meeting, it has become the practice, however, for the chairmen of statutory gatherings to take the shareholders as fully as possible into the confidence of the board regarding such progress as has been made with the company's affairs since incorporation. Considerable attention was drawn some time ago, when many companies were formed to work oil claims on the Maikop Oilfield, to the difficulties said to exist in connection with titles. I am pleased to be able to inform you that we placed all this business in the hands of Mr. Fedwichevitch, a very well-known and highly respected Russian gentleman, who had acted in a similar capacity for other important oil companies working in Russia. The transfer to the trustee of the company of our plots has been carried through promptly and satisfactorily. Your directors have since proceeded to obtain all possible information regarding the best method of developing and working the oil claims which we possess. In the opinion of our consulting engineers, and in the opinion of other engineers well qualified to form a judgment on the matter, at least several of the company's plots are admirably placed from the point of view of boring. The company's plots are adjacent to the main post road, which fact will materially reduce the cost of transport of such plant and material as will require to be sent to the field for active operations. It is well known that large sums of money have been spent by various companies on the transport of material and plant, and it is therefore a matter of considerable importance to your enterprise that our plots are so favourably situated. I think you will agree with me that the greatest essential to the success of a new business is to obtain the services of a competent local manager. Your board have experienced considerable difficulty in finding the right man, but I think I may now tell you that they have the man to fill the position. Further, we have been in negotiation with the Maikop Central Company with a view to effecting a joint working on certain plots belonging to that company which are contiguous to certain plots belonging to us. If these negotiations are successful it will result in a much reduced cost to each company for the development work. The policy of your board is to proceed slowly and carefully, to avoid incurring heavy expenses until all the local conditions are mastered, so that, when once put in hand, active operations will proceed, and the more rapidly and efficiently. Your directors are fully convinced, as I have before stated, that the oil claims acquired are well situated and are of a valuable nature, and if a prudent and conservative policy is followed a profitable business can undoubtedly be developed.

PREMIER OIL AND PIPE LINE COMPANY.

Ten per Cent. Interim Dividend.

Mr. E. T. Boxall, presiding at the statutory meeting of the Premier Oil and Pipe Line Co., Limited, on July 26, said the particulars of receipts and payments could not be taken as a guide to the operations of the company during the three months under review, as none of the figures dealing with the work of the company in Austria had been brought into the London accounts, but the directors had sufficient information at their disposal to warrant the payment of an interim dividend of 10 per cent. on the paid-up capital. Summarising the particulars, the Chairman said: It will be seen that the company possesses very valuable properties on which eight wells have been sunk, three of which are producing sufficient oil to show a most excellent return on the capital invested, three have almost reached the producing stage, and two may be expected to have a production when the necessary depth has been reached. The company possesses a private pipe line of its own, which conveys the oil produced at our wells direct to the station at Boryslaw at much reduced cost than if we had to pipe through one of the pipe-line companies. In addition to these assets the company holds land in the best part of the district sufficient to allow for nearly thirty additional wells being sunk. We have a Government entirely sympathetic with the industry and a geographical position second to none for the most convenient distribution of the oil to the various markets of the world, besides a strong protective tariff and preferential railway rates, which prohibit outside competition in the home market; and as the tax is rebated on all oil exported, it forms a strong encouragement for the development of this branch of the industry. The Austrian Government are doing all they can to encourage further enterprise in that direction, the importance of which support may be judged from the fact that during the past eighteen months they have invested more than a million pounds sterling in building large storage reservoirs, pipe lines, and the equipment of a benzine refinery on the most modern principles. I think, in view of these facts, which I have put before you, the shareholders may be congratulated on possessing a business which at the present time shows such excellent results and such brilliant prospects.

UNITED MALAYSIAN RUBBER.

The statutory meeting of the United Malaysian Rubber Company, Limited, was held on the 27th ult. at Winchester House, E.C.

Sir Percy Francis Cunynghame, Bart., who presided, stated that the prospects of the company at the present time appeared to be very hopeful. Since the flotation of the company in May, the shares of which were considerably over-subscribed, they had actually acquired interest to the extent of about 87 per cent., and were in process of acquiring the balance of the issued capital of the Malaysian Rubber Company, which company, among its other possessions, held 88½ per cent. of the share capital of the British Malaysian Manufacturing Company, Limited. This company held, in addition to the property in Sarawak, very important concessions in the Malay Peninsula, giving them the tapping rights over the whole of the forest reserve in the States of Perak, Selangor, Negri, Sembilan, and Pehang, an area of some 4,945,608 acres. They therefore had the sole right of tapping all the jelutong trees in this large area, subject to certain conditions, for a period of ten years, which was again, subject to further conditions, to be reserved for another period of seven years. The United Malaysian Rubber Company was thus practically in possession of an estate of 4,945,608 acres, a great part of which had jelutong rubber trees in full producing order. In addition, they held, through their interest in the two Dutch companies, the Nederlandsch Indisch Boschproducten Maatschappij and the Karimon Rubber Maatschappij, very important rights in South Borneo and the Karimon Islands, which were being developed with as little delay as possible. They need, therefore, have no anxiety with regard to their sources of supply, which should provide them with rubber ready for the process of manufacture to a practically unlimited extent. The jelutong tree was one of the largest, if not the largest, of the forest trees in Borneo, and should stand any reasonable amount of tapping if proper intervals were allowed for recovery. The total amount of rubber turned out from their factory in Sarawak from its establishment to July 17 was 325,213 lbs., and the last sales realised a price of 5s. The amount produced would, no doubt, have been far greater had they not had the misfortune to lose 100 drums of chemicals used in the preparation of the rubber, which were destroyed by fire in Singapore Harbour. It was intended shortly to erect another factory in the Karimon Islands, which was estimated to cost not more than £60,000, and which would be large enough for the present to deal with all the jelutong produced from other concessions outside Sarawak.

At the request of the Chairman, the Secretary read a preliminary report addressed to the Malaysian Rubber Company, Limited, prepared by Dr. Schidrowitz, after making an inspection into the company's property and prospects. In this the writer stated that the company's concessions should without difficulty provide all the raw material required to produce 6,000,000 lbs. of rubber in 1911, 10,000,000 lbs. in 1912, and 12,000,000 lbs. in 1913. The company should realise, certainly for the next two or three years, a profit of at least 2s. net per lb. of rubber. He valued the rubber (at present prices—i.e., fine hard Para at 9s. 6d.) which the company was now in a position to produce at roughly 25 to 30 per cent. under fine hard Para—i.e., at present about 6s. per lb. This should yield a profit of considerably more than twice the net profit referred to above. He anticipated that, in view of the measures taken, the supply of jelutong should steadily increase for a number of years, and after that it would remain steady and continuous. He was of opinion that the production of 3,000 to 5,000 tons of rubber per annum by the company should in no way affect the balance of the rubber market; on the contrary, it should tend to appreciate prices all round. In conclusion, Dr. Schidrowitz said he had no doubt whatever that the company should prove a great commercial success.

A vote of thanks to the chairman concluded the proceedings.

QUEER STORY.

THE MEMBER FOR CISTERN.

CHRISTOPHER SLEIGHT, the newly elected M.P. for the Cistern Division of Rockinghamshire, had laboured all through his life under the disadvantage of being considered an ass—not a downright fool, but an ass. In his early boyhood his sisters, who were older than himself, had condescended to jeer at his babyish attempts to talk and walk. At school he had been bullied; at Oxford he had been laughed at, and when at length he entered upon the profession of doing nothing, any ambitions or aspirations which he may ever have had were in a state of total eclipse.

His father and mother having died while he was at Oxford, he settled down in a bachelor flat near Buckingham Gate, and proceeded to kill time in a leisurely way and look about him. Everything was in his favour. He was well born, reasonably good-looking, and possessed of three thousand a year. But unfortunately he had no profession and nothing whatever to do. Many young men under these circumstances would have got into mischief, but Sleight was not one of those people who ever get into any mischief worth talking about; he was too indolent. He passed the time very pleasantly in stamp collecting and kindred pursuits, and in writing occasional short stories of the milk and water order for the magazines. He even attempted a novel, but found that the sustained effort required to produce fiction in bulk was too much for him.

It was after some two years of this kind of existence that he met Brenda Tarleton, fell in love with her, and married her. She was an exceedingly pretty girl, but about as different in disposition from Sleight as could possibly be imagined. Whereas he was easy-going and indifferent, content to take things as they came, and without any wish to push himself forward in the world, she was the very reverse.

She insisted upon his trying to make a name of some sort. First it was literature. She bullied and worried him until he spent most of his waking hours with a pen in his hand. The results, however, were feeble, although he certainly tried hard. Then it was politics. Here there was some success, for he was in due course adopted as Parliamentary candidate for North-West Rockingham.

Sleight did exactly what his wife told him. The lover-like affection which he had at first felt for her had grown into something more like the half-frightened fondness of a child for a strict nurse. A word or two of encouragement from her made him flush with pleasure, and when she laughed at him contemptuously—as she sometimes did—he was low-spirited for a week afterwards.

As soon as he realised that Brenda really wanted him to make a name for himself, he threw off his natural listlessness and set to work to do so. The first thing he had to do was to get into Parliament, and this, at the very outset, looked like being an impossible task. The Cistern Division had been consistently Liberal for many years, and Sleight's attack upon it was something in the nature of a forlorn hope. His opponent was Harold Verril, a man of means, and a personal friend of his wife. Verril was a better speaker than Sleight, and was more popular. In fact there was every indication of the division again returning a Liberal.

Now Sleight, although not a clever man, was by no means a fool, and he soon saw that in a straight fight he had not even an outside chance. If he wanted to win it behoved him to think out some way of detaching votes from his adversary, and this he proceeded to do, with the result that a Labour candidate appeared in the field.

That Labour candidate, from first to last, cost Sleight the best part of £1,000. He told Brenda nothing about it, and the Labour man himself had no idea who was finding the money.

When the election took place the Liberal vote was split, and Sleight was returned by a small majority over Verril, the Labour man being at the bottom of the poll. Sleight was very well pleased with himself, and looked to Brenda to congratulate him and generally pat him on the back, but Brenda was rather disappointing.

"It's a pity," she said, "that you couldn't have beaten Mr. Verril in a fair fight. As it is, it looks such a back-handed way of getting in."

Sleight felt very hurt, for it was only to please Brenda that he had ever stood at all.

"Well, I am in," he said; "aren't you pleased?"

"Oh, yes," replied Brenda. "Of course I'm pleased, but what are you going to do now? You can't speak a bit, you know, and you will never do any good in Parliament."

Poor Sleight very nearly cried. His hard work and his money had been thrown away, since Brenda apparently was not satisfied, and his success was worth less than nothing to him.

Brenda seemed to have changed a good deal. She no longer tried to urge her husband along the path of fame, and indeed appeared to be more or less indifferent to his doings.

Sleight, too, had altered. His indolence had gone, and had been succeeded by feverish and restless activity. Brenda's indifference apparently acted as a more powerful incentive to him than her previous urging on had done, and he was determined that come what might he would by some means or other make himself famous, if only to win back her smiles.

Nothing could be done until the assembly of Parliament, and in the interval between his election and the meeting of Parliament he devoted himself to writing. During that period he seldom saw Brenda except at meal times, and when he did see her she spoke but little, and then as if she were talking to a child.

As soon as the House of Commons was in full working order Sleight became very busy. After paving the way by asking a few pertinent questions, he launched himself in a fairly successful maiden speech, which he followed up by other efforts in the same line. His speeches were short, and generally to the point, and he was listened to.

On one occasion he persuaded Brenda to sit in the ladies' gallery, and she was greatly surprised when she heard him speak.

"I had no idea you had improved so much," she said afterwards. "I believe that you will speak quite well in time."

It was the only little bit of encouragement she had given him for many weeks, but small as it was, it delighted him, and after it he worked harder than ever.

Soon after this a novel by an unknown author was published, "The End and the Means," by Claude Semmes. It was a political novel, and under thinly veiled pseudonyms gave a highly-coloured account of the election in which Sleight had been the successful candidate. There was little or nothing in it about the Labour candidate—who, by the way, had since died—but Sleight himself, under the name of Slaught, was painted as a most unsavoury villain. In private life he was represented as being a libertine, a swindler, and a drunkard, and he had won his election, so the unknown writer said, by saddling his own crimes upon his opponent.

Within a few days of its publication the novel was being talked about, and so very evident were the originals of the chief characters in it that it could not fail to come under the notice of Sleight himself.

Sleight was naturally highly indignant. He talked it over with his friends in the House, and was by them strongly advised to bring an action for libel against the publisher. One of them—who was a K.C.—was particularly emphatic on this point.

Before doing anything definite, however, he consulted Brenda. Brenda had read the book, and was also very angry, but she showed no enthusiasm for the contemplated action for libel.

"Are you really going to drag it all through the Law Courts?" she asked, looking rather disconcerted. "It will be a most horrible business. We shall be cross-examined by lawyers and caricatured in all the half-penny papers. How will you like having everything you've ever done raked up and twisted about into something horrible?"

"I can't help it," said Sleight; "it would be impossible for me to sit down and do nothing in the face of that book. Why, it would be as good as admitting that I had done all the things this man Claude Semmes accuses me of. I am quite certain to get a verdict, so they tell me, and besides that, it will very likely help me a good deal in other ways. Public sympathy, you know, and that sort of thing. I shall get quite a name out of it, and I know that is what you want me to do, dear."

"Oh, that!" said Brenda, rather scornfully. "A rather dearly bought name, I think, and you don't seem to consider me at all. It will be most unpleasant for me in every way to have to appear as a witness."

"I must do it, Brenda," Sleight replied. "I'm sorry if it annoys you, but my whole reputation depends upon it. As a matter of fact, I don't think you need appear at all."

"Oh, well," said Brenda, "of course I can't prevent you taking an action, but it will be horrible!"

As soon as it was known that Sleight was bringing an action for libel against the publisher of "The End and the Means," the demand for the book all over the country became enormous. Edition after edition was printed and sold out, and it was evident that whatever the result of the action might be the publisher would not be out of pocket on the whole transaction.

The most searching inquiries failed to discover the author. Many different people were supposed to have written the book, amongst others Verril, but they all denied having had anything to do with it. Verril, indeed, wrote to Sleight, sympathising with him and expressing his extreme disgust at the outrage. Brenda, much to her annoyance, came in for a good deal of sympathy as the wife of the injured innocent, and alleged presentments of her features appeared in the papers, alongside those of her husband.

The cause of Sleight v. Blockwell and Chantry came on while Parliament was still sitting, and damages were claimed to the tune of £10,000. Mr. Slammerem, K.C., in opening the case for the plaintiff, made a most affecting and convincing oration. His client, he said, was a gentleman who, from motives of pure patriotism, and at great personal expense and inconvenience, had come forward to contest the Cistern Division of Rockinghamshire. The result of the election would be fresh in the minds of the jury. Mr. Sleight had won a great victory over two opponents. Here the learned counsel sniffed. He himself sat for a Southern constituency, and had had a four-figure majority without the intervention of a third candidate.

"Now," Mr. Slammerem went on, "Mr. Sleight's detractors—they may or may not be political opponents—have taken a most dishonourable and un-English way of revenging themselves on him. Jealous, no doubt, of the name which he is rapidly making for himself in the House of Commons as a brilliant speaker, they have attempted to blacken his character by publishing a gross libel about him in the form of a somewhat poorly constructed novel." Here he proceeded to analyse the novel, which he held in his hand, and to show the connection between the characters in it and various people who had been prominent in the Cistern election. He concluded by asking for exemplary damages. "It is a public scandal," he said, "that our most eminent men, more especially men like Mr. Sleight, who are not yet at the height of their fame, should be open to the attacks of obscure and venomous writers."

Witnesses were called who proved up to the hilt that the events described in the book were exactly the same as those which had occurred during the election. Sleight himself went into the box and indignantly denied many things. Verril followed, and paid a high tribute to Sleight's personal character, and to the manner in which the election had been conducted.

There was little or no defence. The publisher, Mr. Blockwell, took the entire blame, if any, on himself. He had no idea, he said, that the book dealt with events which had really occurred, but as he had bought the copyright from Mr. Claude Semmes, the author, he himself was altogether responsible. He was exceedingly sorry if any harm had been done to Mr. Sleight; personally he could not see that any harm had been done.

The case lasted two days, and was very fully reported in the newspapers. At the end of the second day the jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff, assessing the damages at £5,000.

Sleight left the Court feeling very well pleased with himself. At last he really had made a name, and he was looking forward to receiving Brenda's congratulations. Pushing aside the newsboys, who were shrieking out "Special Edition—Result of the Great Libel Case," he made his way across the Strand and thence to the House of Commons, for a debate was going on in which he intended to take part.

"Mr. Sleight (Cistern)"—so ran the newspaper report next day—"on rising to continue the debate, was received with loud and sympathetic cheering from both sides of the House."

The debate was an important one, and the twelve o'clock rule having been suspended, it was three in the morning before Sleight got home. He was very anxious to talk to Brenda and tell her of his success, but he did not like to wake her up at such an hour. He wondered very much if she would be pleased at the triumphant result of his action, and at his reception in the House afterwards.

There were two letters waiting for him on his study table, one of them in Brenda's handwriting. He opened that one first, and, having read it, sank into a chair and groaned. The letter had been written that afternoon, and was to tell him that she had left him.

"I could not stand it any longer," she wrote. "We were so utterly unsuited to each other in every way. It was a great pity we ever married. At first I tried to take an interest in you, and make you exert yourself. This I have, I think, succeeded in doing. Then somebody else came into my life, and I have gone away with him. Don't think too hardly of me. Mr. Verril and I will give you every facility for obtaining a divorce."

So Brenda had run away with Verril! Sleight mixed himself a very stiff whisky and soda, and laughed —a mirthless broken-hearted laugh. Then he absently began to read the other letter. It was from the publisher of "The End and the Means."

Dear Mr. Sleight,—The sales of your book have now touched twenty thousand copies, and I think we may both of us congratulate ourselves. The whole of the legal expenses of to-day and yesterday will be not more than £600, leaving a balance of over £3,000 in our favour, of which one-sixth will go to you, under our arrangement. I hope you are at work upon another novel. It would be as well to publish your next book before the libel case is forgotten, and your pen name of Claude Semmes will sell pretty nearly everything now. Please burn this.—I am, yours truly, C. B.

Sleight gulped down his whisky and soda, and threw the letter into the fire. He did not look at all like an unknown author who had sold twenty thousand copies of his first book.

BOOKS.

I GAVE pause the other day to a friend of mine, who is at once intensely aristocratic and intensely patriotic, and who, as is usual with her, was denouncing "the common people" of her own country as absolutely worthless, by asking, "But who, then, are the English people whose superiority to the Scotch and Irish, German and French you are always maintaining?" For, as Rousseau says—it is the motto of Mr. Harry Franck's extremely interesting and instructive "A Vagabond Journey Around the World" (1):—"Pour connaître les véritables mœurs d'un pays il faut descendre dans d'autres états; car celles des riches sont presque partout les mêmes." Mr. Franck took a daring header and went down and stayed down in the social depths of many countries, north, south, east, and west. What was his equipment for the venture? A knowledge of French, German, Spanish, and Italian; an apprenticeship to a dozen varieties of manual labour in his own country (United States); an experience of the hardship and horror of two working passages across the Atlantic —as a cattle man and before the mast; and one hundred and four dollars for the expenses of his only luxury, a kodak. Mr. Franck leaves out of the account of his equipment the two most indispensable of items—pluck and perseverance, indomitable pluck and dogged perseverance. In a word, Mr. Franck was perfectly equipped for such a venture, and you do not in the least wonder that he demonstrated what he set out to prove, that "a man can girdle the globe without money, weapons, or baggage." What, perhaps, strikes you most in Mr. Franck's tramp experiences in Europe is the universal horror of conscription, which, if it is the despair of the present, seems to me to be the hope of the future. Surely the time must come when the peasantry and working men of every country will, through trade unionism, or travel, or the education of the Press, come to recognise their solidarity and realise that whoever calls the tune of war it is they who have to pay the piper in blood and tears and taxes. The blood and tears are occasional only, but the taxes of time and money extorted from the peoples of Europe through conscription and through the provision of monstrous armaments—completed only to be superseded—are continual, ever-growing, and insupportable. Even in sunny France "a note of pessimism is everywhere prevalent among the masses." Briefly and unconsciously a craftsman of chance acquaintance summed up this inner feeling of his class:—"Ah! mon pauvre pays, elle n'est plus ce qu'elle était!" It is, however, in Italy, even in the wealthier north, that the poverty of the over-taxed peasantry is perfectly appalling. In Germany, too, if the poverty of the peasant is not so extreme, his horror of conscription is as great and as growing. Surely the poor, who in all countries are at the bottom, and therefore feel the cumulative crush first and most, must ask themselves soon, "What is it all for?" Most wars are like nightmares from whose horrors one wakes with a wonder that they had ever imposed upon one. Will they continue to impose upon the peoples when they realise their solidarity and recognise that it is they—and not the editors or emperors who set them by the ears—that have to live miserably in peace or die horribly in battle? Talking of solidarity, that amongst tramps of all countries is astonishing. At Marseilles, where the tramps of many nations—including Mr. Franck—forgathered, when a man had the rare luck—for the times were cruel—to earn a franc or two, he, however hungry he might be, invariably shared it with his fellows.

More than one man sold the only shirt he owned to feed a new arrival who was an absolute stranger to all. These men won no praise for their benefactions; they expected none, and would have opened their eyes in wonder if they had been told that they had done anything worthy of praise.

German tramps are the most ubiquitous, incorrigible, and unconscionable; but the most interesting and successful of all the legion of tramps encountered by Mr. Franck was a Frenchman, François. He was a man of no education and of no ability, but of a distressed and distressing appearance, and clothed always in a cloak, which itself made an irresistible appeal to the charitable in Cairo, where François for twenty years plied his trade. He had cards on which were printed in twenty different languages, "I am ill and in misery. Please help me." But, as he could speak only French, he pretended to be a deaf mute when he handed a card to a tourist of any other nationality. But the strangest thing about François was his mode of disposal of the really large sums he contrived to extract from Cairo tourists. He himself neither drank nor smoked, nor fared sumptuously, since he wished to save every possible penny to send costly souvenirs home to his relatives in Paris! "Only once in twenty-three years had François visited these Paris relatives, but few were the cities of all Europe the arts and manufactures of which were not represented in their household. As a supplement to his gifts there came semi-annually a letter from François announcing some new success in his career as a travelling salesman." What a hero for a story by Stevenson! It is worth noting that it was his three years' service as a conscript that weaned François from work and infected him with the tramp's foot-and-mouth disease of walking and begging.

Mr. Franck's eastern experiences are perhaps the most interesting of all, especially his adventures in the Holy Land. The following story recalls Disraeli's sarcasm upon the Christian hatred of the Jew—"though one half the Christian world worships a Jew and the other half a Jewess!" In Nazareth Mr. Franck stayed with an Arab gentleman who seemed resolved that one at least of his children should be saved, since he distributed them impartially amongst the competing Christian mission schools of that town. Three, therefore, were Protestants, two were Catholics, and one was an orthodox Greek Church Christian. All, however, showed a profound reverence for every spot reminiscent of Jesus—Mary's well, Joseph's workshop, etc., etc. On returning from showing these hallowed spots to Mr. Franck they halted to point out with abhorrence a certain accursed house: "This, sir, is the house of the only Jew, thank God, who still dwells in Nazareth!" What strikes you most in Mr. Franck personally is the caprice of his senses. He suffers such excruciating anguish from a bad barrel organ that you would expect him to "die of a rose in aromatic pain;" yet he endures such filth and stench, such lazar-house horrors of leprous infection and loathsome companionship as it almost turns you sick even to read of.

We waked long ago from the nightmare of the Crimean War and can wonder now how we could ever have believed in it, and we are slowly waking from that of the Boer War. Even if these wars themselves were not frightful blunders, how frightful were the blunders we committed in them is suggested by two sad and almost heart-sickening biographies, that of "Sir John McNeill" (2) and that of "General Gatacre" (3). The sadder of the two is the really admirable memoir, admirable in tone and temper as well as in style, in which the widow of General Gatacre records his many and great services to his country, and his final failure:—

> The painful warrior, famoused for fight,
> After a thousand victories once foiled,
> Is from the books of honour razed quite,
> And all the rest forgot for which he toiled.

Well, not quite; since on his recall from South Africa every one from Royalty down did what they could to console the General for his failure. But it was failure—of generalship only. As Lord Roberts himself wrote to the General whom he felt compelled to supersede, "This action, which I felt it my duty to take, casts no slur whatever upon your honour, your personal courage, your energy, and zeal, which are beyond all question." And, after all, blunders in generalship are rather the rule than the exception, as Wellington suggested in saying "the greatest general is the man who makes the fewest blunders." But the blunders in the Crimea which cost the lives and wrecked the health and almost ruined the moral of so many thousand brave men! Even at this distant date it is almost sickening to read about them, and of the little thanks Sir John McNeill received for, or rather the deep offence he gave by, his official exposure of them. The Queen and Prince Consort especially, who regarded the Army as though it was in their domestic service, were enraged, but Sir John bore it all with a Spartan stoicism. His was a fine character, and his grand-daughter does justice and no more than justice to it in this excellent biography. By the way, I am glad that the biographer has been at the trouble to contradict thus the impudent claim of Mrs. Eddy to be Sir John's great grand-daughter:—"Mrs. Eddy is said to have been born on July 16, 1821; Sir John McNeill was born on August 12, 1795. His only married grandchild is the compiler of this memoir, and Mrs. Eddy is certainly not her daughter."

Mr. Frankfort Moore is not at his best in "The Laird of Craig Athol" (4), the story of the chivalrous search of an uncle for the true heir, a nephew, who will, if found, dispossess him of the estate. Two claimants appear, and the practised novel-reader decides at once, and rightly, that the true Amphitryon is the one loved by the heroine. It is an interesting story, of course, as being by Mr. Frankfort Moore, but not in the best vein of this brilliant and versatile writer. Mr. Holt-White's "Helen of All Time" (5), a reincarnation of the fatal lady whose will, I fear, strike the reader as a rather rank and vulgar impostor, while her pathetic music-hall adventures do not efface the impression. Andrew Soutar's "The Chosen of the Gods" (6), on the other hand, is as convincing as it is thrilling. A young Indian is distracted between his mission as chosen of the gods to free India and his friendship for a white man and his love for a white woman. Then come a series of plots and counter-plots to gain and regain the possession of certain momentous documents which hold you breathless with interest till the dramatic close of this stirring story.

> Face launched a thousand ships
> And burnt the topless towers of Ilium,

The adoption by Japan during the last half century of an alien civilisation has aroused both wonder and regret in the Occidental mind. But this wonder and regret are somewhat lessened by the realisation that a thousand or so years ago practically the same phenomenon occurred in the land of the Rising Sun. "The Story of Old Japan" (Chapman and Hall. 6s.), told with such fervour and spirit by Mr. Joseph Longford, late Consul at Nagasaki, shows how the Empress Jingo brought back with her from Korea some perception of a higher civilisation than that she had hitherto known, and that gradually the religious, political, social, scientific ideals of China were absorbed by Japan, which seems to make a point of living by eating the hearts of other people. It is this wonderful assimilative power which has made Japan a world-power today, and which enabled it to turn almost in a day from murder and assassination, in the most approved Oriental fashion, to the clemency extended to the beaten vassals on the triumph of the Imperial cause in 1868. The story is singularly like our own—the struggle against feudalism, the more or less varying power of the Emperors, the standing of the great families. But it is told with a wealth of legend and anecdote, and with the simplicity of real knowledge which make "Old Japan" easy and delightful reading.

Among Mr. Edwin Arnold's announcements for the autumn is "The Autobiography and Life of Father Tyrrell," by Miss Maud Petre. Incidentally, it will give some account of what is generally known as the "modernist" movement, but the chief aim of the writer will be to describe the part which Father Tyrrell himself played in this movement, and the successive steps of his mental development as he brought his scholastic training to bear on the modern problems that confronted him. Mr. Arnold will also publish in the autumn a biography of the late Mr. H. O. Arnold-Forster, a volume of reminiscences by Admiral Victor Montagu, and Sir Lewis Michell's "Life of Cecil Rhodes." Sir Lewis Michell, who is an executor of Mr. Rhodes's will and a trustee of the Rhodes estate, has been engaged upon this work for the past five years.

An English version of the "Life of the Duc de Morny," by Frédéric Loliée, the well-known chronicler of the Second Empire, is announced for immediate publication by Mr. John Long. The work in French has met with much success, and the English version of it has been prepared by Mr. Bryan O'Donnell, who has translated several of Loliée's works, including "The Life of an Empress" and "The Gilded Beauties of the Second Empire." In fiction Mr. John Long announces several new books, including "A Border Scourge," by Bertram Mitford, and "The Tender Passion," by M. E. Francis.

Messrs. Longmans, Green and Co. have in preparation a work entitled "King Edward VII. as a Sportsman," which was commenced some time ago with the cordial permission of his late Majesty, who specially commanded Lord Marcus Beresford to assist the editor, Mr. Alfred T. Watson, with information in regard to the breeding and racing stud. Captain the Hon. Sir Seymour Fortescue, R.N., will contribute an introductory chapter on King Edward's general characteristics as a sportsman, and will also write a chapter on the late King's yachts and the races in which they have competed. Lord Ribblesdale, a former master of the buckhounds, has undertaken the chapter relating to hunting. King George has confirmed the permission for the publication of the volume, which will be fully illustrated.

Sir Harry Johnston's new work, "The Negro in the New World," which Messrs. Methuen will have ready this week, embodies his studies of the colour question in all its branches during recent journeys in the United States, the West Indies, and tropical America. "A capital book, wholesome and sound," is the verdict of Mr. Roosevelt, who has read it while it has been going through the press. It will be copiously illustrated from photographs and drawings.

"The High-Roads of the Alps: A Motoring Guide to One Hundred Mountain Passes," is the title of a new work by Mr. C. L. Freeston, which will shortly be published by Messrs. Kegan Paul, Trench, Trübner and Co. The book deals with the Alpine highways of France, Switzerland, Italy, and Tyrol, strictly from the car-driver's point of view, and gives fullest particulars as to surfaces, gradients, and "hairpin" corners. The illustrations number over a hundred, and include several specially-drawn maps.

ART.

AUTRE TEMPS, AUTRES MŒURS.

THE Victorian era was fortunate in its recorders—that is from an Edwardian point of view. For beneath their exaggerations there is a unanimity of expression about Leech, Dickens, Du Maurier and others which convinces of the truth and nothing but the truth. In the recoil from the licentiousness of the old Georgianism, middle-class ideals never found vent to more effect than in Queen Victoria's reign. It was, perhaps, as much their very emphasis as the genius of the recording artists, which was the cause of the clear impressions we now possess of them. And whereas Leech is irrevocably associated with crinolines and the blushing beauty of Trollope's day, so Du Maurier stands for a period which marked the rise of the Kensingtons and the modern combination of wealth and fads.

The exhibition of Du Maurier's work at the Leicester Galleries is somewhat disconcerting evidence of the amount of water that has flowed under the bridge in the last twenty or thirty years. For although society has exchanged old fads for new, though it makes for social rather than æsthetic problems, and though Philistinism is presumed to be dead and done with, and we are all hard at work giving full vent to our own "ego," yet, notwithstanding, enormous changes have come over it. Postlethwaite, who negatives the invitation of a jocular friend to "take a dip in the briny" on the ground that he always sees himself so dreadfully foreshortened in the water, is an all-time creation; but the "nouveau riche" who served Du Maurier so well in the person of Sir Gorgius Midas or Mrs. Howard Talbot de Ponsonby Jones is to-day not only one of ourselves, but we all compete for his top doorstep in our anxiety to be the first to congratulate him upon his new peerage. The almost total absence of the American, too, in Du Maurier's drawings accounts still further for his point of view that the "nouveau riche" was still a freak, a phenomenon, instead of the integral part of society, upon whom alone we can now rely to provide us with quails and a dependable brand of champagne as a matter of course. The Suffragist, again, has exchanged her spectacles, middle age, and spinsterdom for a sort of boyish womanliness which bakes cakes and condemns the Government with equal ostentation, and the well-prepared compliments beloved of Victorianism are hopelessly out of date.

Du Maurier's version of the fads of his day, on the other hand, supplies the touch that links his age with ours. The inimitable "Shall we—a—sit down?" "I should like to, but my dressmaker says I mustn't" would apply to-day with no adaptation whatsoever. The Fair Intense One who says of the Old Masters at Burlington House that they are really "quite too TOO" may be found by the score at the Academy or elsewhere; while the curate's egg has become so historic and applicable to all curates that it is difficult to remember Du Maurier's share in the joke.

As a draughtsman Du Maurier ranks with his great predecessors on Punch; as a caricaturist of the realistic rather than the conventional type he has no equal; it is, however, as a recorder of a period that he will survive, as a historian of minds and manners which are often too elusive to hold their own against the solidity of events.

* * * * * *

The art of miniature painting is almost as conventional as Italian opera. In Figaro, for instance, the singer has only to cover his face with a mantle and the whole stage becomes oblivious of his very obvious presence. Apply this convention to modern realism, and its absurdities become too patent even for convention. In the same way a miniature of pink cheeks, powdered or golden hair, and of patches is a very charming thing because of its very artificiality. Applied—as is the case with some of the exhibits in Pall Mall of the Royal Society of Miniature Painters—to a charwoman its attraction ceases, and it becomes absurd. It seems to be the mania of the present day to apply the various art conventions to the purpose for which they were never intended. A miniature is miniature, so that you can wear it round your neck or next to your heart, as the case may be. It is intended primarily for a personal form of ornament, and ornament is nearly everything but realism. It is not surprising that from sheer failure to recognise its own scope the present exhibition should be found wanting. Ineffectiveness rather than inferiority is its note. Personality has given place to mere stagey representations, such as that of Mme. Clara Butt by Miss Bess Norris, or realistic portraits such as "The Pensioner," by Miss Vera Crichton Smith. The truth is a miniature cannot be pretty enough, and when it is not pretty its raison d'être ceases to exist. I noticed some interesting subjects at the exhibition, amongst which are Mrs. Nicholas Longworth, by Mr. Alyn Williams, Mr. Lloyd George, by Mr. Chris. Adams—this last quite one of the best of the male portraits—while America is still further represented by Mr. President Taft, also by Mr. Williams.

* * * * * *

A somewhat miscellaneous collection of Chinese and Persian objets d'art may be seen at Mr. Paterson's Bond Street gallery. With the exception of some Persian miniatures there may be found here only echoes of various big exhibitions now taking place. Thus a Han vase finds its prototype in the Burlington Fine Arts Club Exhibition, while some Chinese kakemonos—"A Court Lady Holding a Sword," "Two Ducks and Branches of Peach Blossom"—recall the British Museum Exhibition. The chief interest of the exhibition is to compare the Persian work with the Chinese of the same period. In China exists a fully developed art; in Persia up to the sixteenth and seventeenth century art is decorative rather than pictorial. The Persian—as might a very youthful draughtsman—prefers to draw his Royal personages in profile; you would never be greatly surprised to see two eyes attributed to the same profile; he has the greatest possible difficulty in making them sit down, and indeed ends in a sort of compromise, in which the Royal personage only just touches the ground. The decorations round the miniatures, on the other hand, are graceful and without the stiffness that is usually connected with archaic art. Most fully developed are some Persian wine cups with a beautiful metallic lustre, while a large vase, decorated in turquoise blue and with a fine green glaze, is attributed to the tenth or eleventh century.

MUSIC.

SCRUTINY of the figures as to the various operas performed during the past season at Covent Garden suggests once more how potent is the prima donna. Why, for instance, does "La Traviata" head the list with seven performances? Certainly not because it is the most popular opera in the repertory, but simply because it is one which specially commends itself to Melba and Tetrazzini. In the same way may doubtless be explained the good showing made by "Il Barbiere" (six performances) and "Lakmé" (five). "La Bohème" (six), "Samson et Dalila" (six), "Madama Butterfly" (five), "Aïda" (five), and "Faust" (five), were, on the other hand, probably drawing cards on their own account. As regards other works "Louise" got four performances, "Pelléas et Mélisande" three, several others two, and "Otello" only one. "Otello" one and "Traviata" seven! It is really comic.

The Bill introduced by Mr. Buxton last week "to amend and consolidate the law relating to copyright" will be generally approved—save by those muddle-headed folk who in their zeal for the public interest cannot recognise the rights of the individual at all. Copyright is a thorny subject. The existing law on the matter is in a state of unexampled complexity and confusion, being deducible only from over a score of different acts dating from different periods and often of the most obscure and conflicting character. "Amendment and consolidation" are wanted here indeed. More than thirty years ago the Royal Copyright Commission of 1878 reported:

> The existing law is wholly destitute of any sort of arrangement, incomplete, often obscure, and even when it is intelligible upon long study, it is in many parts so ill-expressed that no one who does not give much study to it can expect to understand it.

Since then Bill after Bill has been introduced with the object of bettering matters, of which some have been passed but more abandoned; committees and commissions without end have sat and reported, but little or nothing of the smallest practical value has hitherto been achieved. It is sincerely to be hoped that this attempt may succeed, for the Bill as far as it goes contains many excellent proposals. But the omens are certainly not too auspicious. There is, however, hope for the present Bill in so far as it is required for the purpose of ratification of the recent Berlin Convention, and as the various colonial interests involved have been duly consulted, it is just on the cards that the measure may go through.

An interesting event of the autumn season will be the production of Elgar's new violin concerto, which has been secured by the Philharmonic Society for its opening concert on November 10, when Herr Kreisler will be the soloist and Sir Edward himself the conductor. Sir Edward has been engaged on the work for a long time, and there is warrant for hoping great things of it, since he has always shown a peculiar gift for writing for strings. It will not be forgotten, moreover, that he himself began as a violinist, as did another of our leading composers, Sir Alexander Mackenzie.

Two interesting pieces of news come from Berlin. One is to the effect that the Kaiser has sold the existing Royal Opera House to the municipality for a price said to be in the neighbourhood of £200,000. The building will, it is stated, be used in future as a concert hall and place for municipal entertainments, while a new opera house will be built in the Thiergarten. Berlin has long been dissatisfied with its existing principal opera house, which is not worthy, either internally or externally, of the capital of Germany.

The other report referred to states that Berlin is shortly to lose Dr. Strauss, who, we are told, has expressed the intention of retiring from his position as chief musical director at the Royal Opera. A desire for greater leisure and independence on the composer's part is assigned as the cause. Similar reports have often been circulated before in regard to Strauss. It is well known, indeed, that his idea is to amass a sufficient fortune to enable him to retire as soon as possible, with the object of devoting himself exclusively to composition. But what amount of truth there may be in the present report I do not know.

Some one has been carrying out a test once again with a view to proving that in respect of tone old violins, or rather in this case old 'cellos, are no better than modern ones. Distinguished executants played behind screens and listeners were invited to give marks for the results without knowing which instruments were being used, and in the result, we are told, the modern 'cellos won hands down. In a previous test of the same kind applied to violins, the result, if I am not mistaken, was just the opposite—the older instruments in that case being accorded the palm. This fact alone is sufficient to indicate that such tests, though interesting, can never be conclusive—for there is certainly no reason why old 'cellos should differ in this respect from old fiddles.

A good deal of nonsense is indeed often talked on this subject. The notion that the tone of all old instruments is necessarily superior to that of modern ones is certainly erroneous, and no formal tests are necessary to prove this. On the other hand, there is one consideration which is sometimes overlooked in this connection, and in respect of which no auditory test would afford any help. While the tone of a modern violin may be just as good as that of an old one, the latter may none the less be much easier to play on. Although the hearer may detect no difference, the performer will perceive it readily enough. It is not only their beauty of tone, but also their exceptional responsiveness which distinguishes usually a fine Stradivari or Guarnerius. On the other hand, some at least of the finest "Strads" are not particularly easy to play on, though their tone itself may be of the best.

A confrère, I notice, has got himself into hot water by venturing to criticise "Die Fledermaus." He has my hearty sympathy. A more tedious work it would be hard to find nowadays. For sheer ineptitude its book has never been surpassed, and if Strauss's music appeals still to some I am not of the company. The greater part of it seems to me hopelessly vulgar and banal. Certainly the work as a whole is an infliction of the worst kind, and how it could ever have attained such amazing popularity is one of the minor mysteries of musical history. But it is astonishing how people will persuade themselves that they are amused by a work when told that they ought to be. At the recent performances it was pathetic to notice the forced laughter at the inane humours of what it is the correct thing to call "Strauss's masterpiece."

From a correspondent: "I have just ordered Purcell's 'Evening Hymn' at our local music shop. The assistant in taking the order said, 'Half a moment, I believe we have a volume of Purcell's 'Evening Hymns' [!] He evidently confounded our only classic with 'Moody and Sankey.'"

THE THEATRES.

A Day at Stratford-on-Avon.

THERE are many worse places in which to spend a day than Stratford-on-Avon, and so when I wandered down there last week to be present at the first night of a new play I made a day of it. A very pleasant preliminary to spending the evening is loafing up the river in a canoe, while if you do not know the place you can wander round the sights in company with hordes of Shakespeare-worshipping Transatlantic visitors. The river, though, has greater charms for me than gaping at Ann Hathaway's cottage and Marie Corelli's mansion, much though I love the quaint old town, with its brick and timber houses. For all practical purposes Stratford is an American town at this time of year. You hardly hear a word of English spoken. Every hotel is crammed with visitors hailing from all parts of the great American continent, and that is why it was so singularly fortunate that the production of the prize play, "The Piper," should have been unavoidably postponed from May to July. I call it fortunate because the winner being an American woman, she thus had a noble and sympathetic army of her compatriots to rally round her. In case you do not remember about this prize play, I may mention that the organisers of the Memorial Theatre some time since offered a prize of £300 for a new play, and out of over three hundred sent in, "The Piper," by Miss Josephine Preston Peabody (Mrs. Lionel Marks), was adjudged the best. So an American lady has scored off all British dramatists of the "superior" sex, and the American Eagle is flapping its wings triumphantly by the Avon.

The Memorial Theatre at Stratford-on-Avon is a weird and outlandish architectural pile. To me it is singularly hideous and ill-constructed, but its position on the banks of the river must be almost unique, and it is a delightful experience between the acts to be able to smoke your cigarette by the Avon and stroll round the lawns which make so fascinating a foyer. On a fine summer's night it is all so still and peaceful, and the church round the historic bend of the stream is in such perfect harmony that it is with reluctant feet that you turn back into the ugly theatre even to witness a prize play. As to "The Piper" itself—well, I rather agree with a gentleman from Chicago with whom I made acquaintance. "It's all very nice and very pretty and very charming," he said, "and I don't see why any one should criticise it. Why not just let it go at that?" Well, it is very pretty, and Mr. Benson has staged it charmingly; moreover, the swarms of children who take part in it are "just sweet." I admit this, though I am never enamoured of children on the stage. I would far rather that they were in bed instead of being kept up until eleven o'clock at night learning to be self-conscious, but if you have a play dealing with the old Pied Piper of Hamelin legend you must have a swarm of children to be lured away by the fantastic piper. It is this legend which Mrs. Marks has made into a play. In the first act Mr. Benson carries off the infants to punish the burghers of Hamelin for their rapacity and faithlessness when they refuse him his thousand guilders for clearing their town of its plague of rats. In the last act he brings the children all back again safe and sound. Thus you will see that in its main lines the plot strongly resembles the story of the famous duke who marched his men up a hill and then marched them down again.

Mr. Benson throws himself heart and soul into the character of the piper, and Mr. Christopher Wilson's music which he seems to play is exquisite; but, then, Mr. Wilson is an accomplished musician, as all who have heard the delightful music he has arranged for some of Mr. Oscar Asche's productions must know. There is a very delightful mediæval spirit about the whole production, too, but, to be frank, when Mrs. Marks gets away from the old legend and draws on her own imagination the play falls off lamentably. In the intermediate acts she turns her piper round from being a fantastic, wronged creature, who steals the children in order to humble the faithless burghers, into a pathetic children lover—a virtuoso—a collector of infants, in order that he may lavish his love upon them. He stores them up in a "Hollow Hill," where we see him having a sort of Peter Pan revels with them, and not all the passionate pleading of Miss Marion Terry, who plays the wife of Kurt the syndic, touches his heart sufficiently to prevail upon him to return to her the little crippled son for whom she lives. He professes to be teaching the people of Hamelin that children are worth more than gold, but he sees a woman dying of grief for the loss of her little one, and yet will not give it up. I am sure Mrs. Marks is desperately sincere in preaching the love of children, but she goes about it in an odd way. The piper's next proceeding is to plead eloquently, before a wayside crucifix, that he may be allowed to keep the children, but the "lonely man" (in each act there is a crucifix alluded to as the lonely man) vouchsafing no reply, he decides in agony of soul to restore the children, and this he does in the last act, just in time to save Miss Marion Terry from dying of grief. Then he refuses the thousand guilders which the reformed and repentant burghers are now ready to thrust upon him, and goes on his way piping. I was not much impressed by the interpolated story of the love of Michael the sword eater for Barbara, the Bürgermeister's daughter. Though excellently played by Mr. Eric Maxon and Miss Violet Farebrother, it was a little too reminiscent of a "Midsummer Night's Dream," but, then, the authoress is a devout worshipper of Shakespeare, and avowedly intended her play as tribute.

Altogether the occasion was a great one, and I am sure our American friends felt that they were making dramatic history. They applauded their fair countrywoman when at the fall of the curtain she appeared and made a speech as though she were the premier dramatist of the universe. I meanwhile mildly wondered what the rejected 299 plays were like if this was the pick of the bunch, and felt sorry for the reading committee. The presentation ceremony with which this memorable evening ended was suitably impressive. Mayors and bigwigs crowded the stage, and in a handsome silver casket the authoress was presented with the tangible reward of her efforts, while what I believe are called "floral tributes" were handed up from the orchestra until the stage was like a flower garden. Now I am wondering what will happen to "The Piper." Will he pipe in America or London? I heard a report that Mr. Belasco had acquired him for New York. Perhaps Mr. Benson will bring him to town, or try him on a less partial audience. I shall be very interested to see what happens if he does.

RACING NOTES.

IT is earnestly to be hoped that the Stewards of the Jockey Club will propose a rule at one of the October meetings prohibiting the starting of any horse for a race until it has received a name. Very great inconvenience is occasioned by the slovenly custom of running unnamed horses, which appears to be considerably on the increase. It would be better still to require the name to be registered before an animal is entered for any stake, excepting any such event as the Derby, Oaks, St. Leger, and other races which close before the yearling sales of the season are over. In this case the names of yearlings should be registered within not more than a month after the Doncaster September Meeting.

There are 364 entries for the Derby of 1912, as against 370 for next year's race. Twenty-seven entries have been made in New York, and a considerable number of French yearlings have been engaged. Sir John Robinson is the largest subscriber, as he has entered twelve of the Worksop Manor yearlings, which will be sold at Doncaster. Mr. Whitney has entered ten yearlings, all bred in the United States. His Majesty heads the list with five of the Sandringham yearlings, including a colt by Thrush out of Laodamia. Mr. H. Cholmondeley has entered nine of the Sledmere yearlings, which will be sold at Doncaster. For the Oaks of 1912 there are 269 entries (including twelve made in New York), as compared with 273 for next year. The King has engaged three fillies, one being a daughter of Flying Fox and April Princess.

Greenback is said to be coughing, and even if the attack is a slight one, it will probably settle his St. Leger chance. Greenback had nice engagements at York and at Derby, but he is not now likely to be seen out before Doncaster. It will be a great misfortune if the colt has really gone wrong, as he appeared to stand an excellent chance of winning the St. Leger, and his absence from the field would considerably diminish the public interest in the race. I am now disposed to fancy that either Charles O'Malley or Swynford will win the St. Leger.

Cyllene now heads the list of winning sires, and the gains of Lemberg and Cellini at Sandown Park have placed him many thousands ahead of St. Frusquin, who does not appear likely to regain the first place. William the Third comes third, and he is followed by Marco and Desmond, who is the last of the sires whose stock have won upwards of £10,000. These are followed by Persimmon and Bay Ronald, sire of Bayardo. Of these seven horses, two are dead, and one (Cyllene) is in South America. It is an immense pity that Cyllene was sold to go abroad. It now appears that the Galopin and St. Simon family are likely to hold a very strong position at the end of the season.

It cannot be truly asserted that Lemberg is bred to stay, and Cyllene's stock have not so far been conspicuous for stamina. He has not yet sired either a St. Leger or an Ascot Cup winner. Cyllene himself won the Gold Cup, but he had nothing to beat, and Lord Edward II., who finished a very bad second, was a mere handicap horse, and one of exceedingly moderate quality. Lemberg descends from Bend Or through Cyllene's sire, and the Duke of Westminster's horse was certainly not a stayer. Marco, the sire of Neil Gow, himself a son of Barcaldine, was really a very much better stayer than he was generally considered to be; but the produce of his dam have decidedly lacked stamina, and as a rule they have failed to train on. Greenback is bred to stay, and Charles O'Malley showed at Ascot that he is well endowed with stamina. Both these colts are grandsons of St. Simon.

Only twenty-five horses have been engaged in the Great Ebor Handicap of £1,000, which is a very much smaller entry for the race than was formerly obtained when there was merely a sweepstakes, with £100 added. The Great Ebor was then one of the most important of the second-class handicaps of the season, and it was a heavy betting race, but now there is no genuine speculation until the day. The best of the older horses are Rathlea, Mirador, Royal Realm, St. Victrix, King's Champion, and Lagos. There are only five three-year-olds in the entry, including Apache and Cardinal Beaufort. The weights are to be published on Thursday, the 11th.

I read a long article on "Goodwood, Past and Present," in a daily paper last week, which was remarkable in that it contained no reference whatever to Lord George Bentinck, to whom the Goodwood Meeting is very much more indebted than to any one else. Goodwood races were established about a century ago by the third Duke of Richmond, and replaced the quasi-private meeting which was then held in Lord Egremont's park at Petworth, and which he had decided to give up. Goodwood has been sadly vulgarised by the new "palatial" buildings which were erected a few years ago by the present Duke of Richmond, and he cannot have found the speculation a remunerative one. Quite as many people (if not more) went to the races in the time of the old stands, and the Duke's expenditure (recently stated to have been about £50,000) was perfectly useless, the only result having been that some of the peculiar and most attractive features of the Goodwood Meeting have disappeared.

I predicted that Pietri would win the Richmond Stakes, but it was a disappointment that Cellini was not included in the field. I hear that Mr. Neumann's colt will not run again until Doncaster. The performance of Pietri justified the opinion expressed in Truth (when Mr. de Rothschild's colt was being denounced as an impostor) that he would retrieve his reputation as soon as he was really fit and well. It was said that there was no great merit in Pietri's defeat of Nerestan, because that colt had afterwards been again beaten, but it does not appear to have been generally known that when Nerestan was beaten by the Meadow Chat colt he got off very badly, so the performance ought not to be seriously regarded. I was also right in anticipating the success of St. Nat in the Lavant Stakes, and he found no difficulty in defeating Sunstar and Night Rider. It was thought that St. Nat is not, after all, so very smart, because he had beaten Minehead by only a head at Hurst Park, but, as was pointed out last week in Truth, Mr. S. Joel's colt "really had a good deal in hand." Sunstar was a great "sharps' tip" for the Lavant Stakes, but he had no chance with St. Nat at the finish, after having looked "all over" the winner. I predicted that the rich Prince of Wales' Sweepstakes would be a match between Pietri and Wrinkler, but Mr. de Rothschild started St. Anton, and the Duke of Portland's colt just won from Lycaon, who was not backed. It is clear that Wrinkler is not so smart as many people supposed. Persephone was a hot favourite for the Rous Memorial Stakes, but she was just beaten by Lindoiya. Lord Derby's filly is not yet at her best, and she ought to be "thrown up" for a few weeks. Lord Derby should keep her for the Middle Park Plate.

There was a rush on Delirium for the Stewards' Cup when betting began in real earnest, and Lady Vista and Poor Boy were both very heavily backed, but speculation was on a paltry scale as compared with some former years. Malheur, who had been an early tip, was evidently not fancied by his stable. There was a good start, but Delirium began slowly, and he was never fairly in the race. Golden Rod, who always held a good place, won very cleverly from Poor Boy, with Lady Vista and Spanish Prince (a great fancy at the finish) close up. It was a fine race, and it was satisfactory to see it won by a horse fairly weighted up to his best form. Perdiccas was the great Newmarket tip at the finish, and Lord Rosebery's horse was strongly fancied there, it being thought a certainty that he would beat Delirium and Poor Boy.

Writing a fortnight ago, I gave a plumper for Queen's Journal for the Goodwood Plate, and Lord Derby's mare won that race, having started at the generous odds of 5 to 1. If there had been a lot of mysterious cackle about Queen's Journal having done well in a private gallop she would no doubt have started a hot favourite. The mare, however, had only run an unexceptionable public trial when she won the Summer Handicap at the Newmarket Second July Meeting with the most extreme ease, and this was not good enough for the public to follow! It is certainly not creditable to the handicappers that an animal should carry a penalty of 14 lbs. and yet win the race, but Queen's Journal had been contemptuously pitched into this handicap with a perfectly absurd weight, considering her creditable public form. Lord Derby's mare, however, is no flier, as it was all she could do to beat Declare with 20 lbs. the best of the weights.

I had predicted that Master Hopson would win the Stewards' Cup, but he did not start for that race. On Wednesday, however, Master Hopson was brought out for the Singleton Plate, and he won easily from Retrenchment, who started favourite, and to whom the Arundel horse was giving 27 lbs. The stable made a great mistake in not starting Master Hopson for the Stewards' Cup, in which his weight was only 8 st 2 lbs. There has been much hare-brained howling over Bayardo's defeat in the Cup. The Manton horse was beaten simply because he could not give the weight (36 lb.) to Magic over this severe course. Bayardo's merits as a racer have been extravagantly overrated of late, but he certainly was not "disgraced" by being beaten for the Goodwood Cup under such conditions.

There will be racing next week at Nottingham, Kempton Park, Redcar, Ayr, and Windsor. The £500 stake for two-year-olds at Nottingham should be won by Oliver Goldsmith or St. Nat. There were sixty-one acceptances for the International Plate of £800 at Kempton Park, and Seaforth will win if he runs. The list includes Night Rider, Mary Carmichael, Canvas Back, Prince Palatine (the Sandown failure), the Dame d'Or colt, and the Lady Frivoles filly. The St. James's Stakes of £1,500 is a three-year-old race, with twenty-seven acceptances out of an original entry of 117. Sunder has 22 lbs. allowed, and his advantage in the weights may win him the race, although the course is too far for him. There are eighty-two entries for the Redcar Stakes of £500, which is the principal two-year-old race at Redcar, and Meleager may win. The Great National Breeders' Foal Stakes of £500 has sixty-six entries, and Ulster King may win. This race is really converted into a handicap by an elaborate arrangement of penalties and allowances.

Several horses which have recently been running badly are expected to improve prodigiously on their summer form during the autumn; two such animals are already strong tips for the Cambridgeshire. There appears to have been an unusually large number of horses out which were running with a view to favourable handicapping later on in the season. In the old days, when great stakes could be won over certain races, horses were "steadied" on carefully studied plans, and the process was a slow one, as care and dexterity were necessary in order to bamboozle the betting public and to throw dust in the eyes of the handicappers. The most successful device was to run a smart horse out of its course a few times. An immense coup was brought off over a certain Cambridgeshire through the winner having been "let in" at an absurd weight because he had been badly beaten in three or four T.Y.C. scrambles.

Very few English horses have been entered for the Prix du Conseil Municipal, which race is run at Longchamps on October 9, being the Sunday before the Cesarewitch. The pick of the three-year-olds are Charles O'Malley, Apache, and Admiral Hawke. The best of the older horses is Bachelor's Double. One of Baron Ed. de Rothschild's lot is Perola. This race is converted into a quasi-handicap by an elaborate arrangement of penalties and allowances. It is strange that there is not a very much larger entry of English horses, as the sweepstakes goes to the winner, as well as the £4,000 of added money, and an owner can "get out" for £4 by declaring forfeit five days before the race is run. M. Edmond Blanc has engaged Imprénable, Marsa, and Assouan II.

TENNIS—ROWING—POLO.

Amateur lawn tennis and amateur rowing are distinguished from other sports by the absence of the professional trainer or instructor. In Rugby football the professional trainer is not unknown. In cricket, golf, tennis, and racquets the average player depends on the professional for his instruction. In each of these games the actual physical services of the instructor are necessary. In amateur rowing the coach need no longer row. He teaches without pulling a course. And so one finds the veteran oarsman is always willing to lend his services as a coach. But in lawn tennis the professional teacher is wanting. There is no one to whom the young player can go and get instruction or practice in developing his game. If he has time he enters for tournaments, and unless he has a very strong individuality his play gets stereotyped. He plays to his handicap or the score; he is afraid to develop his game; he dare not take risks as he would in practice if he could get it. In cricket clubs the groundman is the professional bowler. He may not be a first-class cricketer, but he generally has a few wrinkles to give. In lawn tennis the groundman looks after the courts. He has plenty to do in keeping the grass in order. The finances of the majority of lawn tennis clubs are not sufficient to pay a professional or to encourage any men to take up the game as a means of livelihood. Wherefore the average play of suburban clubs is stereotyped, and to such an extent that the players are fearful of innovations. As an instance, in a certain club tournament it was pointed out to a player in the men's doubles that one of his opponents would be badly cramped if he and his partner adopted the American formation. But he refused to do so for fear that the spectators would laugh him out of court, and consider that he was not showing good form. That attitude is typical of the way in which the suburban player regards the game.

There were only two competitors for the Wingfield Sculls, rowed over the Championship Course from Putney to Mortlake last week. This race is open to gentlemen scullers of the United Kingdom and Ireland. The door is slammed on Colonials, which is shocking. The Wingfield Sculls are impervious to Imperial sentiment. This was the seventieth anniversary of the race. There was a fair tide and no wind at the start. Kinnear, who weighs 12 st. 10 lb., at once went away with the lead from Bourne, the Oxford stroke. From Chiswick steps there was a stiffish head breeze, through which Kinnear, who was never pressed, went beautifully. At Barnes Bridge Bourne quickened, and showed better form than he had done before, reaching out and keeping his feather low. He made up some leeway, but he was easily beaten by eight lengths. The winner has quickly followed up his success in the Diamonds. He swings well out to his work, gets a good beginning, and his finish is very clean. He has never been coached by a professional, but he has had the advantage of some coaching from Blackstaffe. His time, 23 min. 13 sec., has only been beaten four times, and having regard to the wind it was exceptionally fast. Bourne is not a pretty sculler, and he seems to have lost a good reach forward and a firm beginning which he once had.

Earlier in the week Kinnear had won the London Cup at the Metropolitan Regatta after a good race with Bourne. At this meeting Thames took five cups, and two boats sank. In the senior fours Thames and London collided in neutral water, and the London boat was damaged, the men getting on the launch and their boat being towed home. In the junior eights Thames were leading, one man caught a crab and put his foot through the boat, and so that crew and craft went home as London had done. To criticise Metropolitan rowing may be useless. But a veteran regrets that crews row too short a stroke. This was the style of the Thames four both this year and last year and of the Anglian crew in the Thames Cup. This old oarsman says the success of these crews is due not to their style, which is faulty, but to the fact that they were so thoroughly together that they could get the last ounce of work out of themselves. The winning Stewards four last year had been hard at work all the winter. The Anglian crew had been together for a couple of years. This togetherness from long association of oarsmen was the secret of the Belgians' success. With two crews equally together the English orthodox style would win every time. But those who write drivel about Leander commandeering oarsmen are the oracles on the style of rowing that is desirable. The false teachers flourish in rowing as in other circles. Quackery is always an easy winner, as it is always up on the public mount—credulity.

The other week I advised those who were so anxious to know what was being done with regard to the visit of our polo players to the United States to follow the Premier's advice to "Wait and see." The Hurlingham authorities have made their statement, and thus anticipated the Premier's announcement on the Conference. Captain Lloyd will take a team to America, and the list of eight players who will be asked to go with him has been published with an intimation that one or two others will be asked as well. The list consists of Captains Barrett, Cheape, Mathew-Lanmore, and Messrs. Buckmaster, Edwards, Palmes, and R. N. Grenfell. Wherefore those whose ambitions lie in criticism or team selection will have much time to make their voices heard. The ponies will sail about March 20, and it is hoped to play the matches by the end of May, so that the players can be home for the final of the Championship Cup at the end of June. Nine ponies have been bought. But the best ponies cannot be obtained until the end of the season, when it is hoped that eleven more will be secured. On the financial side £5,000 has been subscribed, and another £3,000 is necessary if a minimum of sixteen ponies are to be bought. Under these circumstances, there should be six weeks' practice in America for the players from which the team will be selected. Owners of first-class polo ponies, aged six years and over, who wish to sell outright, or to have the option of re-purchase, can communicate with Captain Lloyd, Tower Grove, Roehampton. Patriotism should provide the pence and the ponies within a short time.

The final of the £1,900 golf selling sweepstake at White's Club was won by Mr. Victor Maude, who beat Mr. Rann Grant by six up and five to play in a 36-holes match at Sunningdale. Now while Mr. Garden Smith would say this is not playing for a consideration, I must be equally careful to point out that neither winner nor loser was necessarily playing for a consideration. For it was a selling sweepstake, and as golfers never play for a consideration, the method and custom is as follows:—The names of the players are put up to auction, and the buyer of the winner takes the fund. So careful are golfers to keep their amateurism untainted that it is the custom for the buyer to give the player the option of paying half the purchase price. Indeed, the player has the right to buy, although there is no rule of the Royal and Ancient on the subject. Neither of these gentlemen may have exercised his right of purchase. They may not have had any interest in the sweep. It must not be assumed that either had a penny on the game. Whoever was the winner he played for no consideration. The receiver of the sweepstakes got, I suppose, an unearned increment, whether he played or whether he did not.

There was plenty of good cricket last week. There was actually a scene of enthusiasm at Leyton, and a subscription for the Essex professionals which produced the prodigious sum of £14. And the reason was the defeat of Kent after two fine innings by Gillingham. The Essex batsmen forced the game. The brothers Gibson and Freeman scored freely, and Trenton bowled brilliantly, being backed up by fine fielding. Smith's bowling for Surrey simply crumpled up Northampton. He did the hat trick in the second innings, and only missed it in the first innings owing to a misfield. He took a wicket next ball. In this match he bowled twenty-eight overs for 29 runs and 14 wickets. And Surrey have only just found him. I wonder he did not qualify for an old-age pension first. The Marlborough boys had not been beaten this year at cricket, but they met their Waterloo when they played Rugby at Lord's. Both sides played bright, free cricket on the first day when Rugby took a commanding lead, and ultimately led on the first innings by about 130 runs. Andrews scored a century for Rugby, who won by an innings and 7 runs, as the Marlborough boys failed to time Le Gros's fast bowling. He should do well if he does not over-bowl himself.

Sympathy and regret will be extended to the relatives and friends of Captain G. D. Simson on his death, when only twenty-eight, in India, from cholera. He was in the Indian Medical. From 1902-1907 he gained seventeen International Rugby caps for Scotland. He was a brilliant half, a strong individualist, and a fine defensive player, and he and Munroe were the finest pair of halves playing during the last decade.

MOTORS AND MOTORING.

TWO lawsuits, both likely to prove of considerable interest in motoring circles, may be expected to come on for hearing after the holidays. In the one case a well-known tyre company is bringing an action against an equally well-known firm of retail traders for inducing breach of contract on the part of the company's agents. The company in question require all their agents to undertake not to sell their tyres below a stipulated figure. The retail firm is one which has always refused to be bound by restrictions of this kind. The company, therefore, refuse to supply it with their tyres. Hence the firm has to get them elsewhere, and it gets them accordingly from some of the company's accredited agents. The latter, say the company, must obviously have gone back on their word and sold below the fixed price, since otherwise the retailer could not resell the tyres so cheaply as he does, and so they deduce breach of contract, and are proceeding against the retail firm as instigators thereof. The case will be watched with interest, but I cannot help fancying that the company will have some difficulty in making good their charge.

In the second case the same retail firm is bringing a suit against one of the leading trade journals for breach of contract in refusing to publish the firm's advertisements. The price-cutting question is at the bottom of this dispute, too. The firm advertises tyres by well-known makers at less than the current rates. This naturally offends the tyre companies concerned, and as they are also big advertisers in the same paper the situation arising is obviously a somewhat delicate one. The journal in question has met it by declining to continue the insertion of the retail firm's advertisements unless the offending announcements are omitted. The retailer, for reply, points to his contract, and insists on the paper fulfilling its obligations. The legal problem involved would seem to be again a very nice one, and it will be interesting to see the result.

The latest method of handicapping adopted at Brooklands has so much to recommend it that one wonders it was not tried before. Handicapping by past results is obviously better adapted to secure good races than the most elaborate calculations and allowances based on engine capacity and similar considerations. The latter system is, indeed, rather like handicapping competitors in foot races by the size of their legs. True, the big legs might be the swifter in such a case, but then they might not; and it is much the same with cars. The race is not always to the biggest engine. By going on accomplished facts the handicapper is on much firmer ground. I am writing necessarily before the event, and do not know, therefore, how the plan actually worked out; but it would certainly seem one which ought to produce better finishes than a good many which have been seen at Brooklands in the past.

I do not quite follow a well-known motoring authority who, discussing national characteristics in car design, claims accessibility as "a feature in which we undoubtedly excel." Certainly I doubt if most of the leading foreign makers would be prepared to admit any such thing. For many years past, now, accessibility has been recognised as an indispensable feature of good design, and it is the first time that I have ever seen it suggested that English designers have paid any more attention to the matter or produced any better results under this head than their foreign rivals. On the contrary, the best designed chassis in essential matters will almost invariably be found to be also the most accessible—doubtless, because the best brain power is applied in both cases.

The writer referred to not only lays stress on the superior accessibility of British cars, but goes further and explains the reason by reference to that "turn for mechanics" which, he says, "undoubtedly may be said to be more widespread in this country, without pretending that there is superiority in either land amongst the actual specialists." This seems very foggy reasoning. Our superior turn for mechanics, assuming it to exist, would seem to render less necessary particular attention being bestowed on accessibility which is usually demanded more particularly on behalf of the amateur who wants to be able to do everything with the minimum of trouble; and in any case since cars are usually designed, not by the laymen, but by the "specialists," who are admitted to be the same all round, it is difficult to see how our alleged "turn for mechanics" enters into the matter at all.

Evidently the Knight sliding sleeve has not exhausted the "valveless" principle, and it was only to be expected that the success of the former would stimulate invention on similar lines in other directions. A Renault valveless engine is talked of now, based on quite a different application of the same principle. In this case there is a cylindrical sleeve, but instead of moving up and down it rotates, thereby opening and closing the parts required for inlet and exhaust purposes, and it is claimed that considerable advantages are obtained in this way.

Mr. Kipling has come out in the guise of an inventor. His notion of pneumatic helmets, neck guards, and shoulder pads for aviators as set forth in last week's Car is quite an ingenious one. "Of course," he writes, "such a dress would be a hindrance to an airman's movements and would look like the Michelin tyre pictures, but when the fall came he would be cushioned a little bit against the full consequences of it. However, since men, quite rightly [!], would die sooner than look ridiculous, suppose one tried a modification of the fully inflated suit and merely used something to protect the neck, and spine, and head." It is to be doubted if much good would result save in the case of very mild falls, and most of the falls which have caused deaths in aviation so far have not been of this order.

Not for the first time protest has been made of late against the hideous advertisement boards proclaiming the existence of garages, tyre "stockists," and the like, which disfigure the landscape on the outskirts of so many country towns and villages nowadays, and the practice is certainly to be deprecated, though it is not very easy to suggest the remedy. Appeal can only be addressed to the good taste of those concerned, and this is more often than not a minus quantity. Perhaps it may have more weight to suggest that the money spent on these eyesores is, to a large extent, thrown away. I doubt if one motorist in a hundred is influenced by them. Formerly it was different, no doubt, but to-day such proclamations are at once unattractive and out of date. "Garage—with Pit" is a common legend. Whoever wants a pit nowadays? And who needs to be told that this or that hotel has a garage? It goes without saying.

It sometimes happens that a motorist's search for the best tyre ends where it begins, that is, he strikes the best first. This seldom occurs in real life. ## WOMAN.

PLAYING PROVIDENCE.

NO woman is averse from the idea of being a Lady Bountiful to those about her. It satisfies at once her charitable instincts and the natural pleasure we all feel when we are popular. Probably even St. Elizabeth of Hungary was human enough to enjoy the love her virtues brought her. But there is a difference between smuggling loaves of bread to the starving, and spreading reports about people in order to regulate some one else's life to suit one's own convenience. Even when there is foundation for gossip, it is not the pleasantest way of playing Providence. There have been two cases recently in which English-women were brought into a court of law to answer charges of slander. In one case the jury disagreed, but in the other the lady of an English manor thought the district would be more comfortable without a certain couple, so she set to work to clear the neighbourhood of them, and the jury awarded handsome damages against her.

Gossip is always considered a feminine occupation, probably because the number of women who have nothing better to do is larger than the number of men equally leisured. A whisky and soda at the club, however, is proverbially found quite as stimulating as a cup of tea at five o'clock. At any rate, the gossip mind exists; it is usually the mind empty of other concerns. The trouble arises when it exists together with the lust for power which has made a few great figures in the world's history and underlay the whole of the feudal system. The power of life and death no longer lies directly in the hand of the overlord; it has been whittled down by increasing legislation into the power to meddle and interfere. A landlord who refuses to repair a tumbledown cottage is going as near as he dare to the "Throw him into the moat!" with which his ancestor would have treated a complaining tenant.

Many women have the lust of power, sometimes in an extraordinary degree. It develops very often with circumstances. The vicar's wife in a country village is frequently its absolute despot. Often, of course, her rule is the rule of sweetness and light, and she is adored by the countryside; that is when her nature is too sterling to be over-ridden by vanity. In a great many cases, on the other hand, the squire's lady, or the clergyman's, sometimes the doctor's, frequently the mistress of the Dower House, is a tyrant in the worse sense—the tyrant who has power over the small things of neighbours' lives. A robber baron who lived in his stronghold might have laid waste the countryside every now and then, but he did not go and call on his tenants and say: "I hear you are going to call your child John; you must do no such thing; you must call him George," which is, in effect, the attitude of many a ruling lady in small country places. A despotism of this kind needs to be softened and illuminated by sympathy and a complete lack of the sense of class difference. It is quite true that an educated and enlightened woman is far more likely to know what is good for the poor and ignorant than they are themselves; but all her knowledge, even if exerted with the best and most Christian intentions, will do harm, and not good, if she have not the respect for the privacy of other people and the instinctive insight into their feelings which so many women seem to have for their own class and not for the classes beneath them.

To play Providence is a pleasant game, and one in which a great many ladies living in the country, and perhaps a few in other places as well, are fond of engaging. Lewis Carroll's conception of the world as a chessboard on which human beings moved according to the rules of the game is a convenient one for this pursuit; but it must be remembered that that was a dream. Even if it had been true, how could any one of us be justified in concluding that he alone was no piece, but the controller of the game? King John was forced to deny that supposition for all time when he wrote his name at Runnymede. Since then the most omnipotent lady must rule her village with some thought that while she plays Providence with the villagers the law may be playing Providence with her." The most feudal-minded of ladies in this free realm should remember that

> "'Tis an awkward thing to play with souls,
> And matter enough to save one's own."

ON SENDING GIRLS TO FRANCE.

The acquisition by girls of seventeen or eighteen of another language beside their own has a sort of fancy value in this country, whereas elsewhere it is considered as one of the elementals of education. Intrinsically its value is small, for language after all is but the alphabet of life, and an alphabet is of little use unless you apply it to spelling. A year's French, however fluent, has a woeful way of disappearing with lack of practice, and with it that "finish" commonly supposed to pertain to all French schools whatsoever.

The real use of a year in France, whether in school or family, has perhaps less to do with the acquisition of the language than almost anything else. From a language point of view it is a case of "any fool can do it." I once knew an Englishman who lived for twenty years in France, and made it his boast that he could not speak a word of French at the end of it; but such insularity requires a very special effort. It is nevertheless a fact that a girl, stupid in every other respect, often speaks French with excellent intonation, whereas a clever girl as often only succeeds in acquiring a grammatical mispronunciation. The language, is, however, incidental—a means to an end. What is of real value is the opportunity of comparison, and thus of acquiring a standard of life. A year in France should give a girl an extra pair of eyes. It should teach her not to take everything for granted, should extend her sympathies, and put her in a frame of mind to judge by reason as well as prejudice. It is regrettable that the majority of girls who have the regulation year in France acquire a superficial knowledge of the language and nothing more.

The difficulty that faces most parents in sending girls to France is that of selecting a school or family. The fact that the selection often has to be made from a distance, and still more often in complete ignorance of French conditions of life, quite naturally makes them suspicious and fearful. Also the girl, who is going away probably for the first time, is homesick, and in response to her plaints receives British sympathy of a kind that urges her to put up with it, and that a year will soon be over. Thus she starts with an emphasised British standpoint, which theoretically she has set out to avoid. The "au pair" system again, while it has the advantage of getting a language for nothing, and of compelling the girl to make herself understood, has the disadvantage of a very restricted life, and of allowing the girl neither the dignity of mistress nor the care of pupil. Finally, the British parent is usually dissatisfied unless her girl is in Paris and can say that she has seen the Louvre and the Luxembourg—perhaps even the Salon. The great supply of English fledglings and the expense of life in Paris make neither for great comfort nor great scope on the part of the girl.

In my own experience it does not really matter very much whether a girl acquires her French experiences in Paris, France, Belgium, or Switzerland. If Paris has a more fashionable—I do not say better—accent, such an accent will almost certainly be drowned in the overwhelming British intonation. Further, a real knowledge of French life is to be obtained far more easily in the provinces, where habits are undiluted with cosmopolitanism. Personally, I should much prefer my daughter to see a Breton wedding than to visit Louvres or Luxembourgs, which, after all, are much the same all the world over—that is to say, of course, if she is obliged to choose between the two. A readiness to go to the provinces also diminishes the difficulty of finding a suitable refuge. In a family the girl will probably obtain a large vocabulary, for even small children have an astounding command of words and experience; a small child of my acquaintance once surprised me by saying of a man, "Maman, il me fait les yeux significatifs!" In a school she will get less vocabulary and less knowledge of the world; at the same time her grammar will probably be better, and she will obtain a greater knowledge of books. I know of one place which more or less combines the two. It is tucked away in a seaside corner of Brittany, twelve miles from the nearest station. You can buy postage stamps there, and very little else. The girls enter thoroughly into the life of the place and the house, and do not only acquire an excellent knowledge of the French language. This is the only reasonable way of regulating a year in France, and it is a necessary way. For in the present day of closer intimacy between nations no girl can afford to be without some knowledge of a country to which civilisation owes so much.

MRS. A'S DIARY.

Wednesday.—I am the last rose of summer—of last summer, there has not been one this season—I am left blooming alone, most of my lovely companions are jaded and gone to recover their lost complexions or secure worse ones by the side of the sea. France claims such victims by hundreds, and it has been one of the sights of London to see the Continental trains starting with their burden of fair dames, mostly clad in shantung, with small turbans enwrapped with chiffon veils. The travelling Englishwoman has learnt something of the art of dress; she no longer takes her walks abroad in checked tweeds, nor in nondescript garments of ancient pattern, definitely labelled shabby, but still "serviceable."

There were one or two offenders at Charing Cross this morning, where I went on the sad mission of speeding the parting Lilian on the longest way to Dieppe viâ Paris, in order to put some finishing touches to her already overstocked wardrobe. A culprit I condemned among the first-class travellers had a short coat and skirt of brown serge, an ivory lace blouse and a large brown straw hat with a brown ostrich feather round it. Earnestly I would have implored her to consider the superior charms of a Paisley silk shirt and a small round hat to match, lined and hemmed with brown straw, with a straw band round the low crown. Another serious offender wore a long pale blue travelling coat with black and white striped revers, large silver buttons, and an enormous black hat. She looked as if she had stepped from a Gaiety stage group and would soon oblige with a "Heave ho!" chorus boldly attached to a few kind words about a starlight night and a motor-car.

Lilian exploited the perfection of travelling garb in a mole grey shantung coat with large smoked-pearl buttons, a very small soft silk cap dragged round her head in folds with a flat ornament with a short tassel, a grey chiffon veil being thrown back over this; and beneath the coat she had a blouse of grey voile and a short skirt of the dark grey shantung, while over these she wore a knitted coat of grey silk.

The trains were very full, and I was conscious of some peaceful recompense in being left behind, and almost inclined to agree with Joan's latest itinerant decision which she expressed yesterday whilst I was sympathising with her for being detained in town by an inconsiderate publisher. "It's vulgar to leave London so early in August."

Thursday.—I had a long letter from Virginia, who fulfilled her threat and went to Goodwood. The end does not seem to have justified her means, or to have added to them.

She wrote on Wednesday:—"It is freezing cold. Every one is wearing blue serge, with a nose to match, and macintoshes are in great force. I have not yet selected a single winner. I have taken a desperate dislike to green grass, and I fervently hope I shall never meet another salad mayonnaise. All the best gowns are tailor-made, and the narrow skirt and three-quarter coat are ubiquitous. I send you an artistic (?) attempt to explain a buff-coloured cloth, with an Irish lace collar, belt, and cuffs, worn with a large black satin hat with two enormous yellow choux in it. Another dress which I am sure would have had the advantage of exciting your admiration was a mixture of shantung and charmeuse in mignonette green, with much soutache on the charmeuse and many buttons decorating the three-quarter, straightly hanging coat. The turban hat of dark green chip was literally wound round the head of the wearer, and it had a very large oxidised silver rose at one side.

"My beautiful hostess talks fashion almost as glibly and as dogmatically as you do, and amongst the items of intelligence which she endeavours to impress upon me in the intervals of comforting me for the offences which the meteorological authorities have committed against us is her prophecy of the immediate popularity of the waistcoat. This is to be made in fanciful brocades imitating those of our forefathers, and no well-considered autumn costume is to be complete without one; indeed, she bets at least ten to one on such happenings. Would that I could find a like certainty amongst the horses; but there is always to-morrow."

There is also Monday, I am thinking, and Virginia may find occasion to bless one Lubbock, and to quote Barry Pain, who said, "The ideal book on finance has yet to be written, and it should be entitled 'How to live within your overdraft.'"

Monday.—The woman who hesitates is lost, and when Florence telephoned this morning suggesting I was churlish and affected because I did not propose to join a world of merrymakers, I stammered excuses which were overruled at 3d. a minute, and the net result was that I find myself once again profiting by her hospitality.

I sat this afternoon watching a tennis tournament while the local gentry practically demonstrated the fate of the German-made bargains at the July sales, and I gossiped with the eldest hope of the house, who is in training for the regatta at Marlow, and limits his conversation to his chance meanwhile of obtaining sufficient food to make existence worth having. It is pleasant, I recognise and remember, to be very young and very active, but there is some comfort in not having to pretend to be either. A famous daughter of a famous father once assured me she was looking forward to that period when she might with impunity stretch herself at ease six hours of every day on a sofa clad in a tea gown and innocent of corsets. The prospect, however, suggests the unattainable paradise. Women keep up now a pretence of youth until they have passed their sixtieth birthday, and then they only consent to acknowledge that they are nearing forty, and "must be thinking of taking a back seat in the life irresponsibly joyous."

The Asquith-Charteris wedding was the popular topic at tea; and the fourteen golden-veiled bridesmaids wreathed with leaves excited considerable interest in this circle, though the proceedings were deplored as more like a pageant than a sacred ceremony, and the flagrant economist pitied the sorrows of the glad bridegroom who had to supply so many gifts.

The sun shone all the afternoon, and nobody mentioned it. Such is gratitude! When it rains, or blows, or snows we criticise even unto "the curse degree," while we acquiesce in our blessings as if we deserved them.

The French girl's hat.

Amongst those which I merit, but do not see much chance of attaining down here for at least four days, is an exact imitation of a hat worn by a French girl visiting the neighbourhood. This crowned a blue shantung frock and a turn-down lawn collar tied with a black tasselled bow draped with much grace by a black chiffon scarf. It was made of white Tegal of a preposterous shape of the dustman order lined beneath with black chiffon edged with a black lace frill, blue ribbon being stretched across the crown and falling in streamers to her waist, little rosebuds of pink outlining this ribbon across the crown and being twisted into small wreaths at either side of it. I took in every detail while heaping with conscious liberality an empty plate with monster gooseberries which grow in profusion on my hostess's bushes. Perhaps there is consolation in having a large and hospitable family with a wise selection of gardeners.

Virginia has again written from Goodwood, and she is remaining in the neighbourhood another week. She found Thursday and Friday quite cheery, admired Mrs. Chauncey in lace and muslin with bright blue streamers, and the Countess of Kinnoull in black, with waving oats on her hat; she described an attractive frock of white crêpe Paisley bordered; and found a certain "Dorothy" looking beautiful in dark blue chiffon over pale pink satin. Mrs. Hall-Walker had a nice grey and black gown, the Countess of Aylesford was of the many in shantung, and the choice of costume ranged from light pale pink linen to the heaviest black satin. Open worked embroidery and ficelle tussore were by no means neglected, while a conspicuous success was an all-in-one-piece dress of pale coral-coloured crêpe oversewn in strange devices on bodice and hem, with small white opalescent beads. This was the choice of a brilliant brunette, and she wore it with a leghorn hat plainly trimmed with a black velvet ribbon some nine inches wide. But altogether "the fair sex was but fairly garbed," she concludes, "and I shall not inscribe these Goodwood races upon the tablet of my mind amongst the pleasures of the social chase, and I am definitely not off to Cowes."

Mrs. A.'s Letter-Box.

I have been persuaded to counsel through these columns all wise women who send me their dress difficulties to solve. But their inquiries must be clearly addressed to Mrs. A., "Truth" Office, Carteret Street, S.W.

M. B.—I have kept your address and received your sample. Your plain sewing is excellent, and in due course I will try and recommend you some customers. Of course, the making of the camisole is dear; without the hand embroidery I have had such work done for 2s. 6d.

Rose Red.—I should send the entire costume to be dyed a dull shade of mulberry. I am sure it would be a success. The coat could remain as it is and be trimmed with black braid and buttons, and then you could put on later an astrachan collar, keeping this narrow and long. It might want a new lining, but this would be quite inexpensive, and should be most successful in black satin or in black satin foulard with a white spot.

Cup and Saucer.—You can buy from the London Corset Co., 28, New Bond Street, elastic bands which commence at the waist and extend below the hips, fitted with suspenders. You will find these a great support, and far less restriction than corsets.

HOLIDAY FICTION.

One takes up a novel by Mr. W. J. Locke with the happy certainty of entertainment. One knows one will not be bored with the commonplace nor wearied with the uninteresting; in fact, one's only fear is lest the author should have stereotyped some pattern of the fantastic life which he loves to present. There is no hint of any such process, luckily, in "Simon the Jester" (Lane, 6s.). Simon—his other name is really de Gex—has never been presented to the public before either by Mr. Locke or anyone else. He and his passion for eumoiriety, defined, if you please, as "the quintessence of happiness dealt unto oneself by a perfect alter ego," are both unique. It is a strange dance which that same passion leads him, and it has curious results, both for himself and all those associated with him. On Dale Kynnersley and Lola Brandt and Eleanor Faversham and Anastasius Papadopoulos it leaves its mark, but chiefly on Simon de Gex, M.P., and the animal tamer, Lola Brandt. It leads them to a realisation of some of the realities of existence which you do not expect them to encounter when they are first introduced to you, and they have so won your interest that you are glad to find that they, too, may share in the ordinary joys and sorrows of the life commonplace. Mr. Locke should be proud to have added Simon to his gallery of portraits.

For a first novel, "The Rajah's People," by J. A. R. Wylie (Mills and Boon, 6s.), is an extraordinarily forceful piece of work. It is not so much in its well-woven plot nor its incident, nor even in its Oriental atmosphere, that its attractiveness is to be found, but in the excellence of the characterisation. Every portrait in the book stands out with the clearness of a vignette. The actors in the drama which the author unfolds are much more than vignettes, however; they are living, moving, breathing persons, vibrating to the passions which animate all mankind, endowed with the pettinesses and faults as well as the qualities and ideals which go to the making of human kind. But if, where much is excellent, one were to select one portrait rather than another, it is that of Beatrice Cary. The way in which the awakening of a conscience in that embittered but beautiful young woman is described is a piece of rare observation.

"The Enemy of Woman" (Mills and Boon, 6s.) is Miss Winifred Graham's contribution to the "Votes for Women" controversy, and the militant Suffragette will be compelled to admit that she is an exceedingly powerful antagonist. It is a novel with a purpose, and that purpose is to reveal the degradation of womanhood brought about by the militant methods of the Suffragettes. She gives a forcible picture of a Suffragette campaign, and it would be impossible to say that the picture is overdrawn. Nor do her characters in any way outrage reality. From the anti-suffrage point of view the story is indeed sufficiently convincing. The general reader will read the book for another reason—simply because it contains a good up-to-date story, well told.

In "Ragna" (Greening, 6s.), a quite charming first novel, Miss Anna Costantini strikes the cosmopolitan note. A blond Norwegian meets her destiny on her homeward voyage from a French convent, in the shape of Prince Mirko of Montegria. Ragna is your true Scandinavian, direct, straightforward in feeling; Prince Mirko has a Southern subtlety, which leads him to become the ruin of Ragna's life. A journey to Italy, a chance meeting with the Prince, show the inevitable hand of fate. In the end Ragna rises superior to her misfortunes, saved by the call of her children. "Ragna" has the quality, rare in a novel, of ending better than it begins.

Any child possessing such a "Professional Aunt" (Constable, 5s.) as is described by Mrs. George Wemyss is a very lucky child indeed. For the professional aunt takes her duties seriously, knows when to give a knife, and when a knife "with things in it." She must learn to bear with heroism the perverseness which makes a child prefer a hearth brush wrapped in a dolly's cape to a woolly rabbit chosen with much care and forethought. Sara and small Tho-mas are evident favourites of the professional aunt, just as mamma Zerlina, who only invites her to be useful, is the villain, if villain there be in such a charming book.

Before all things authors should avoid "shop." Miss Ellen Ada Smith's "I" in "The Busybody" (Long, 6s.) is "shop" in its most egregious form. "I" writes books, gets overstrained through books, is misunderstood through a book, is reinstated by a book. Incidentally a millowner behaves badly to his cousin, an inventor; the mill is burnt down, and various couples come to a happy conclusion. "I" marries in the usual way, and, I trust, also abjures a painful effort to be clever.

SYKES-JOSEPHINE'S NEW WAIST-LINE CORSET is the ideal of perfection. The contour is graceful, the fashioning elegant, and the build on anatomical principles. Particulars and prices on application to 280, Regent Street, London.

WORK AND PLAY.

Of the dressing of dolls there is no end, and lady readers of TRUTH have once more to be reminded that the TRUTH doll show at Christmas implies hundreds of unclad dolls at midsummer. The usual number of waxen beauties are anxiously awaiting their departure from town to kind friends willing to provide them with raiment in preparation for their distribution among the London Poor-law schools and hospitals. Big and little, blondes and brunettes, brown eyes or blue, and all with irreproachable complexions, offer themselves wholeheartedly. The novelty of this year is the inclusion of "character" or natural dolls—that is to say, dolls whose calves and arms come in the right places, and whose heads are in just proportion. Ideal beauty may not be the strong point of the natural doll baby; but then a young baby, except in very adoring eyes, is not much like Apollo. No doubt the realism of the new type of doll will appeal to its future owners. But, natural or conventional, they all want dressing, and the Editor of TRUTH invites all ladies who are willing to provide so much pleasure for so many little ones to let him know at once how many they would like sent them.

The women compositors at Edinburgh, numbering some nine hundred, have formed a union for themselves, since the men have protested against the employment of women in the trade, and have made of the employers demands which, if acceded to, would affect very seriously the prospects of women engaged in printing. The union has been joined by practically all the women compositors, and an appeal was promptly presented to the chairman of the Master Printers' Association, begging for delay in replying to the demands of the men. It is a pity that women almost always wait for an acute crisis in their affairs to arise before they co-operate.

An appeal has been made for the help of the lace workers of St. Helena, who have done their best to make a trade to take the place of the livelihood which wavered when the Suez Canal was opened and vanished when the British Government decided to withdraw its garrison from the island. Mrs. Jackson, a resident, came to the rescue, and taught them lace-making, and the Colonial Office sent out a teacher and spinning outfit. The flowers of the island figure in the lace, making it unique and interesting as well as beautiful, and ladies interested in it can get particulars from the League of the Empire, Caxton Hall.

The statistics regarding the women students attending the French universities this year are interesting as showing to what an extent French women are preparing themselves to take a serious part in the world's work. There are attending the universities during the current school year no less than 3,380 women students. Of these 2,042 are devoting their attention to literature, a fact which should make the French Academician tremble for the supremacy of his sex. Over 1,000 have taken up medicine, 500 science, and 152 law. The day may yet come when the daughters of a household will, instead of the piano, "take up stinks" and drive their brothers from the house with an attack upon their noses instead of their ears.

Mme. de Laroche's recovery has been little short of miraculous, and already the newspapers have been informed that she intends to fly again. What would Jane Austen's heroines have said to such indomitable pluck? Surely the reign of the timid woman is over.

LETTER FROM MADGE.

DEAREST AMY,—Our last bit of diversion before the close of the gloomiest season on record was tea at the Carlton on Wednesday afternoon, the matinée day when every table is full and the most wonderful hats and toilettes are to be seen. Such pretty faces, too! And how hungry a theatre makes one! They give you such nice things to eat at these teas that it seems quite a waste not to take a good appetite there. The little pastries are so appetisingly brown as to be irresistible. They remind me always of the French flans, so beautifully baked, and just a tiny bit burnt round the edge—the kind of burning that is just to the taste of many. Another instant in the oven or under the salamander would burn it too much. You know what I mean? Does George like things just a little bit burned? The side of a cutlet? The top of a slice of turbot? I wonder!

Jim was telling us about Lady Graham's lovely ball at Claridge's, and says that the ballroom there has been completely transformed. There is now a minstrels' gallery raised above the room, so that the entire floor-space can be devoted to the dancers. It is difficult to guess why no one ever thought of this until Lord Wimborne had a musicians' gallery of the kind erected in the ballroom in Arlington Street. In this and perhaps many other particulars we might copy the fifteenth century without retrograding in any way, but quite the reverse.

By the way, our laws want reforming in some directions. Perhaps they, too, were managed better in the fifteenth century. At present it seems to be a toss-up whether a case will end in the applicant obtaining justice or injustice. Lisa could not get paid a certain £30 she had lent some one, so she put its collection in the hands of a lawyer. He assured her that she should have the money in a few weeks; that the case was a simple one, as the debtor had money and had admitted the debt. Result: the lawyer got the money, but sent in to unlucky Lisa a bill of costs that not only swallowed up the £30, but made her out as owing him £30 over and above that amount. She took this bill of costs into court. The judge said that such charges should be impossible, but that this kind of thing frequently occurred. It was most unfortunate, he said. A few items were struck out of the bill, and Lisa now finds herself not only minus her original £30, but in debt to the amount of £23 to this lawyer.

There is an extraordinary approximation at the present time between the speech of the highest and the lowest classes. Both say "ain't." Both drop the "g" at the end of such words as hunting, shooting, golfing, riding, walking. A woman of the upper class speaks of her husband as "my man," so does the wife of the artisan. Again, at the two extreme ends of the social scale, a chemise is a shift, the duchess and the scullery-maid tacitly abjuring the French word.

I heard a new expression while the workmen were here doing up the house. One of them said to his "mate": "I've got that furniture 'ome, a table, two chairs, a bed, a fender, a coal-scuttle, and fire-irons, ten pound on the hire system, and I'm shockin' 'appy!" I suppose the "shockin'" is a lineal descendant of "awfully" that is sometimes used in that sense.

In the Duke of Argyll's "Eighteenth Century Letters" the great ladies use the expression "make a noise" in the sense of making a fuss, a complaint, a to-do. For instance, it is used with reference to the first wife of a certain nobleman, who after her death married two others, and had them in course of time buried on either side of the first wife. "She'll make a noise about it on the Judgment Day," writes the eighteenth century lady. Now, that is the exact expression used to-day by the working classes in precisely the same sense. But they have all to themselves such phrases as "if he is agreeable" in the sense of "if he agrees," "granted" in reply to an apology, "invite" for "invitation," and "interesting" with accent laid heavily on the third syllable.

I wish you would help me to an up-to-date dictionary that gives some new words used by Anatole France, Bourget (but I cannot read him, he is so very digressive), Pierre Loti, and other of the top-cream of French literature. What is "oustiti," "sangrenu," "cambrioler"? This last occurs in "Chantecler." What oceans of Paris slang one learns in Rostand's latest! The blackbird is past-master of argot up to date. I wish we could start a little club for keeping up our French, acting short plays, buying the newest books and circulating them, collectively, among the members. It would be nice for winter, wouldn't it?

In novels when the heroine faints the hero gently raises her and lays her head upon his shoulder, breathing tender words into her ear, and sometimes even bestowing a kiss upon her pallid cheek. This is not at all the proper way to treat a swoon. The lady should be laid at full length on the floor, with her head unsupported in any way. The flatter it lies the better, for the blood has then a chance to circulate through the vessels of the brain. Some simple rules of this kind should be hung in the hall of every house. The other day a girl was hurt in a cab accident, and was carried into her father's house when only servants were at home. She was supported in the high porter's chair until the doctor came, and he expounded the physiological features of the case to the servants afterwards. The poor girl soon regained consciousness when laid full length upon the floor. The spread of education does not seem to increase intelligence. "Knowledge comes, but wisdom lingers."

How rapacious some London landlords are! The tenant of a West End house whose lease has just expired, and who has expended large sums in improving the property, having added on a floor and made a very expensive fire escape at the back, finds herself obliged to pay £250 a year more rent. She has to pay for her own outlay, which seems quite Gilbertian, but that is your London landlord's way. There is little justice about it, is there? The buyers of land, too, have to pay for their own outlay in the shape of income-tax, and I am told that there is some new law which will make the possession of land an unattainable luxury. What are we all coming to? Some one said, the other day, that we shall all have to go and live in the Isle of Man, taxation being almost if not quite unknown in that sea-beaten land.

DEAREST MADGE.—Does not the study of a Bank Holiday in progress make one wonder if the originator of the institution was indeed a benefactor to his fellow-creatures? Over here we do not take these festivals as unspeakably as you take yours. As with most other things, we have our own way regarding them, too. Except in the towns the Bank Holiday is little of an institution; we keep to the holy day as the holiday, and the calendar of the saints does not include St. Lubbock. No people in the world hold harder to old ways and customs than do we.

Lord and Lady Ardilaun have been spending a quiet time at St Anne's, Clontarf. The beautiful gardens, which Lady Ardilaun has mainly created, have, like all the gardens, been going through great trials, owing to the unusual wildness of the summer winds. A large party generally assembles at St. Anne's for the Horse Show week, which is a busy time with Lord Ardilaun, who has been for many years President of the Royal Dublin Society, which holds the show. Needless to say, he takes an active part in promoting its interest; it is a way the Guinness family have with whatever they undertake. Lord Iveagh, who every year extends the scope of his philanthropical work in Dublin, takes an active personal interest in it, in addition to supplying generous money gifts, and the addition is a very important one.

The burning of Sir Valentine Blake's old family residence, Menlough Castle, besides the sad deaths caused by it, is a great loss to the historian and antiquarian. It was amongst the oldest inhabited and unruined castles in the country, and stood close to the considerable river—from which it had a water approach—flowing from Lough Corrib into Galway Bay. The place was full of interest to the archæologist, especially in these times of Irish revival, when we are taking so enthusiastically to the study of ourselves and of our neglected history. Menlough Castle was within a very short distance of Galway, the Connaught capital of much historic renown.

Lord Rathmore has been visiting his many friends in Ireland, where he is very popular. He remains an Irishman, although no longer resident amongst us, and is very appreciative of the golf links, which may now be numbered amongst our most flourishing industries.

Many big country places throughout the country are being opened for the late summer, which, in view of coming events, we are praying may be a case of better late than never. The Duke of Abercorn and his family have taken up their residence at Baronscourt to make a long stay, the Duchess arriving there from a cure at Marienbad. Lord and Lady Dunsany are at Dunsany Castle in Meath, where they have had a large house party for the cricket week got up by Lord Dunsany. In addition to a taste for active pursuits, Lord Dunsany, like his uncle, Sir Horace Plunket, has literary proclivities. Lord Dunsany's do not, however, turn in an industrial and economic direction, but in a more idealist one. He has published a play and works of fiction.

Lord and Lady Wicklow have arrived at Shelton Abbey for the summer. The Howard family residence is picturesquely situated in Wicklow, not far from Glenart, where Lady Carysfort is now in residence. What a difference it makes in a country neighbourhood when the "big house" is open! And we suffer so much from big places shut up and tenantless all over Ireland.—Yours ever, CLARE.

Here are the novel little entrées you asked me for. You will like them all:—

Chicken à la Moira.—Divide a plump chicken into neat pieces, put them with two minced shalots and half a gill of salad oil in a stewpan, and cook them on a brisk fire, with hot coals on the lid, until the chicken is brown. Warm a glass of claret and a pint of brown sauce and pour them in, cooking all gently in the oven about an hour. Meanwhile, take the seeds from seven or eight small ripe tomatoes, farce them with 2 ozs. minced red tongue mixed with two tablespoonfuls of brown sauce and the yolk of an egg; cook them in a moderate oven about fifteen minutes. Dish the chicken on a fried croûte, garnish it with the tomatoes alternating with groups of boiled green peas.

Tomatoes à la Bulgarie.—Mix three-parts of a gill of thick mayonnaise sauce with an equal quantity of liquid aspic jelly and half a finely chopped red chili. Stir this on the ice till it is on the point of setting, then mix in a finely minced hard-boiled egg, green peas, carrots, cucumber, French beans, and new potatoes, all cut with a pea-cutter. With this farce fill ten or twelve small ripe tomatoes which have been freed from their seeds. Place each one on a slice of cooked beetroot, garnish them with a spoonful of green peas, sprinkle them with passed hard-boiled yolk of egg, and on each put a tiny sprig of chervil. Dish the tomatoes round a mound of small salad or watercress.

Tomates à l'Etoile.—Take fine, smooth, ripe tomatoes and remove the seeds. Mix a macédoine of finely cut cold cooked vegetables with mayonnaise sauce and a little aspic jelly, fill the tomatoes, and place them on ice to become firm. When they are ready, cut them in form of the sections of an orange, and dish them star-wise on a bed of chopped aspic, garnished with picked watercress.

Pigeons à la Nivernaise.—Cut two or more young pigeons each into four pieces. Sautez them quickly in a covered stewpan with butter and chopped shalot. When they are slightly browned pour in half a glass of sherry, half a gill of tomato purée, and sufficient brown sauce to cover them. Simmer the pigeons at a gentle heat, and when they are dished garnish them with button onions and carrots cut into olive-shaped pieces, parboiled in water, then finished in stock, which must be reduced to glaze, adding a pinch of sugar.

Bordure des Œufs is a useful luncheon dish.—Make a pound of ripe tomatoes into purée and reduce it stiffly. Mix the purée with 3 gills of liquid aspic, and with it fill a border mould with an indented top. Poach six eggs, put them into cold water to cool them, drain them on a cloth, after which coat them with good white chaudfroid sauce, and garnish them with flots of ripe tomato. To serve:—Turn the border out on a dish, arrange the eggs on top, fill the centre with boiled diamond-shaped French beans, seasoned with oil, vinegar, salt and pepper, and make a nice outer border of chopped aspic jelly.

Ever your loving Cousin, MADGE.

ABRIDGED PROSPECTUS.

This Company has been formed for the purposes mentioned in its Memorandum of Association, and especially to acquire a concession of 270,000 hectares (that is, about 667,000 acres, or 1,042.2 square miles) of land in the San Pedro district, Ivory Coast. The concession is defined in the decree issued by the Governor of the Ivory Coast, dated 7th August, 1900, in accordance with an agreement dated 28th July, 1897, between the Minister of the Colonies and the Compagnie Française de Kong, which was approved by decree of the President of the French Republic dated 31st July, 1897.

Under the terms of the concession the Company acquires the absolute ownership (including surface and sub-soil) of the land in perpetuity, free of all rents and royalties. These exceptional terms are due to the concession having formed part of the remuneration given by the Government to M. Verdier for his services in obtaining the Ivory Coast for France.

The French Ivory Coast Syndicate, Limited, of 6, Broad Street Place, London, E.C., who are Vendors to and promoters of this Company, procured the services of Mr. I. T. Hawkins, M.I.C.E., F.G.S., formerly Deputy-Director of Public Works in Southern Nigeria, who has had fifteen years' experience, including twelve years' actual residence, on the West Coast, to make a Report on the Territory.

PHYSICAL CHARACTERISTICS.—The concession has a coast line of about eighteen miles, and comprises the basin of the San Pedro River, which intersects the property approximately from north to south. The prevailing soil is a rich deep loam, suitable for all kinds of tropical products. The average altitude is about 450 feet.

The rainfall is abundant, with two wet seasons spread over about 200 days, but the absence of any large swamp area renders the territory comparatively free from fever.

HARBOUR FACILITIES.—The concession includes the port of San Pedro, which is a small bay protected by a rocky promontory, and is the only sheltered inlet without a bar on this otherwise surf-bound coast. When a road is made to connect with the Trade Routes of the rich and populous Hinterland, the harbour at San Pedro will be of great importance. It is the natural port to tap the resources of this part of the Ivory Coast.

San Pedro is distant about fourteen days from Europe, and is on the route served by several lines and by numerous coasting steamers.

COMMUNICATIONS.—The San Pedro River is navigable for light craft during eight months for over 100 miles of its course, and the Brimay River is similarly navigable from Mapri to the coast.

NATURAL PRODUCTS.

RUBBER.—There are several indigenous varieties.

(1) Funtumia Elastica is practically confined to a belt of about 140 square miles in the north of the territory, where it forms the bulk of the forest, attaining a height of 60 to 70 ft., and a diameter of 2 to 3 ft.

(2) Ficus elastica is common from the coast to the 48th mile, attaining in some districts a height of 60 to 90 ft. and a diameter of 20 to 30 ins.

(3) Conopharyngia jollyana (called "Brae" by the natives) is abundant near the coast, and is multi-stemmed and of vigorous growth.

(4) Vine Rubbers: Landolphia Owariensis and Clitandra elastica are plentiful, and the former often attains a diameter of 9 to 11 ins. A man usually collects four pounds of Vine Rubber per day.

COST OF PRODUCTION.—It is estimated that under present conditions the cost, delivered in Europe, amounts to 1s. 6d. per pound, but it is believed that by proper organisation and treatment the cost can be reduced to 8d.

The Estimate of Funtumia trees to be tapped, the yield therefrom, the yield from vines, and the net profit resulting is as follows:—

| Year. | Number of Trees expected to be available for tapping. | Yield per Tree. | Yield from Trees. | Yield from Vines. | Total yield from Trees and Vines. | Estimated Selling Price. | Profit per annum in 1910-11 at 1/6 per lb. and 1/- per lb. afterwards. |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| | | lbs. | lbs. | lbs. | lbs. | | £ |
| 1910-11 .. | 175,000 | 2 | 350,000 | 50,000 | 400,000 | 3/- | 30,000 |
| 1911-12 .. | 750,000 | 2 | 1,500,000 | 100,000 | 1,600,000 | 2/6 | 80,000 |
| 1912-13 .. | 1,000,000 | 2 | 2,000,000 | 200,000 | 2,200,000 | 2/- | 110,000 |
| 1913-14 .. | 1,250,000 | 2 | 2,500,000 | 400,000 | 2,900,000 | 2/- | 145,000 |
| 1914-15 .. | 1,500,000 | 2 | 3,000,000 | 600,000 | 3,600,000 | 2/- | 180,000 |

In the foregoing figures no account has been taken of the large quantities which, when the territory has been organised, will be obtainable from Ficus elastica and Conopharyngia jollyana.

OIL PALM.—This tree, yielding the Oil and Kernels which form the staple product of the region, is abundant on the territory. The number is estimated at 1½ millions, and the yield per tree at 8 lbs. of Oil and 15 lbs. of Kernels.

The profit per ton on the Oil is estimated at £8 3s. 4d., and on Kernels at £5 3s. 4d., based on a sale price of £25 for Oil and of £13 15s. for Kernels.

(Note. The Market prices on July 28th, 1910, were £33 and £17 10s. per ton respectively.)

The export of Oil and Kernels from the Ivory Coast from January to November, 1909, was 6,163 tons and 4,786 tons respectively.

PIASSAVA FIBRE.—There is an area of about 36 square miles estimated to contain 500,000 trees capable of yielding an average of 25 lbs. of fibre per tree. The estimated profit is over £4 per ton, based on a selling price of £20.

TIMBER.—There is abundance of mahogany and other hardwood trees, which should yield good profits.

COTTON.—Large areas of the territory are adapted, by soil and climate, to the growth of cotton suitable for producing fine counts.

A sample of Cotton found growing wild was reported on by Mr. James Prestwich, Managing Director of the Busk Mills Company, Limited, Oldham, Lancashire, who writes under date April 27th, 1910, when the Liverpool price of middling was 7.98d. per lb., as follows:—

"Fibre mixed, average value in Liverpool 7½d., seed good and valuable. Some bolls have evidently been picked before ripening, and are as a consequence short and immature. The fully developed staple is fine and strong, and, being well ginned, is worth to-day in Liverpool fully 8½d. per lb. If such cotton can be secured in quantity and, pending ginning facilities on the spot, can be shipped as seed cotton to this country, the return—in spite of extra carriage owing to excess freight consequent on soft packing—would be excellent."

OTHER PRODUCTS.—Mr. Hawkins' Report deals fully with Kola Nuts, Cocoa, Bananas, Pine Apples, Coffee, Sugar-cane, Cocoanuts, Gum Copal, and the other products of the territory and the summary of profits below estimates substantial returns from some of them. It is intended to clear the land in certain districts with a view to planting.

LABOUR.

There are sixty villages in the territory, and additional labour can be obtained from outside.

For the purpose of collecting Rubber, Fantis, who are experienced in this work, and of whom there are plenty to be had, will be brought in as required.

For road making and general engineering work it is proposed to employ trained Yorubas from Southern Nigeria, many of whom have previously done such work under Mr. Hawkins.

TRADE.

The trade roads from French Guinea and the Soudan to Soubre run close to the Company's northern boundary. It will cost little to open up communications with these roads, and, when made, this should bring to San Pedro much of the traffic passing along them.

It is proposed to establish trading stations furnished with a careful selection of articles, so as to induce the natives to bring in produce in exchange for the goods they require.

PROFITS.

The following is an estimate of profits from the principal products, after providing for all costs but those of home administration:—

| Derived from | In 1910-11. | In 1911-12. | In 1912-13. | In 1913-14. | In 1914-15 |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| | £ | £ | £ | £ | £ |
| Rubber ..... | 30,000 | 80,000 | 110,000 | 145,000 | 180,000 |
| Trading and other products, including Timber, Palm Oil and Kernels, Piassava, etc. ..... | 5,000 | 10,000 | 20,000 | 30,000 | 40,000 |
| | £35,000 | £90,000 | £130,000 | £175,000 | £220,000 |

CONDITIONS OF PURCHASE, ETC.

The consideration to be paid to the Vendors is £124,000, payable as to £54,000 in cash and £70,000 in shares under the Contracts hereinafter mentioned, and in addition the French Ivory Coast Syndicate, Limited, have the right to call for an allotment at par at any time for one year from 15th August, 1910, of 66,000 shares forming part of this Company's capital.

The French Ivory Coast Syndicate, Limited, has the right of nominating one Director of the Company if there are three or fewer directors, and two Directors if there are more than three Directors, and the Compagnie Française de Kong has the right of nominating one Director.

By Article 91 of the Articles of Association the qualification of every Director shall be the holding in his own right and as sole holder of shares or stock of the company to the nominal value of not less than £500.

No part of the said purchase money is payable for goodwill.

The preliminary expenses up to the first general allotment of shares (except brokerage and underwriting commissions, and exclusive of the costs of and stamp duty on transferring the property) have been estimated at £12,000. Under Contract (c) the French Ivory Coast Syndicate, Limited, of 6, Broad Street Place, London, E.C., agrees to pay these preliminary expenses in consideration of the Company paying it £12,000. If such preliminary expenses exceed the estimate the French Ivory Coast Syndicate are liable to pay the excess; and if such expenses do not amount to the estimate they are entitled to retain the balance. The French Ivory Coast Syndicate, Limited, also agree to underwrite 157,000 shares in consideration of a cash commission of 6 per cent. upon the total amount of the shares underwritten by them. The brokerage of 3d. per share hereinafter mentioned and the stamp duty and costs of the transfer of the property (which stamp duty and costs are estimated to amount to £1,000) are payable by the Company.

None of the Directors are interested in the promotion of, or the property to be acquired by, the Company, except that Sir Richard Biddulph Martin, Bart., is a sub-underwriter of 2,500 Shares at a commission of 5 per cent.

The minimum subscription upon which the Directors may proceed to allotment has been fixed by the Articles of Association at 80,000 shares, to be reckoned exclusively of any amount payable otherwise than in cash, but in view of 157,000 shares having been underwritten the Directors will proceed to allotment immediately on the closing of the lists.

Copies of the Memorandum and Articles of Association, and of the contracts entered into, the report of Mr. Hawkins and copies of the Decree of the Governor of the French Ivory Coast Colony, the agreement between the French Colonial Office and the Vendors of the 28th July, 1897, and the Decree of the President of the French Republic dated 31st July, 1897, and translations thereof, can be seen at the Offices of the Solicitors to the Company at any time during business hours while the list is open.

Applications for Shares should be made on the Form accompanying the full Prospectus and forwarded to the Bankers of the Company, together with the amount payable on application.

Prospectuses and Forms of Application for Shares may be obtained from the Bankers, Brokers, Solicitors, the Secretary of the Company, and at the office of the French Ivory Coast Syndicate, Limited, 6, Broad Street Place, London, E.C.

"TRUTH" PUZZLES.

RULES.

1. The sum of £2 2s. will be given every week for the best Epigram, Conundrum, Lipogram, Bouts-Rimés, or whatever the announced subject of the competition for the week may be.

2. The Puzzle Editor reserves the right, however, of dividing the above sum between two or more competitors, or of withholding the prize, should exceptional circumstances render such a course desirable.

3. The decision and award of the Puzzle Editor must be considered final and irrevocable, and for obvious reasons no appeal from his critical judgments can be entertained.

4. In every instance the prize will be given in money, subject to no condition whatever, except the publication of the winner's real name and address in this Journal.

5. Competitors will be allowed eleven days for the composition and despatch of their efforts; but all such communications must, at the latest, be received at the Truth Office by the first post on the morning of the second Monday succeeding the publication of the subject for competition.

6. Not more than one Prize will be given a quarter to the same competitor.

7. All New Contributors are Required to Forward with their First Answers their Real Names and Addresses for Registration; such names and addresses will not be published except in the case of Prize-winners.

8. The nom-de-plume chosen by competitors should not exceed twelve, and must under no circumstances consist of more than fourteen, letters.

9. Competitors must on no account change the noms-de-plume they have once assumed.

10. On the announcement of the Prize-winner's nom-de-plume, the successful competitor must write and make formal application for the Prize, stating the address to which the cheque must be sent. Any competitor failing to do so within three months of winning the Prize will forfeit all claim to the same.

11. No communications can be received on post-cards, by telegraph, or by hand. They must all be sent by the time named above. All post letters addressed:—

PUZZLE EDITOR OF "TRUTH," Carteret Street, Queen Anne's Gate, S.W.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE No. 1,634.

SPECIAL PLAY OFF.

In accordance with my previous announcement, I herewith invite those competitors who tied for the original acrostic (Competition No. 1,634) to submit solutions of the following:—

Mere kudos doth the better please
For being reinforced by these.

(i.) What have we here? Tack on a tail,
At least, you can't be said to fail.

(ii.) Decapitate this worthy's name,
Yet leave him, strange to say, the same.

(iii.) The victim of a tyrant's raid,
For which that tyrant dearly paid.

(iv.) Once one, but now more often it
In two unequal parts is split.

(v.) Their meaning's source is hid from sight
Until you add the present light.

N.B.—Only those who sent in correct solutions of the original acrostic are eligible to compete for this; though I shall be happy to receive and acknowledge solutions, hors concours, from any other readers who care to submit them.

The noms de plume of the eligible competitors are: Browser, Will, La Milo, Cuthbert, Eca, Quern, Korah, Prak, Mrs. B., H. Wynotte, Dumnonix, and Bibliothekar, whose alternative of "Redforth" for "Ralph" I have, after some hesitation, accepted.

Certain other alternatives, as to which I invited appeals, I have been compelled to reject.

All solutions of this special play-off acrostic must reach Truth office by the first post on Monday, August 15.

I may add that, in the present case, no alternative lights will be entertained.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE No. 1,642.

The usual Prize of Two Guineas is offered this week for

THE BEST STANZA, OF SIX RHYMED LINES, IN WHICH THE WORD "MAN" SHALL OCCUR IN THE FIRST LINE, AND THE FIVE REMAINING PERMUTATIONS OF THE LETTERS M A N IN THE OTHER FIVE LINES RESPECTIVELY.

I need hardly point out to my competitors that the permutations of the letters m a n are as follow:—

M a n
M n a
N m a
N a m
A n m
A m n

The letters of each permutation must in each case be used consecutively, as helping to form one or more words. For example, take the permutation "n a m." This might appear as part of the single word "*unam*bitious," or of the two words "*an am*bassador," or of the three words "*in a m*uddle."

One such permutation must occur in every one of the six lines and, for the Puzzle Editor's convenience, should be underlined.

The stanza may be upon any subject and in any recognised metre. It must, however, read into intelligible and grammatical English.

It only remains to add that all stanzas must reach Truth office by the first post on Monday, August 15.

"TRUTH" PRIZE No. 1,635.

ALLITERATIVE DESCRIPTIONS OF THE HORSE SHOW AT OLYMPIA.

The Prize of Two Guineas in this competition is equally divided between Chris, Bel Demonio, and Arlos, whose alliterative descriptions were printed in Truth of July 6.

"TRUTH" PRIZE No. 1,636.

FORECASTS OF THE RESULT OF THE OXFORD AND CAMBRIDGE CRICKET MATCH.

Even the nearest forecasts submitted for this competition are so wide of the mark that adjudication has proved a most perplexing and difficult task.

On the whole, Creina's forecast, though far enough away from the actual result, must be estimated as rather less so than any other competitor's.

Creina, therefore, will receive the Prize of Two Guineas.

Creina's forecast was as follows:—

Winners: Oxford.
Winners' Score: 310 and 88 for 3.
Losers' Score: 188 and 217.
Margin of Victory: 7 wickets.

To call it a successful prophecy is, of course, impossible. All one can say is that it is slightly less unsuccessful than any other.

"TRUTH" PRIZE No. 1,637.

EPIGRAMMATIC DESCRIPTIONS OF HENLEY REGATTA.

The Prize of Two Guineas in this competition is equally divided between Tony, Jowley, Penelope, and John, M.P., whose descriptions were printed in Truth of July 20.

Answers to Correspondents.

Veni.—I should like, if possible, when the time comes, to publish the winning answers in Truth. But I am much afraid that I may be prevented by considerations of space.

Ribler.—I beg to thank you for your letter.

Giovanna.—You will see the award about which you inquire announced above.

ENTRE NOUS.

I HAVE to acknowledge with many thanks £2, received from W. Y., for the Tress Barry Fund, 5s. from Thomas and Jack Farrand, and £3 from St. Andrew's School Chapel, Eastbourne. I rather fear that the recent appeal which I made to my readers to make up the small amount required for this fund at once has escaped the notice of a good many of them. I venture, therefore, to repeat it. It would be a great convenience and of great benefit to the forthcoming TRUTH Toy Fund if the 11,000 sixpences required for distribution at Christmas could be made up at once and put aside, and a very, very small sum per head among all the readers of TRUTH would have that effect.

The King and Queen are now settled at Balmoral until the first week in October, when the Court will go into residence at Windsor Castle. His Majesty has taken on the grouse moor of Micras, in Glen Gairn (about six miles to the north-east of Balmoral), which had been rented during the last few years by King Edward from Mr. Farquharson, of Invercauld. The Lord Provost and magistrates of Aberdeen were officially informed that the King and Queen would arrive yesterday morning at half-past eight at Ferryhill (the junction of the Caledonian and Deeside Railways), where it has been the custom for the municipality to be in attendance to receive the Sovereign when travelling to and from Ballater. No address was to be presented yesterday.

Queen Alexandra's plans have been changed almost daily, to the great embarrassment of all concerned with her arrangements. It is now expected that her Majesty will travel next week direct from Wolferton to Ballater, by way of Peterborough and the East Coast route. The Queen Mother is to be the guest of the Princess Royal and the Duke of Fife at Mar Lodge for a month, according to the latest arrangements, after which her Majesty will go abroad, returning to Sandringham about the end of November. It is probable that Queen Alexandra will be conveyed from Dundee to Copenhagen in the Royal yacht, and after spending a few weeks in Denmark she will proceed on a visit to the Duke and Duchess of Cumberland at their country seat in Upper Austria. In this case her Majesty will also pay a visit to the Duchess-Dowager of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha (Grand Duchess Marie Alexandrovna), either at the Château of Rosenau, near Coburg, or at Tegern See, in Bavaria, where the Duchess has a villa.

The Princess Royal and the Duke of Fife are settled at Mar Lodge until the end of October. The Duke has the whole of the deer forest of Mar in his own hands, besides the adjoining shootings of Mar, which were let for some years to Lord Farquhar, the whole comprising about 110,000 acres. The King will be the guest of the Duke of Fife for the annual big drives in the principal beats of Mar Forest, which are to take place during the latter part of September.

The Duke and Duchess of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha have arrived in England from Germany, and they are on a short visit to the Duchess of Albany at Claremont Park. They are expected soon at Reinhardsbrunn, their hunting seat in the Thuringian Forest. The Duchess of Albany has been staying at Crookham House, Hants, but returned to Claremont to receive her son and daughter-in-law.

Prince Francis of Teck has gone to Marienbad for a course of the waters, and when he returns he will go to Scotland to pay some visits.

---

The King and Queen of Spain are to leave Cowes to-day on a visit to the Duke and Duchess of Westminster at Eaton Hall, where they will stay until Saturday. It is expected that King Alfonso will pay one or two visits to Scotland before he leaves on his return to Spain. His Majesty intends to proceed from Cowes to San Sebastian in the Royal yacht Giralda (which is now in the Solent) when he leaves England.

---

Captain Fitzwilliam, who succeeds Sir Henry Ewart as Crown Equerry, is a younger son of the late Lord Fitzwilliam, and he was for nine years Master of the Horse to King George when Prince of Wales. Captain Fitzwilliam served for some years in the Royal Horse Guards, and he was for two years Aide-de-Camp to the late Lord Ripon when Viceroy of India. The appointment is worth £1,000 a year, with a furnished residence in the Royal Mews near Buckingham Palace, and certain allowances and perquisites. The Crown Equerry is really the permanent secretary in the department of Master of the Horse.

---

The King received Captain Hugh Watson at Buckingham Palace last Wednesday on his appointment to be Naval Attaché to the Embassy at Berlin. He replaces Captain Heath, and he is to commence his duties this week. Captain Watson, who has been for some time a member of the Naval Intelligence Department, is attached also to the Legations at The Hague and at Copenhagen.

---

Lord and Lady Aberdeen will entertain a party for the Horse Show week, and have a busy time in promoting Irish interests in a variety of ways. Last week Lady Aberdeen opened a sanatorium near Cork, making the long journey to and from the southern capital, speech-making and doing much other work with untiring good-will and energy.

---

The appointment of Sir George Buchanan to be Ambassador at St. Petersburg was expected, and will meet with general approval in diplomatic and official circles. Sir George is a younger son of the late Sir Andrew Buchanan, who was himself a distinguished diplomatist. He entered the service in 1875, and he has been employed at Vienna, Rome, Tokio, Berne, Caracas, Berlin, and Sofia. He was appointed Minister at The Hague only a few months ago. Sir George was much praised when Minister at Sofia, as he displayed remarkable tact, firmness, and finesse in dealing with a very difficult situation. He has thoroughly earned his promotion to a first-class embassy.

TO A GROUSE.

(After Burns's "To a Mountain Daisy.")

Wee modest sleekit speckled cock,
  Wha art the flow'r o' a' the flock,
'Twill gi'e thy cantie spouse a shock
    When she has word
That I hae landed sic' a knock
    On her wee bird.

Cauld was the northern moorland air
  When I cam' oot tae do and dare,
And track thee lang around thy lair
    (Jist like a bard
Wha hunts the Muse wi' pinions bare),
    An' swearin hard.

The mist cam' ower the droukit hill,
  But there I saw thee lone and still;
An' wi' a bang I sent a pill
    Richt in thy heid
(Ye ken it needed nae sma' skill),
    An' thou wast deid.

Alas! I hear thy neebors say,
  That ane sae bonnie couldna' stay
Afar from yonder bluidy fray!
    It dries ma sap
Tae hear them cheepin', so I'll hae
    A wee bit drap.

Such fate tae sufferin' birds is sent;
  An' thou I feel wad be content
Gin thou didst ken for what thou'st meant:
    This nicht thou'lt be,
If naethin' happens tae prevent,
    A pairt o' me!

Lord and Lady Ilchester have been staying for a short time at Melbury Park, their place near Yeovil, where the wooded slopes are now in great beauty. The Melbury Sampford estate is distinguished for its fine timber, the groves and avenues of sycamores, oaks, limes, and chestnuts being especially remarkable. King Edward was to have been a guest at Melbury Park during the present year, and he would probably have been accompanied by Queen Alexandra. All the arrangements had been made for his late Majesty to spend a week at Melbury Park in November, 1908, but he caught cold, and his visit was therefore postponed. Lord and Lady Ilchester are going on a visit to Lord and Lady Londonderry at Wynyard Park, and afterwards to Scotland.

Lord Rosebery has gone to Vichy for a course of the waters, after which he will proceed to Scotland. His official journey to Vienna will not take place until the latter part of next month, as the Emperor Francis Joseph does not wish to receive the Ambassador-Extraordinary until after his return to Schönbrunn from Ischl. Lord Rosebery will be received by the Emperor, with a full State ceremonial, at the Hofburg, and at night a Court banquet is to be given in honour of the special mission.

Lord Cadogan has gone to spend a month at Aix-les-Bains. He intends to return to England in time for Doncaster race week, after which he will settle for the autumn at Calford Hall, his place near Bury St. Edmunds.

Mr. Balfour is taking a course of the waters at Bad Gastein, where he will stay for another fortnight. On returning to England Mr. Balfour will proceed to Whittinghame until Monday, September 5, when he goes to North Berwick. He intends to spend September at North Berwick, except for the week-ends, when he will be at Whittinghame. When staying at North Berwick Mr. Balfour will be within four miles of Archerfield House, where Mr. Asquith is to be in residence during September. The Prime Minister, by the way, has been on a visit to Mr. and Mrs. Harcourt at Nuneham Park, near Oxford, since he left town last week.

---

The Duke of Richmond and Gordon and Lady Helen Gordon Lennox arrived at Gordon Castle on Saturday from Goodwood for a stay of three months. There will be small parties at the Castle during the autumn for salmon fishing in the Spey. The Duke's deer forest of Glenfiddich is let, along with the Blackwater moors, to Mr. J. D. Cobbold, the extent being about 35,000 acres. The late Duke always kept these shootings in his own hands, and he once entertained Queen Victoria at Glenfiddich Lodge.

---

Lady Collins, widow of Sir Robert Collins, who was Comptroller of the Household of the Duchess of Albany, has vacated Broom Hill, the place in Claremont Park which was set apart by Queen Victoria as an official residence for the individual holding that appointment. Broom Hill will in future be occupied by Captain Edward and Lady Blanche Seymour. Captain Seymour succeeded Sir Robert Collins in the office of Comptroller to the Duchess of Albany.

---

A representative of the Duke of Marlborough visited Windsor Castle last week on Tuesday, which was the anniversary of the battle of Blenheim, and placed a silk banner with the fleur-de-lis over the bust of the first Duke, which is a prominent object in the armoury. This duty is imposed on the Dukes of Marlborough as an incident of their tenure of the Blenheim estate.

The deer forest of Glenavon (40,000 acres) is let to Captain Heywood Lonsdale, and Kinrara (the old Speyside seat of the Dukes of Gordon) to Lord Aberdare, along with 16,000 acres of shooting. The Duke of Richmond's Strathavon moors of 15,000 acres are let to Mr. A. F. Basset. His Grace retains the low ground shooting belonging to Gordon Castle, and he has on hand the small deer forest of Glenmore, near Aviemore, because no tenant has been obtained for it.

---

Strathallan Castle, Lord Perth's fine seat in the Strathearn district of Perthshire, has been sold to Sir James Roberts, of Bingley, Yorkshire, along with the estate of about 7,400 acres, which affords first-rate low-ground shooting, and there is a small grouse moor on the property. The house is handsome and well arranged, with excellent gardens, and about 450 acres of "policies" and woods. The cover for rearing pheasants is remarkably good, and there are extensive salmon fisheries in the Earn. Strathallan is let for the shooting season to Mr. G. E. Hayes. The property purchased by Sir James Roberts includes the dowerhouse of Machany and its grounds.

---

The celebrated deer forest of Glenquoich, in Inverness-shire, which was rented for over thiry years by the late Lord Burton, has been let for this season to Mr. Arthur James. King Edward paid two visits to Lord and Lady Burton at Loch Quoich Lodge. Glenquoich, which belongs to Mrs. Ellice, of Invergarry, comprises about 60,000 acres, and the forest extends from the top of Glen Garry to the sea at Loch Hourn. The scenery is very grand, and the whole forest is intersected by a network of bridle paths, so there is no trouble in reaching remote beats on the higher grounds. The shooting lodge on Loch Quoich was originally built by the well-known "Bear" Ellice, and it was greatly enlarged by Lord Burton, who also added every desirable modern improvement. King Edward scarcely got a shot during his two visits to Glenquoich. There were great numbers of deer, but they persistently refused to be driven in his Majesty's direction.

WHUSKY-BATHS.

(By a native of Glasgow.)

Oh! Sandy McScraper
Sat conning his paper,
  And there an announcement he read,
Horrific, amazing,
Which started upraising
  The hair on his carroty head.

'Twas this: How Rockefeller,
The famous oil-seller
  (Whom some an old blood-sucker dub),
To make himself frisky
Was using neat whisky,
  For water, when taking his tub.

"Hoots! Whusky—ma certie!—
For washing when dirty!
  'Tis sinfu' and shamefu'," he cried,
"What God made for tastin'
Man shudna be wastin'
  To swab and to sluice his outside.

"But stay! A thocht strikes me,
And muckle it likes me.
  Though myself the extravagance hates,
I wudna be makin'
Objections to takin'
  Sic baths at the cost of the rates.

"Whusky baths for the masses!
All planks it surpasses,
  On't his faith let each candidate pin.
Let him shout himself husky
For layin' on whusky,
  All Glasgow will carry him in."

On one of the last afternoons of the Session a well-known Liberal member noticed a small company of Japanese in the central hall. They were looking about apparently knowing nobody, and having neither card nor ticket, and the member asked if he could be of any assistance to them. They responded with enthusiasm. The member took them round, and showed them everything likely to interest them. After they had shaken hands and thanked him most profusely, there was some whispering amongst them, and the leader of the party returned with extended hand. As he again shook hands, he gracefully slipped half-a-crown into the member's palm

In the last ten minutes of the dying session the House of Lords, thanks to the Archbishop of Canterbury and Lord Camperdown, succeeded with Government approval in shelving Mr. Runciman's Education (Choice of Employment) Bill. Had it passed, this Bill would have enabled the local education authorities throughout the country to set up at the ratepayers' expense juvenile labour bureaux in competition with those now being established by the Board of Trade. A more inopportune time could not have been chosen for this belated and mischievous attempt to deal on local lines with a question which can only be effectively tackled by means of a comprehensive national organisation.

I really think a little more discipline is wanted in the Cabinet. For better or for worse, owing mainly to Mr. Churchill's turn for constructive reform, the Board of Trade have taken on themselves to organise the entire labour market of the country, and at the same time make a determined attack on the "blind alley" employment of juveniles who drift into the unemployable ranks when they reach manhood. Suddenly the Board of Education, who have hitherto ignored the practical side of education in its relation to industrial labour, step into the arena with a Bill which, if carried, would paralyse the efforts of the Board of Trade at the beginning of their work.

As a new coinage is now in process of incubation, a correspondent writes to point out the desirability of having the denominations of all coins plainly marked on them. There can be no question about this, and the matter ought to be attended to when new designs are under consideration. The chief offenders at present are the florins and half-crowns, which in some of the current issues are very liable to be mistaken for one another. What seems to me to be still more desirable, however, is that this opportunity should be taken of making a start with a nickel coinage in place of bronze. The convenience and utility of nickels has been abundantly demonstrated on the Continent, and there is no reason why we should any longer lag behind our neighbours in this respect, even if we have to wait another hundred years for a decimal system.

A more mendacious document than the Turkish communiqué which the Ottoman Embassy sent to the English press on the 2nd instant in regard to the condition of Macedonia it would be impossible to conceive. As far as Turkish action is concerned the condition of Macedonia and Epirus is as bad as in Abdul Hamid's time. The entire country is under martial law, and is being governed by military courts, which have administrative as well as judicial powers. Terrorised by corporal punishment and torture, the inhabitants are being again goaded into insurrection, and the Bulgarian Government is threatening intervention. Constantinople papers hint that this is what the Young Turks want. If so, there is a considerable chance that they will get more than they bargain for.

There is a good deal to be said for the Government decision in favour of local memorials to King Edward in place of a national one. One thing that may be said is that the result of all efforts of this kind is so very speculative that it is risky to put too many eggs into one basket. With fifty or a hundred small memorials instead of one big one, the chance of getting something satisfactory somewhere is manifestly increased.

As regards the London memorial, the Lord Mayor and his Committee are not likely to lack suggestions, but I should hope that the decision will bear some relation to the Victoria Memorial and its surroundings. One of my readers would like to see the site eastward of the new entrance to St. James's Park cleared and opened out to Trafalgar Square, and a monument to his late Majesty erected on a part of the space thus provided. Myself, I am all in favour of rebuilding the front of Buckingham Palace, and why a work so urgently needed should not be carried out as a memorial to the last Sovereign I cannot see.

It has been pointed out to me that I have done an injustice to the Royal Society of Literature in remarking that its members consisted chiefly of those undistinguished persons who desire to attach a string of letters to their names and do not mind paying a guinea or two a year for the privilege. I had not seen a very recent list of Fellows, but the annual report for the current year has now been handed me, and it shows clearly that effective endeavours have been made to remove this particular reproach from the society. It is true that there are still names on the roll which one does not chiefly identify with literature, but I am pleased to see that they are now in a minority, and that a considerable number of really eminent literary lights have become Fellows.

Hogarth's well-known portrait of Benjamin Hoadly, Bishop of Winchester, which has been frequently engraved, has been privately purchased for the National Gallery. Hoadly is represented in episcopal garb, with the insignia of the Order of the Garter.

Owing to circumstances connected with the Bank Holiday, I was precluded last week from noticing sundry further communications that I have received on the burning question of "birds and fruit." I have been informed privately—but the information seems worth making public—that hanging cans of sweetened water in cherry trees may divert the attention of blackbirds from the fruit, the idea being that it is drink they want rather than meat. I have heard this before, but have always distrusted it, as my blackbirds could always have found plenty of drink close at hand if that was all they needed. True, I never thought of sweetening the water, nor of adding lemons or whisky. There is no saying what a song-bird may fancy as a wet to his whistle. But it is too late to try such experiments this year.

An idea, which impresses me as more business-like, is that of a firm who call my attention to an automatic gun they have invented which fires charges periodically when once wound up and placed in position. This ought to keep birds off—at any rate, for a time. But there are a good many cases—mine happens to be one—where the trees are pretty close to the house; and as between birds singing in the orchard and a minute gun firing blank ammunition, I think I should prefer the birds.

Dr. Kynaston, who died last week at the age of seventy-five, was a distinguished classical scholar, particularly known for his Theocritus, which has gone through numerous editions. He took the highest classical honours at Cambridge, where he gained numerous prizes, including the Porson Scholarship, besides rowing twice in the Cambridge Eight, and was an assistant master at Eton and headmaster of Cheltenham College. In 1889 he accepted a Crown living in London, but a few months afterwards Bishop Lightfoot collated him to the canonry in Durham Cathedral, to which the chair of Greek and Classical Literature in the University is annexed. Dr. Kynaston soon became very popular at Durham, as he was most genial and broad-minded, and he took a hearty interest in local affairs. He was a prominent Freemason.

The canonry vacated by Dr. Kynaston's death is worth £1,000 a year, with an excellent house in the college, and is in the gift of the Bishop of Durham. In the old days there were twelve "golden prebendaries" of Durham Cathedral, each of whom received over £4,000 a year, and a bishopric, a deanery, or one or two fat benefices were usually held along with a stall. The last Dean of Durham before the reforms was Dr. Jenkinson, who died in 1840, and he also held the see of St. Davids. The deanery was then worth £9,300 a year. The number of residentiaries at Durham was reduced to six in 1840, and there are now five of them, the endowment of one stall having been transferred to the see of Newcastle when Archdeacon Hamilton died. Three canonries are annexed to the Chairs of Divinity, Hebrew, and Greek in Durham University.

Lord Pentland has made an excellent choice for the Chair of Divinity and Biblical Criticism in Glasgow University, vacant by the resignation of Professor Stewart. Dr. Milligan had a most distinguished career at Aberdeen University, and afterwards at Edinburgh and in Germany. He is one of the ablest theologians in the Church of Scotland, and his writings and other work have gained him a wide reputation. He is well-known at Oxford and Cambridge, and also in the United States. Dr. Milligan has been minister of Caputh, Perthshire, during the last seventeen years.

Canon Benham was a man of genial and expansive manners, and he always pleased people when he wished to do so, for he had great tact, and his talk was remarkably bright, while as a raconteur he had few equals among the clergy. He was bland and obsequious to dignitaries, and he made a complete conquest of Archbishop Tait, which was the great coup of his career, for it brought him rich and easy preferment. The achievement was no small one, for that hard-headed and sagacious prelate was a very difficult man to get hold of. Canon Benham's views were so broadly accommodating, and his sympathies so wide, that he managed to please men of every imaginable school of thought. He showed his talents in this line by "nobbling" both Mrs. Tait, who was very High Church, and her husband, who was an uncompromising member of the Broad Evangelical school. He was an attractive preacher, and a very prolific writer on all kinds of subjects. A critical acquaintance once described him as bearing in some respects a tolerable resemblance to Mrs. Trollope's "Vicar of Wrexhill," while a less friendly observer declared that he reminded him of Anthony Trollope's "Mr. Slope."

When Canon Benham was vicar of Margate a lady who had been rather puzzled by his curiously vague views on all subjects—sacred and secular—asked Archbishop Tait, "To what Church party do you suppose Mr. Benham really belongs?" The reply was, "Well, I think, on the whole, he must belong to the Benhamic school."

Mr. Quicke, of Newton St. Cyres, has presented the Rev. C. B. Collyns, who has been vicar of Plymstock, Devon, during the last fifteen years, to the rectory of Ashbrittle, near Wellington, which is vacant by the death of the late incumbent, and of the net value of about £380 a year, with house. Mr. Collyns has done much good practical work at Plymstock, and he has been very popular in the parish. The living which he vacates is in the gift of the Dean and Canons of Windsor, and the net stipend is about £260 a year, with house.

The episode which began with Major Adam's onslaught upon Major-General Scobell in the House of Commons has ended in a fashion highly characteristic of our military administration. In reply to Major Adam's charges, Major-General Scobell applied to the War Office for an inquiry. The War Office then invited Major Adam to amplify or substantiate his charge. Major Adam replied, in effect, that he had no confidence in the Army Council, and did not believe in an "epistolary inquiry," and hoped that Mr. Haldane would devise some better means of investigating the case than that which had been proposed to him. Thereupon the Army Council informed Major-General Scobell that as they had already fully investigated the whole business, and Major Adam had not accepted the invitation to amplify or substantiate, they were quite satisfied with Major-General Scobell, and considered Major Adam's charge without foundation.

The general scheme of this engagement seems to be that of a triangular duel. The major shoots at the major-general, the major-general shoots at the Army Council, and the Army Council shoots at the major. After the first round, however, the proceedings resolve themselves into a duel. Major Adam turns round and fires point blank at the Army Council, and the Army Council empties all the barrels it has left into Major Adam.

That Major Adam was perfectly justified in declining to submit his case to the judgment of the Army Council there can be no question. His object in taking the course he did was to force a searching and open inquiry into the whole business covered by Major-General Scobell's reports. Setting aside what he says in his letter to Mr. Haldane, the final letter of the War Office to Major-General Scobell shows that not only has an official opinion upon all the facts and all the parties been formed and registered, but that it is a very strong opinion indeed. It seems almost incredible that Mr. Haldane or the Army Council could seriously suppose that a mere formal reconsideration of the case under these circumstances by the authority which had already disposed of it would be accepted by anybody else as the equivalent of an "inquiry." Yet apparently this was the only sort of inquiry contemplated by the War Office. Not a hint was given to Major Adam when he was invited to "substantiate or amplify" that any other procedure was proposed, and when in his reply he expressed a hope that Mr. Haldane would investigate the case by some other method, Mr. Haldane could find nothing in his letter pertinent to the charge!

Brigadier-General Robertson, who has been appointed Commandant of the Staff College, is to be replaced as Brigadier-General on the staff at Aldershot by Brigadier-General Davies, who will himself be succeeded by Colonel Maxse, Coldstream Guards, in the command of the 1st Infantry Brigade at Aldershot.

Colonel Dawnay, whose death (following an operation) was announced last week, was the second son of the late Lord Downe, and a grandson of the well-known Bishop Bagot. He served in the Coldstream Guards for fourteen years, and was for some time employed on the staff in India. He volunteered for service on the outbreak of the South African War, and was at the front for a year, having gone out on the staff of Lord Gough. He was an uncompromising Tory of the old school, and he sat in the House of Commons from 1880 until 1892. His political enthusiasm sometimes caused him to appear rather absurd, as he had no sense of humour, and one of his eccentric declarations made him the hero of one of Mr. Frank Lockwood's best cartoons. Colonel Dawnay inherited from his uncle (Mr. Payan Dawnay) the fine estate of Beningborough, near York, and he soon became known as one of the best landlords in the county. He took a keen interest in agricultural affairs, and he was most generous and considerate to his tenants. He was very hospitable, and entertained largely at Beningborough Hall. He was also a well-known figure in the hunting field, and a very good shot.

and served subsequently under Havelock and Outram. He was the head of a very old Perthshire family, and he inherited a large estate in that county. He was regarded as quite a model landlord, and he was greatly beloved and most highly esteemed by his tenants and by his neighbours of all classes. For many years he took an active part in local affairs.

Either the 1st Battalion of the Berkshire Regiment must have been afflicted for a long time past with a singularly inefficient set of staff sergeants, or the battalion must be ruled at present in a very high-handed and unjust fashion. Within a few months the pioneer sergeant, the orderly-room sergeant, and the master tailor have been returned to duty; the quartermaster-sergeant has retired on completion of eighteen years' service, thus sacrificing 25 per cent. of his possible pension; and the master cook has obtained employment on the Special Reserve after having at an earlier date refused an offer of the same appointment.

This accounts for five staff sergeants out of seven. As two of the men have gone voluntarily, though unwillingly, there is good ground for suspecting that in the other cases the fault does not lie on the men's side. It is also significant that four out of the five were working immediately under the quartermaster, who was promoted a few months ago from another regiment. In the case of the orderly-room sergeant, who had completed three years' service in that capacity, I am informed that the only reason given for returning him to duty was that he could not agree with the quartermaster. There had, of course, been no such difficulty under the previous quartermaster; and when the quartermaster sergeant had been got rid of his place was filled by the importation of a man from the quartermaster's previous regiment. This sort of thing does not make for harmony and happiness in regimental life.

If the real circumstances of the insubordinate behaviour of the West Riding Territorials at all resemble the accounts that have appeared in the press, the officers responsible for the training arrangements in the Isle of Man are as much to blame as the men. Two wrongs do not make one right, but there are circumstances which will provoke insubordination among the most highly disciplined regular troops in the world, and when you are dealing with mere lads who have had little experience of military discipline you must exercise reason and common sense in handling them. It is very important from every point of view that the whole circumstances should be carefully inquired into and the blame justly apportioned all round.

An edifying feature of this affair is the glee with which it has been pounced upon by some of the press champions of compulsory service. The most vicious of them, after observing that the men "refused to march because it was raining hard," adds "Is not this the stuff out of which effective defenders of our hearths and homes are made?" It is nothing to this patriot that a hundred thousand or so of his fellow-citizens have been voluntarily slaving like niggers for a week in all weathers for the benefit of his precious hearth and home, and acquitting themselves to the admiration of all beholders. Fifty are reported to have misconducted themselves on one day, and that is enough for him. He doesn't want anybody to defend his hearth and home voluntarily. You don't get the best stuff that way. So he picks up his handful of mud and hurls it at the whole force indiscriminately.

In speaking of the Archer-Shee case last week, I pointed out once again the need for giving officers some legal rights against their employers, and some legal method of vindicating them. Could there be a better example of the need than this correspondence? Officialdom claims to be not only law-maker, judge, and jury, but the sole court of appeal from its own findings and judgment. Its decrees are impugned in the House of Commons, and by way of satisfying the House and the public, it gravely proposes to sit in judgment upon itself. When the complainant objects to its jurisdiction, it proceeds to deliver judgment without any further formality—the same judgment as before—dismisses the appeal, says all the nasty things it can think of about the complainant, and pronounces itself honourably acquitted.

The same idea has evidently occurred to the poet who sends me the following verses:—

SIMPLICITY ITSELF.

Oh! 'tis a very simple thing,
As simple as a thing can be.
The General just reports on you;
It may be, or it mayn't be, true;
But if it's bad, you get the fling.
The General always right is he.
Oh! 'tis a very simple thing,
As simple as a thing can be.

Oh! 'tis a very simple thing,
As simple as a thing can be.
You to the Army Council go;
The bad report's all wrong you show;
Your head against a wall you bring.
The Council will not hear nor see.
Oh! 'tis a very simple thing,
As simple as a thing can be.

Oh! 'tis a very simple thing,
As simple as a thing can be.
For years and years you seek redress;
For fair inquiry hard you press.
The Council skulks behind the King!
"Against the Crown you have no plea."
Oh! 'tis a very simple thing,
As simple as a thing can be.

Yet on itself the Council sits,
The verdict in itself doth bring,

An officer in the Indian army sends me particulars of an experience with an Indian bank which may serve as a warning to Anglo-Indians who return home without taking care to see that their accounts are definitely closed. He left India in December, 1906, under the impression that he was in credit with his bank to some small amount. Nothing occurred to alter the impression until last March, when he received a letter informing him that he owed the bank eighty rupees. He, therefore, asked for an account. This was furnished him at the end of June, showing his indebtedness to amount to 105 rupees, an original debit balance of sixty-five rupees having been increased to this sum by interest and "incidental charges." Incidentally this throws an interesting light on the rate of interest which Indian banks charge to private customers.

Admiral Sir William Dowell, who last week celebrated his eighty-fifth birthday at Ford, Bideford, has been referred to by the newspapers as the "Father of the Fleet." But presuming this title to go by seniority, the Navy List shows that it belongs to Admiral Sir William Luard. This veteran officer entered the Navy in February, 1833, and retired in April, 1885. He saw severe fighting in China in 1841. Sir William Dowell entered the Navy in April, 1839, and retired in August, 1890. He likewise served in the China campaign of 1840. From that time down to the Egyptian War his career is one long record of fighting, and I believe he has a fuller breast of decorations for active service than any living officer.

A naval correspondent writes:—

Admiral May is reputed in the service to have but one idea—and that is duty. But I think we may in justice credit him with another—consideration for those who serve under him. On the conclusion of the great Torbay parade a certain Devonport battleship signalled to the flagship, asking permission to coal ship on the following Monday. The following answer was made: "No. Have you forgotten it is Bank Holiday?" Of course, it is quite possible the skipper of the battleship had forgotten this fact, but the point lies in the Admiral's thought for the men.

I have no wish to minimise the credit claimed for the gallant admiral. But is it not equally possible he was thinking of the objection of colliers to discharge on Bank Holidays?

I referred recently to the appointment of Rear-Admiral T. H. M. Jerram as second-in-command of the Mediterranean Fleet. The phrasing of this announcement is now altered to "as Rear-Admiral in the Mediterranean Fleet." It seems that after gazetting Admiral Jerram's post their lordships discovered that Rear-Admiral Sir Henry B. Jackson, who has his flag in the Sixth Cruiser Squadron, is senior to the first-named officer, and that until he is relieved of his appointment in October next Admiral Jerram cannot become second-in-command.

Rear-Admiral Dundas, who has been promoted to flag rank, will vacate the position of naval attaché to the Legation at Tokio on September 16, when Captain Sir Douglas Brownrigg, late of the Naval Intelligence Department, is to replace him. Rear-Admiral Dundas has been employed at Tokio since March, 1908. Captain Calthorpe, Captain of the Fleet and Commodore First Class, has been appointed a Naval Aide-de-Camp to the King, in place of Rear-Admiral Dundas, who vacated that post on promotion. The numerous promotions which have recently taken place have brought three officers to the head of the captains' list, all of whom hold important appointments at Portsmouth, which have had to be vacated on advancement to flag rank.

Rear-Admiral Stokes is to succeed Vice-Admiral Cross as Admiral-Superintendent of Devonport Dockyard. He was Commodore-in-Charge at Hong Kong when he was promoted to flag rank in June, 1908, and he has not since been employed.

The Sixth Cruiser Squadron is to be materially strengthened by the substitution of more powerful vessels as the present ships pay off. Sir George Warrender has been selected to take over the command of this squadron in October next. Sir George is a keen gunnery man, and got his promotion for making three "firsts." This will be his first billet afloat since he got his flag rank in July, 1908.

I learn that the statement in last week's Truth, that Keyham College has been closed as a naval engineering establishment, is only correct in a qualified sense. The last term of the old direct-entry cadets having passed out, the college has been shut for various structural alterations. It will presently reopen as a training establishment for the lieutenants (E). As the number of specialist engineers under the Selborne scheme is to be as large as the existent body of engine-room officers, Keyham College will ultimately develop into as busy a place as it was in its original character. I understand that, in point of fact, the distinction between the engineer-lieutenant and the lieutenant (E) will be much more apparent than real.

A good deal of grumbling is occasioned by the lack of provision for the comfort of men who are sent upon acceptance trials of new warships. As these trials are mainly contractor's trials, I do not know whether responsibility rests with the Admiralty or the private builders, but the matter deserves the notice of one or the other, or both. One correspondent tells me that during a thirty hours' full-power trial nothing more in the way of food was to be got on board than a few handfuls of ship biscuit and a mug of tea. The task of getting the very best out of a ship that is in her—the object of all trials—means strenuous work. Considering that these acceptance trials form such a frequent feature of naval routine, it is at least reasonable to expect that proper arrangements should be made for the comfort of those who carry them out.

The Navy Employment Agency, following hard on the heels of the National Association for the Employment of Reserve and Discharged Soldiers, is another instance of how time, energy, and money are being wasted in providing situations for the unemployed. The agency has branches at Portsmouth, Plymouth, Chatham, Manchester, and Aberdeen, and is now extending its organisation to the Colonies. Unlike the Soldiers' Association, the Navy Agency exacts a compulsory fee of 2s. 6d. from all who register their names on its books, a sum of nearly £752 being realised under this heading in 1909. Fees are optional with employers; some pay, and others don't. What puzzles me is that any ex-sailor should pay for a situation when he can go to the nearest Government Labour Bureau and obtain one for nothing.

The Admiralty pay the Navy Employment Agency £1,000 a year out of money voted by Parliament for naval upkeep. This is taxing the public twice over for the same purpose. Now that Government employment bureaux have been established at the taxpayers' expense all subsidising of private agencies should be discontinued. Although the Navy Employment Agency levies registration fees, it advertises itself as a "purely philanthropic" society. I am always suspicious of such advertisements, and should like to ask who are the holders of the £2,000 of debentures, which receive 5 per cent. interest out of the agency's philanthropic revenues. I should also like to see a statement showing how the sum of £1,037 4s. 9d., which is paid out in salaries, is allocated to individuals.

During its late trouble with its men the North-Eastern Railway Company must have been led to suspect that its present management is not much more popular with the public than with its servants. An incident which occurred the other day in connection with the Yorkshire Agricultural Show at Leeds illustrates the sort of grievances that the public complain of. An excursion was advertised from Scarborough and Malton, and over 200 people arrived at Malton station in good time for the train, but after seventy had been booked, the rest were informed that no more tickets could be issued. The officials telegraphed to headquarters for instructions, but were told that nothing could be done, and about 150 would-be excursionists had to walk home again. Large numbers of them were labourers, who had come several miles on the strength of the advertised excursion, and simply lost a day's wages in consequence. A North-Eastern shareholder, who calls my attention to the incident, observes that this is the sort of thing that explains the unpopularity of the company and the last "unsatisfactory" dividend, and in both cases his opinion seems reasonable.

ABSENT PRESENTS.

The reason why
I'm going to try
And tell you, if I can.

You see, I shall be married soon,
And three times every day
The postman brings
Me gifts and things
That fill me with dismay.

Instead of gold and precious stones,
Old lace, and silver plate,
I've had, as yet,
A wretched set
Of brushes for the grate;

Glass cloths, and dusters by the score,
A nest of baking tins,
A flat iron, and
Some silver sand,
A meat skewer and some pins!

Such gifts may be more moral, but
They make one lean to vice;
I wish I had
Some friends quite bad,
Who'd send me something nice!

Not the least curious development of the joint stock company system is the facility with which undertakings of the most rotten description can get into debt. Instead of showing the need of caution, the limited liability principle seems to make people more than usually reckless in giving credit. Among some striking illustrations of this fact in the latest report of the Comptroller of the Companies' Department is the case of the Bee and Bells Refreshment Contracting Syndicate (Leeds). A caterer who obtained the refreshment contract for the first aviation meeting at Blackpool formed this company to carry the business through without personal liability. Nominally the capital was £5,000, but only £2 was actually subscribed in cash, a fact which persons dealing with the company might easily have ascertained from Somerset House. Yet with its cash capital of £2 the company incurred liabilities to the amount of £1,551, which will now be wiped out by the payment of something under 1s. in the £.

An instance of another common abuse of the machinery of the Companies Act was supplied by the Official Receiver at the meeting on Friday of the creditors of Elliott's Dairies, Limited, Stratford. This company was formed in June of last year to acquire the business of Mr. Matthew Elliott, senior, a dairyman. The only directors were the vendor and his son, and in part payment of the purchase price the former was given debentures for £500, covering all the assets. His liabilities in connection with the business, amounting to £934, were transferred to the company. A further debenture for money advanced was issued to Mr. Elliott in May last, when the company was being pressed by creditors, and on June 10, the day after a winding-up petition had been presented, Mrs. Elliott received a debenture bond for £100 as remuneration for her services in the business. According to the Official Receiver, the company took over "a dwindling concern," and the result of the promotion was to relieve Mr. Elliott of his liabilities, and to give him a charge over the assets to the prejudice of the creditors.

Cases of this kind certainly prove the need of an amendment of the law. On the other hand, the losses creditors incur through the bankruptcy of such small trading companies might very often be avoided if they would take the trouble to make inquiries beforehand, especially in regard to the existence of debentures, which have to be registered at Somerset House.

A good many people are dubious as to the real intent of those advertisements which inform Mr. So-and-so that if he will communicate with Messrs. Blank he will hear of something to his advantage. A gentleman who has been so advertised for related to me his experience the other day. With glowing expectations he sought out the firm of solicitors who had inserted the notice. But his hopes soon received a dash of cold water. It seems that several years earlier he had sold a policy on his life, and the purchaser had lost sight of him, and wanted to know at the earliest possible moment when the assurance money could be drawn. The "something to his advantage" was an offer to pay him 2s. 6d. twice annually for a letter announcing where he might be found. If I had been the recipient of this magnificent offer I think I should have closed with it. I should be almost tempted to send the bi-annual letter for the pleasure of disappointing any one who was so anxiously looking forward to my funeral.

The result of the trial of two ex-officials and a number of the councillors of Gelligaer Parish Council should serve as a warning to that class of persons who seek election to public bodies with the object of feathering their own nests. When the extent of the scandal was revealed by a Local Government Board audit of the parish accounts I remarked that the affair called for drastic action. The Local Government Board was evidently of the same opinion, and an inquiry was held by means of which a wholesale robbery of the unfortunate Gelligaer ratepayers was disclosed. The plunderers have now met with their deserts in sentences ranging from five years' penal servitude to two months' imprisonment. For this result the chief credit is due to the Local Government Board for its persistence in following up the policy entered upon first in regard to the case of the West Ham Guardians for stamping out corruption in local government.

Durham, states Dr. Newsholme, medical officer to the Local Government Board, in a report just issued, has for many years had the highest death-rate from enteric fever of any county in England and Wales. Then he goes on to emphasise the fact that enteric is a dirt disease, and in Durham is chiefly due to the deplorable insanitary conditions which the various sanitary authorities take no steps to remedy. Dr. Newsholme remarks that the various bodies are incurring a most unenviable responsibility. They are indeed, and I hope Mr. John Burns will see his way to bring it home to them.

---

Local bodies are notoriously slow to move in sanitary matters, however, and a case in point is supplied by another town in the North, Preesall-with-Hackinsall. This is a Lancashire health resort just growing into popularity. Yet, reporting to the Lancashire County Council, the medical officer of health for the county reported that every ditch in the district was polluted with sewage. The Lancashire County Council has no power to do anything to remedy this scandalous state of affairs beyond calling public attention to it, as Preesall has obtained urban powers from Parliament. Now that the public is aware of Preesall's claims to be considered a health resort they will, I fancy, give it a wide berth.

The Lancashire County Council, by the way, seems to be as keen on æsthetics as on sanitation. Under the Advertisement Regulation Act of 1907 it has drafted some by-laws, the operative clause of which is as follows:—

> No advertisement shall in any of the districts hereinafter specified be exhibited on any piece of rock or cliff, or on any hoarding, board, stand, or other erection in any place visible from any highway, public footpath, or railway, so as to disfigure the natural beauty of any landscape.

The districts to which the by-laws have been made to apply include the lake district of Lancashire, and the example thus set is one which other county councils would do well to follow.

What one would like to think was a very exceptional instance of Bumble's way with a tramp was reported recently to the Shaftesbury Guardians. A wayfarer had been admitted to the Shaftesbury Workhouse, literally on his last legs, for a large ulcer encircling one leg had eaten the flesh to the bone, and the other leg was nearly as bad. In this state he had been sent out of Mere Workhouse to find his way to the next stopping place, where he arrived in a state of collapse. Unfortunately it is only too common a practice for workhouse authorities to turn out any tramp who can manage to crawl to the next refuge, lest the ratepayers should be burdened with a sick pauper. Yet the practice is as shortsighted as inhuman, for the result is that the community is ultimately saddled with an incurable invalid who might have been restored to health had he received medical treatment in time.

SUFFICIENT UNTO THE DAY.

(Though you have eyes for only one [woman] to-day, there is always danger that a second may come within your ken to-morrow.—Mr. H. S. Williams.)

Belovéd, hear my burning vow,
I love you to distraction!
At least, that's how I'm feeling now,
As at your feet I humbly bow,
A slave to your attraction.

Your beauty has enchained my heart;
I glory in the fetter;
I love the sting of Cupid's dart:
Be mine! and we will never part—
Till I love some one better.

I cannot swear to love for aye—
I say it to my sorrow;
For though my heart is true to-day,
'Tis quite impossible to say
How I may feel to-morrow!

While Mr. Henry Taylor, one of the visiting justices at Wandsworth prison, was going his rounds last Wednesday he was asked to sign papers for the removal of a prisoner from the prison infirmary to the union infirmary. Before doing so he interviewed the prisoner. He found a decrepit old man seventy-eight years of age in bed. He had been sent to prison for ten days by the Greenwich magistrate for begging. Of course he ought not to have begged, but it was his first offence; he had outlived all his friends and relatives, and he might have been let off with a word of warning. In cases like this there is too often no choice but between prison and workhouse, though shortly the extension of the Old Age Pension Act will do something more to render the exercise of that choice unnecessary.

Irish magistrates are frequently just as muddle-headed as their English brethren when they have to deal with cases of cruelty to animals. The Cloyne Bench had before them last week a farmer and a labourer in his employ charged with cruelty to five collie pups by burying them alive. The farmer was fined 5s. and the labourer got off altogether. I really do not know which is the more extraordinary, the cruelty itself or the leniency displayed by the bench to its perpetrators.

---

A man named Kavanagh was charged before a couple of the Birmingham justices last week with unmercifully beating his son, a boy of thirteen, with the buckle end of a belt. The whole of the boy's left shoulder, the centre of the back and the left hip were one mass of bruises. The man's excuse was that he believed the boy had stolen some cheques and the boy denied doing so, but there was no evidence that the boy had either stolen or lied. The plea, however, so impressed the magistrates that they merely bound the father over to keep the peace for six months. A fellow feeling makes us wondrous kind, and the bench would naturally sympathise with the father's rough and ready style of administering justice.

---

Contrast with the foregoing the punishment awarded two men brought before the Mansfield bench for poaching. They had been caught with rabbits, nets, and pegs in their possession. One was a first offender. He was sent to prison for fourteen days. The other was an old poacher, and he received two months' imprisonment and was required to find sureties for his good behaviour for six months, or in default a further two months. How the boys of Birmingham must envy the Mansfield rabbits!

---

At Motherwell, where they look upon the unspeakable Widdows as a shining light of Protestantism, the no-Popery party seem to be peculiarly unfortunate. Another of their champions, who is known as the "Kilwinning Martyr," last week found himself in the Hamilton Sheriff Court charged with disorderly conduct. It seems that on three occasions he had gone into the Roman Catholic residential neighbourhood and shouted out a variety of offensive expressions. His purpose may have been to obtain martyrdom, but he only achieved a fine of £3 and an order to find sureties to keep the peace. Conduct like this explains why, when a local Roman Catholic goes to market to obtain an occupant for an empty sty, he says that he is "going to buy a Protestant."

In another column I publish letters from Mr. Owen Seaman and the Secretary of the Normyl Treatment Association in reply to what was said in last week's Truth about the Normyl treatment. With all respect to Mr. Seaman, I do not think he is quite fair to the doctor whose evidence I gave last week. This gentleman read the praises of the treatment, and showed himself a liberal-minded man by giving it a fair trial in his own practice, waiving the professional objection to secret remedies. He treated four patients, and in all four cases the treatment was an absolute failure. Reading in the Daily Mail that the Normyl Association claimed to be successful in an immense majority of cases—whether it is 92 per cent. or 99 is not very material—he considered it to the public advantage that his experience of 100 per cent. of failures should also receive publicity. I certainly agree with him.

As I have already endeavoured to convey, I have no desire to question the value of the Normyl remedy. The only question that has been raised is whether it is as nearly infallible as some of the advertisements of its virtues suggest. Mr. Seaman is careful to point out that the 8 per cent. of failures relates only to cases which have come to the Association's knowledge. The Daily Mail article which provoked this discussion refers to "other cases that cannot be traced." Is not this the whole point? What is the value of percentages of cures among the cases of which the Association has some record, unless we know also the number of cases of which it has none? Percentages are a fruitful source of fallacy, as every statistician knows. I suggest that the Association should give us the number treated, the number whose subsequent history is known, and the number which can be verified as cured, and leave us to work out the percentages for ourselves.

"To close an estate," Mr. J. H. Watts, of 1, Westminster Mansions, London, S.W., announces by circular that he is authorised to sell 1,000 £1 fully paid shares in the Hudson Bay and Pacific Railway Development Company, Limited, at 50s. each, in lots of forty shares and upwards. I do not know whose estate Mr. Watts is closing, but there ought to be an unlimited prospect before him in this line of business if he succeeds in getting anything like 50s. apiece for the shares of the company in question. This is the concern which readers of TRUTH will remember some time ago was distributing appointments on the yet unbuilt railway to applicants for employment who were prepared to invest their cash in the undertaking. I remarked at the time that I did not see how a railway was to be built in this manner, nor do I imagine that its prospects are likely to be materially advanced by Mr. Watts's "estate-closing" operations.

Meanwhile those who may be tempted by Mr. Watts's offer will be well advised to refer to the article in TRUTH on February 2 last, where they will see that the shares now being offered at 50s. each were then being held out as bait to prospective employees for 4s. There is nothing at all to explain this enormous increase in value. Indeed, there is ample evidence in precisely the opposite direction. For one thing, I am authorised to state that on several occasions during the past few months the attention of Lord Strathcona has been directed to mis-statements which appear to have been made by or on behalf of the Hudson's Bay and Pacific Railway Company and the Hudson's Bay and Pacific Railway Development Company. In particular, upon the authority of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, Lord Strathcona wishes it to be known that there is no warrant for the statement contained in a prospectus issued by the H.B. and P.R. Development Company that the bonds which the Railway Company under its charter is authorised to issue are to be guaranteed as to principal and interest by the Canadian Government.

This statement, which is an absolute fabrication, appears in the prospectus which Mr. Watts encloses with his offer of the shares, and in the accompanying letter Mr. Watts suggests that the secretary of the company will be pleased to answer any inquiries about the company. May I therefore inquire how it is that a statement which the High Commissioner for Canada declares to be an absolute fabrication on the authority of the Canadian Prime Minister appears in the company's prospectus? I put the inquiry with fear and trembling, as when I last criticised the company's methods of getting rid of its shares, the company's solicitors demanded an unconditional withdrawal of my remarks and an apology under threat of proceedings for injuring the company's reputation. I neither withdrew nor apologised, but so far I have heard nothing of any proceedings.

---

Inquiries are continually addressed to me by persons who receive the circulars of the mail-order merchants as to how their names and addresses have been obtained. As a matter of fact, there is to-day a regular business in the sale of old letters and postcards, and a circular which has recently been sent to newspaper advertisers by the W.P. Company, 1a, Queen's Arcade, Leeds, explains how it is that people whose names are not to be found in a directory so frequently find themselves the recipients of the trick advertiser's offers. "Our reason for desiring to use old letters," state the W.P. Company, "is the wish especially to get in touch with that class of persons who are accustomed to using the mails for purchasing different articles." In other words, they are of opinion that the proverb "once bitten twice shy" does not apply to the vast army of the credulous.

---

Some one has sent me a copy of a new journal called Sequels. It is the property of the "Sequels" Skill Contest Association, which has its home at 26a, George Street, Hove. It is entirely devoted to the competition craze, such part of its eight pages as does not contain lists of prizewinners and announcements regarding competitions being made up of coupons for entrance to the competitions, each of which is to be sent to the association accompanied by a sixpenny postal order. The cover bears the announcement, "Vide the Press: It is straight."

---

I hasten to dissociate TRUTH from this reference to the press. The first page of Sequels contains the result of the third competition, the name of the winner of the first prize of £150 being given as Mr. R. Sadman, of 25, Andalus Road, Clapham. I sent a representative to verify the correctness of the announcement. He found that there is no one of the name of Sadman living there. There is, however, a Mr. R. Tadman, who really is a sad man, because, although he entered the competition and penned the winning "sequel," instead of getting £150 he has only received his sixpenny postal order back, with an intimation that not sufficient money had been received to pay out any prizes. The Association is, I understand, a Mr. S. Carter, and if Mr. Carter does not take great care his little enterprise will have a very unpleasant Sequel indeed.

---

The Weidhaas Hygienic Institute (No. 184, TRUTH Cautionary List) appears to have changed its name, for the other day I received an inquiry regarding the South Downs Hydro and Nature Cure Establishment, of which Mr. Richard Haynel is the head specialist. Judging from a booklet describing the Hydro this would seem to be an admirably equipped and up-to-date establishment, and if people go there for treatment under medical advice it is no concern of mine. But I gather that Mr. Haynel still undertakes to treat asthmatic and lung complaints by correspondence. He is not on the register of qualified medical practitioners, but even if he were, that would be no excuse for undertaking this class of practice, the dangers of which are notorious.

India is a particularly happy hunting ground for the trick advertiser, and among the most persistent in this field are Fellows and Co., of Steelhouse Lane, Birmingham (No. 590, Truth Cautionary List). Fellows and Co.'s dodge is to give a silver watch as a prize for solution of a puzzle, the gift being contingent upon the purchase of a chain. This is the trick which was first popularised by Cochrane, alias Ernest Goode, about a dozen years ago, and since that time it has nearly always been in evidence in some quarter of the globe.

Members of the theatrical profession are being favoured with a card adorned with a portrait and headed with the inquiry, "Do you know this man?" In case you do not, he mentions that his name is Rosslyn Stuart and his address 253, Brixton Road. This is incorrect. His name is Josiah Abrahams, Rosslyn Stuart being merely an alias which he has registered under the Money-lenders Act. I should think that the vanity which has induced him to distribute his portrait is rather a mistake from a business point of view. Certainly, this man does not look exactly the sort of individual one would select for a creditor.

To show what a horde of turf harpies pursue any likely dupe, an army tutor has passed on to me a batch of circulars addressed to one of his pupils. In response to a newspaper advertisement the boy applied for a free copy of a tipster's publication styled "The Midland Messenger," of Exchange Buildings, Leicester. Not only has he since been pestered with circulars from this tipster—the latest being a "private and important" communication exhorting him to back Sunbright (which was beaten) for the Liverpool Cup—but he has also had upon his track a number of other gentry in the same line of business, including "Howard Brice," 111, Jermyn Street, S.W.; "Arthur Edwards," 129, Regent Street, W.; "J. H. Tristan," of "Tristan's Racing Guide," 21, Bride Lane, E.C., and "George Yolland," of Stockport. Through the inevitable working of the law of averages rather than through their own prescience, touting tipsters of this class do occasionally give a winner; but in order, I suppose, that the boy might not benefit by such mischances he was invited to make his bets with a bookmaker named J. D. Houghton, 201, Portland Street, W., who has been pilloried in Truth as a welsher.

Just before Goodwood a tipster named A. Abel, of Retford, sent out an offer of five "certs." for the small sum of half-a-crown. "Talk about feeling as if you could dance again and again with joy," he wrote, "I will make every client who has my information feel as if he could fly when he has found all the five horses he has backed all won; they are all real moral certainties, not one of them could possibly lose unless it fell down," etc. It may comfort Abel's patrons to have his opinion of what their sensations would have been had all five horses won; but all they can know for certain is what they felt like when all five lost.

An appeal for assistance sent by a Mr. W. Sayce Woodhouse, of 28, Old Gravel Lane, London Docks, to a lady in Scotland has been forwarded to me. Mr. Woodhouse is by way of being a missionary, and superintends the Old Gravel Lane Mission, of which he gives some particulars in a leaflet he encloses with his appeal. He also gives some particulars of the results of his missionary labours as an introduction to an account of his physical and financial troubles. His physical afflictions, however, do not disable him from going about his ordinary avocations, and his financial worries are of very long standing. He states that for more than twenty years he has been engaged in mission work, and to my knowledge for quite twelve of them he has been in financial straits and appealing for relief to total strangers. Originally Woodhouse was employed as missionary by an association at Newcastle, and was highly respected. But extravagant living got him into debt, and after a little trouble, due to a misappropriation of subscriptions, he was discharged, and became a missionary on his own account. The physician is apparently unable to heal himself.

A PARLOUS PROSPECT.

What will become of all our poets in the future?

You cannot learn the Muse's trade;
A poet's born, he isn't made.
In short, by birth he's either got
The magic gift, or he has not.

The law of "Nascitur non fit"
Is one that all the world admit;
But judged by facts, apart from books;
It's not so simple as it looks.

Take A; the sacred fire he feels
Pervading him from head to heels,
And, in that sure conviction strong,
He bursts ecstatic into song.

Take B; his case is much the same.
He knows he's got the hallowed flame,
And so, responsive to its thrills,
Large volumes with his music fills.

Then each the other skims in print,
And each declares there's nothing in't;
B scoffs at A with scorn intense,
And A is smart at B's expense.

Meanwhile, the public make it clear
They think of either bard small beer;
And caustic critics, nothing loth,
Jump quite impartially on both.

So our two rivals, A and B,
Foes in all else, in this agree:
"Poor fools the public are en masse,
And every critic is an ass!"

B Milton quotes with pointed vim:
"See what his public thought of him."
A finds in Wordsworth's case his cue,
And Jeffrey's "This will never do."

Will B, then, challenge Milton's throne
When, say, a century has flown?
Will Wordsworth's bays adorn A's brow
Somewhere about the year two thou.?

I care not how that may befall.
But one point does my soul appal—
Where A and B and such-like fry
Will go to when, at last, they die.

For if (my comfort I regard)
Each man who knows himself a bard
Shall seek, when dead, the Land of Love,
There won't be standing-room above.

SCRUTATOR.

WESTERN MEN AND EASTERN MORALS.

IT is a well-known fact that Englishmen, in common with other Europeans, when they settle in distant lands evince remarkable readiness to adapt themselves to local standards of morals, bearing no relation to those by which they have been brought up. The late Mr. James Payn told a funny story of this phase of human nature. It turned, if I remember rightly, upon the confessions of one Simpson, of Bussorah. Simpson, being home for a spell after a long residence in the East, was invited to dine with the narrator, being regarded as a promising mate for one of the daughters of the house. The conversation at table happening to turn on polygamy in Persia, he electrified the company by explaining the advantages of the system as he had discovered them by experience, describing the various motives which led him after he had married one Persian lady to marry a second, and then a third, and so on, till he had acquired a remarkably well-stocked harem. A friend of mine once went shooting in British Guiana, and took with him an introduction to a Scottish planter living some distance up in the interior. He was told that the exile's only fault was that he was a Presbyterian of an austere type, having been an elder of the Kirk in his own country. My friend was consequently rather taken aback to discover the worthy Scot living in a style more befitting a Mormon than a Presbyterian elder. His experiences in the establishment of this unco guid man will not quite bear relating in detail here

I have been reminded of these and other stories of the same type by some disclosures that I had recently from a gentleman lately returned from Burma. Books of travel, and occasional works of fiction which bear the impress of being founded on fact, must have informed a certain number of the British public that the personal charm and the easy virtue of the Burmese female have rather played havoc with the morals of Britons domiciled in that portion of the seductive East. But not many can be aware of the extent to which their fellow countrymen have accommodated themselves to local manners and customs. My informant went to the country a few years ago in the service of the Bombay Burma Trading Corporation, Limited—an English company, of course, chiefly engaged in collecting and exporting teak from the Burmese forests. When he joined he was considerably older than most young men who take service with this company, and after he had been in the country a year or two he married an English lady. When he notified the corporation of his intention, he was informed that they "looked with but little favour on the marriage of so junior a man," though they did not actually forbid it; but the conditions to be understood were that the corporation would give him no special treatment in the matter of stations, and no special house allowance, etc. This he did not in the least object to. But in the course of a few months he found strong reason to believe that his marriage had had a decidedly prejudicial effect on his treatment, and apparently also his prospects, and after making a definite statement of his grievances he tendered his resignation. He came home, and the corporation on parting with him gave him an excellent testimonial, which clearly shows that if he had been unfavourably treated as he alleged, it was not in consequence of any shortcomings in the discharge of his duties.

The unpleasant part of this gentleman's allegations is that while marriage is penalised by the corporation, concubinage, which prevails widely among the staff, is tolerated, and by comparison with marriage actually encouraged. As regards the one condition, the corporation thus formulated their views in a circular issued last January:—

> As we now have among our Up-country Staff a number of married men, it seems to us that the time has arrived when it is necessary to commit to paper the attitude of the corporation towards married couples.
> 1. The corporation do not undertake to provide house accommodation for the wives of married men, nor house allowance in lieu thereof.
> 2. Married men may not take their wives on tour without first obtaining sanction from Rangoon. Any sanction obtained applies only to the particular tour for which it is requested.
> 3. The corporation cannot supply elephants, carts, coolies, etc., or in any manner assist married men in taking their wives with them on tour.

In contrast with this, observe next the attitude of the corporation towards the other condition of things, as testified to by the gentleman above-mentioned. (1) The corporation, if they do not undertake to provide house accommodation for the native concubines of their staff, make no objection to the women residing with their proprietors, and it is the general custom for them to occupy official quarters. (2) Unmarried men may take their concubines on tour without obtaining any sanction from Rangoon, and, in point of fact, habitually do so. (3) The corporation, if they do not supply elephants, carts, coolies, etc., to assist unmarried men in taking their concubines with them on tour, make no objection to elephants, carts, steam launches, coolies, etc., being used for this purpose, and this again is done regularly. In each particular, therefore, there is an official differentiation against the holy state of matrimony and in favour of the irregular relationship. After this, whatever may be the truth of the allegation that a man has been unfavourably treated in other ways because he has preferred to get married, there is nothing primâ facie incredible in the allegation. On the contrary, it seems highly probable that when it is a very general practice for officials of all grades to keep native mistresses in their quarters, and take them about with them on tour, they would feel the presence of married English ladies in the country awkward and embarrassing, and do their best to discourage it by making things uncomfortable for husbands.

I am not myself a Puritan, nor do I set myself up to judge the morals of my fellow-creatures in matters which are no affair of mine. But it appears to me that the state of things which has grown up and appears to be spreading in this particular corner of the British Empire is not one which any Englishman, however far he may be from squeamish about such things, can contemplate without some feeling of shame. It is certainly not one about which people at home should be kept in the dark, though it is not precisely a pleasant matter for public discussion. The whole bearings of the scandal are not disclosed in the few facts mentioned above. For the due appreciation of them it should be understood that large numbers of children are born of these irregular unions between Englishmen and native women. At the best the position of the Eurasian in the East is an unhappy one. What sort of a life is before the illegitimate half-caste progeny of our countrymen in Burma? The mothers may be cast off at will, and local law does not even give them the pitiful protection of our own affiliation orders. We are bragging every day in print and on platforms about our "Imperial mission" and all the rest of it. What sort of witnesses to the ennobling influences of British civilisation are all these outcast Hagars and Ishmaels from Burma?

Again, let it be remembered that the recruits to the service of companies and firms like the Bombay Burma Corporation are no more than boys. They arrive by almost every boat—scarcely out of their teens. They are assailed with the attentions of native procurers almost before they have landed. They quickly have the customs of the country brought home to them by the example of their seniors and superior officers. The company they serve, though it may "look with but little favour on the marriage of so junior a man," has not the slightest objection to his sharing his quarters with a native concubine. Can there be any wonder at the result? I can cite the case of a boy whose first half-caste offspring was born to him before he was one-and-twenty, and there is no reason to suppose he is the only one. This will be unpleasant reading to many English fathers and mothers who have rejoiced to see their sons started so young on a career full of promise in the gorgeous East. But it is well that the truth should be brought home betimes to all who may contemplate despatching their children to this unknown land. Another class who may learn something useful from what has been revealed above are the directors and shareholders of companies exploiting the remoter regions of Burma, and perhaps some other Oriental countries. They may not feel themselves answerable for the morals of all their employees; but there must be some here and there whose consciences will recognise some responsibility for the fate of English lads employed in their service, and, I should hope, for the people of the country from which their dividends are drawn, to say nothing of the credit of the British name in the eyes of the world.

PRESS MUZZLING ORDERS.

Some interesting correspondence in the Times—interesting at least to pressmen and lawyers—has followed the publication of Mr. Walter Judd's proposal for the amendment of the law of libel. No one would be happier than I if the Legislature would protect newspapers against speculative actions brought by men without means, but I have little expectation of seeing Mr. Judd's proposed Bill carried into law. Parliament will always be extremely shy—and rightly so—of doing anything to close courts of justice against a man merely because he is poor. This would inevitably be the effect of compelling the plaintiff to find security for costs when a judge in chambers held that the libel had been published in good faith and without malice. As a "Solicitor" pointed out in Wednesday's Times, many serious libels are published in good faith and without malice—I do it myself constantly—and it is neither convenient nor safe that the questions of good faith and malice should be tried on affidavit in chambers.

I made a suggestion on this subject a few weeks ago—not for the first time—apropos of Lord Mersey's very useful speech on the hardships that newspaper proprietors suffer under the present law—the proprietor of Truth more particularly. Lord Mersey favoured the conferring of some power on judges to order security for costs, and his opinion on such a point is entitled to the greatest weight. My idea is that something analogous to the procedure under Order XIV. should be adopted, but applied to the plaintiff instead of the defendant. Under this procedure, when actions are commenced for the recovery of certain classes of debts, the defendant may be called upon to satisfy a judge in chambers that he has a good cause of action, and the judge may either give summary judgment against him forthwith, or give him leave to defend on terms or unconditionally. The terms generally mean that he must bring the money into court to abide the result. I see no reason why in the case of a libel action the plaintiff should not be called upon to satisfy a judge that he really has a substantial case to lay before a jury, and the judge empowered at discretion, if not to dismiss the action unconditionally, at any rate to require security for costs to be deposited as a condition of leave to proceed further. This would not be so drastic a measure as Mr. Judd's, but it would have some considerable effect. I think the obstacle thus opposed to the freedom of a plaintiff to issue a writ on any trumpery pretext, and put the defendant to heavy expenses which the plaintiff can never pay, would relieve me of a great many of the writs to which I have to enter an appearance every year.

There is another aspect of this matter which does not seem to have received due attention, though it is one of great importance to the public. A great deal is written about the "blackmailing" of newspapers by bogus actions or threats of action. But according to my experience—which is, I think, larger than most people's—the motive of the bogus libel action in the majority of cases is neither blackmail nor a speculative hope of recovering a useful sum in damages without incurring any risk. Far more often the motive is the silencing, if only for a time, of inconvenient criticism. As I have pointed out again and again, a rogue who is engaged in any form of predatory enterprise and finds a newspaper—generally Truth—defeating him by exposure and public warnings, is able, as the law now stands, to protect himself by issuing a writ, and, with the help of a solicitor who knows his business, to extend the protection for months by dilatory proceedings of one kind or another, only retiring when he can no longer defer his appearance before a jury. In the meantime he is secure against any further notice from the paper he is suing, and practically from any other, and can pursue his nefarious designs in peace. It is obvious that this state of things puts a premium on libel actions. It is equally obvious that it operates to the injury, not only of newspaper proprietors, but of the public, by depriving them of the protection which the press gives when it speaks out openly what it knows to be true.

I am, therefore, strongly of opinion that nothing could do so much to deliver the press from bogus libel actions as depriving a writ for libel of the effect of a muzzling order. This effect depends upon the present doctrine of contempt of court. This doctrine is somewhat elastic, but, so far as I have seen, the judges have been by no means disposed to stretch it during recent years; the tendency has rather been the other way. Newspapers cannot, of course, be permitted to attack a man who is bringing an action against them in a way that is calculated to prejudice the trial of the action. Against that there must be a summary remedy. But in ordinary cases the knowledge that any libel subsequent to that sued upon would be a ground for a very heavy addition to the damages in the event of a verdict for the plaintiff would effectually prevent a repetition of the libel, unless the newspaper is very malicious, or unless the plaintiff's case is manifestly so rotten that there is nothing to be feared from a jury. I cannot here discuss precisely what might be done in the way of amending the rules regarding contempt of court in this shape. But I would strongly recommend those who desire an amendment of the libel laws to consider carefully this aspect of the question.

A PRIZE GIRL FOR THE COLONIES.

The ingenuity of my contemporaries in devising new forms of prize competitions for their readers always awakens my admiration. I wish to make this particularly clear lest it should be thought that when I find it necessary to criticise any such schemes I do so in a carping spirit. Nothing can be further from my intention, particularly when, as in this instance, I desire to call attention to the result of a little prize competition which was arranged for its girl readers by that marvellous halfpennyworth of pictures and news, the Daily Mirror. The Mirror, like some other journals of the same family, has settled beliefs on the desirability of emigration, and not long ago it published particulars and pictures of a Colonial Training School for Girls at Cosham Park, near Portsmouth, and its principal, Lady Ernestine Hunt. It arrived at the sound conclusion that for girls who contemplated emigration a practical training was eminently desirable, and it was so pleased with its discovery of Lady Ernestine's school that it offered a prize of three months' training at it to the girl reader who supplied the five best reasons for wishing to go to the Colonies. In due course the prize was awarded, the result announced, and the smiling portrait of the happy prize-winner made its appearance in the columns of the Mirror.

It was about this time that I also heard of the existence of the school from another source, and what I heard made me rub my eyes and wonder whether it was I or the editor of the Mirror who was dreaming. There was only one way of settling the question, and accordingly I arranged for a representative to pay a visit to Cosham Park and see how the prize girl was being trained for colonial life. He went. He found Cosham Park House. It is a pleasant country house standing in its own grounds within a minute's walk of the railway station. The gates of the drive stood invitingly open for any one to enter. So, too, did the doors and windows of the house when my representative arrived at it. A deep silence brooded over the building. It might have been uninhabited, had not a faint scent of Irish stew pervaded the atmosphere, while in one room a piece of music stood on an open piano. After vainly trying to find any inhabitants at the front of the house, my representative went round to the back entrance. Here, too, the doors stood invitingly open, but there was no one in kitchen or scullery. Some empty champagne and whisky bottles standing near the door gave a suggestion of the lighter side of colonial training for girls. Still, the explorer was puzzled by the absence of the scholars and teachers, and he returned to the front entrance. Then a familiar sound—the tap of a mallet on a croquet ball—struck his ear. He followed the sound, and came to a lawn where a young man and a boy were engaged in a game of croquet. He asked for Lady Ernestine. It was explained that she was away for a few days. Was there any one in charge who could give any information about the school? Dropping his mallet, the elder of the players hastened away, and in course of a few minutes succeeded in unearthing the lady who in Lady Ernestine's absence represented the whole of the staff—tutorial, managerial, and secretarial—of the establishment.

There is no necessity to go into details of the interview which followed, for my representative was quite frankly informed that the enterprise had been a failure and was no longer to be carried on. I have since heard definitely that the place has been closed and that Lady Ernestine has left. It was easy to comprehend that the enterprise was doomed to failure from the first. Lady Ernestine appears to be one of those picturesque personalities with a none too heavy sense of responsibility, to whom the conceived idea presents itself as a completed undertaking. The Mirror prize girl was to have been taught dairy work, cookery in its varied branches, dressmaking, riding, driving, how to feed and clean a horse, gardening, and a host of other things, but the only provision for the purpose that Lady Ernestine had thought it necessary to make had been a pair of horses and a couple of grooms. One other pupil besides the prize girl was in the house when my representative called, but they had both arranged to leave. Two other pupils had been there previously, but had left at short notice. The idea of a training school where you pay two to three guineas a week for the privilege of training yourself evidently did not appeal to them.

I hope that the moral of this story will not be missed by those of my contemporaries who are always in search of something new to give away. The name of a lady of title, even when she is the daughter of a marquis, is not always a guarantee that a scheme with which it is connected is all that it claims to be. Nor is it advisable to take for granted that the performance of a school prospectus is always equal to its promise. In this instance it is probably in the best interests of all parties that the scheme has come to an early end. The sort of training which girls would have received at the go-as-you-please establishment at Cosham Park would hardly have been of advantage to them either in the Colonies or at home.

THE UNWISDOM OF GOOD NATURE.

A reputation for a kind heart is the heaviest burden with which any incautious person can saddle himself. It will result almost inevitably in great loss of time and personal inconvenience. Good nature is a soft and bruisable thing in a world of shellfish, and it swims about soothing and stroking the crustacea in a very pathetic manner. When it feels inclined to be hurt or disappointed it gets under a piece of seaweed for protection, and piously invents some soothing plaint like "Virtue is its own reward" before sallying forth again to pat a cockle or scratch an oyster's back. As a marine Don Quixote it has its interest, but from the point of view of the really successful shellfish it has no importance whatever.

It is said that when one gives money to a tramp he goes away and chalks a mystic sign on the gate, which apparently acts, like a corpse in the desert, to attract all the vultures in corduroy from many miles round. Even so does the good-natured man attract those many persons who live as far as possible by getting some one else to do their work for them. There are various types among the kind-hearted, and they are all fools. It is no way to get on in the world to do things for other people, unless you have social ambitions, and take a stall at a fashionable charity bazaar to further them. Good nature has no excuse whatever, unless it is properly corrected by a sense of commercial values.

"Let me just run to the post with your letter for you," says the good-natured man, and starts off down a dusty country road at midday. It is a mile to the letter-box, and about two miles back—a phenomenon familiar to all who are acquainted with country roads. This is the same man who goes out to get you a cab on a wet night in the suburbs, just because you have been dining with him. If he is suffering from an advanced stage of good nature he will even put off his week-end in order to lend you money for yours. There are women who give days to the matching of wools for friends in the country, not because they like it, but because once they offered this service, and ever since their friends have demanded it of them as a right. "Pull out one grey hair, and ten will come to its funeral," says the old proverb. Do one good-natured thing, and a hundred will be born of it. Once a reputation for good nature is acquired, there is nothing which can save one. The little things one has been willing to do are succeeded by bigger things one doesn't like not to do, and gradually these drift along to the rapids in which one is so busy being good-natured that one has no time to enjoy oneself. There are hundreds of people who have been kept comparatively poor by their good nature, and this not the invertebrate good nature of the man who cannot say "No" for fear of what the other fellow would think, but the far more devastating quality of not being able to say "No" because it will make one feel so uncomfortable.

Praise is a very pleasant thing, and to stand high in the estimation of the world is grateful to the vast majority of mankind, but the way to achieve this is not by being consistently kind-hearted. Be consistently churlish and self-centred, and then quite suddenly, by writing a little note, or ringing up a man on the telephone, get a billet for somebody, or arrange for him a meeting with an influential person. This occasion will burst upon the world like the flower upon some sorts of cactus. It will be put into a conservatory, and people will come flocking at a shilling a head to see the wonderful plant that only blooms once in a hundred years. If it bloomed every summer they would not be nearly so excited, and if it were a monthly rose they would pluck it, put it in water, and in due course throw it away. Who thinks it wonderful and charming to see a notoriously good-tempered person smile? But when Carlyle told his servant genially that she needn't hurry about something she fled to Mrs. Carlyle and said it made her flesh creep—"It seemed such an unlikely thing for Master to say!" The good-natured person might tell people all day long not to hurry, and create no sensation whatever.

"My house is always crawling with poor relations!" said a good-natured woman one day. It didn't sound nice, but it was graphic. That is the sort of thing that happens to good-natured people. Their home is not their castle; it is an hotel for daughters of the horse-leech. A good-natured person is in the position of a doormat, on which incomers wiping their feet can discern the word "Welcome." Is it wise, is it logical, is it even sane, to put oneself into a position like that?

AWAY FROM WESTMINSTER.

TO be perfectly candid, only a very few of us remained to discuss the question whether we should or should not take a luxurious holiday until the middle of November. That engrossing topic was considered in the manner peculiar to the House—that is to say, we talked about everything else under the sun excepting the adjournment. Before it was reached the last stage of the Accession Declaration Bill had to be dealt with, and we saw something of what the Ulstermen and their friends mean when they talk about dying in the last ditch. It was not a remarkably sublime performance. Apologists may claim that in the true spirit of heroes they did not know when they were beaten, but I thought it rather a display of bad-tempered obstinacy that could lead to no purpose. Still, considering the touchiness of the subject, the debate was most creditably conducted from start to finish, with a genuine desire on both sides to avoid hurting anybody's feelings, and in the end there was a general embracing and kissing again with tears most touching to witness. After three or four hours of desultory ramblings over the field of domestic and foreign affairs, in which the Sultan of Morocco and Cadet Archer-Shee figured with almost equal prominence, the Commons quitted the scene with practical unanimity, leaving the Lords master of the situation and the whole of Bank Holiday before them.

It is typical of this topsy-turvy session that the very last minutes of the summer sitting should have smouldered into a tiny blaze between the two Houses, and that the Lords should have come off best. The point was quite a trumpery one—merely a dispute as to the date by which claims for compensation must be lodged under a Compensation Bill which everybody desired to see passed; but a few of our stalwarts were dead against letting the Peers have any say in the matter, and their zeal very nearly brought the Bill crashing to the ground like a disabled aeroplane. The formidable figure of Black Rod was actually stalking across the corridor to summon the House to hear the Royal Assent given to the measures we have passed while Mr. Byles, Mr. Barnes, and Mr. Scott were valiantly struggling to hurl back the amendment in the teeth of the Second Chamber, and their voices had hardly been hushed into sullen acquiescence when Black Rod thundered at the door with his official staff.

Thus ended the second phase of the Session of 1910, with the word Conference stamped upon its very being. Until we know what happens in the weeks immediately preceding Christmas it is impossible to appraise the Session. "Wait and See" is still our stimulating watchword. Smith Minor, confronted with the last words of the Archbishop of Paris as he fell beneath the Communard bullets, Puisse que mon sang soit le dernier versé, took the translation in his stride with, "The power of my song is in the last verse," and it is the last verse which will determine the effect and volume of this year's legislative harmonies. In the meantime, it may not be unprofitable to glance at one or two of the dominant features of the past six months, and to consider how our leaders have held their ground. Taking the three chief Parliamentary figures—Mr. Asquith, Mr. Balfour, and Mr. Redmond—each has, in his way, commanded the admiration of his supporters if we bear in mind that the triangular duel has been conducted for the most part without bullets in the pistols. By common consent, the Prime Minister has greatly strengthened his position since the opening weeks. He met Parliament under the open taunts that he could command no cohesive majority, and that his tenure of office depended upon the will and pleasure of the Opposition. With unflinching courage, equable temper, and the most dexterous diplomacy he has changed the whole course of events, and leaves for his holiday with his administration unaffected. His Budget is yet to be won, but even if he falls at this fence he will have accomplished much. In a time of truce from controversy he and his colleagues have added Acts to the Statute book which have met with general approval, while the conduct of the great Government Departments has aroused little in the way of acute criticism. His personal command over the House has grown steadily. The peculiar nature of his position called for the highest qualities of management, and when he had once extricated himself from the awkward entanglement of his Albert Hall speech he was fairly on the way to the achievement of a definite policy, even had not the lamentable death of King Edward intervened. The origin of the Conference is wrop' in mystery, but with his ardent followers below the gangway straining at the leash it required no small resolution on the part of the Prime Minister to persuade them that hostilities against the Lords must cease for the time being, at all events. Then there were the Nationalists to deal with, and Mr. Redmond is a tough customer at driving a hard bargain. For the purposes of domestic consumption, Mr. Healy may affect to deride Mr. Redmond as a tactician, but the Old Hand is of opinion that he has played his cards well and scored rather heavily in getting the Declaration Bill without having finally parted with his control over the Budget. At the beginning of the Session delicate negotiations were the order of the day, and if the Prime Minister is able to look back upon them with satisfaction it is as much as can be expected from the complexity of his surroundings. Amid many worries and difficulties he has kept an unruffled front, ever cheerily optimistic, and cracking jokes with Mr. Lloyd George and Mr. Churchill on the Treasury Bench, even when things have looked at their blackest. Mr. Asquith's personality has become a Parliamentary possession, and even this new House has quickly learned to admire him for his many and sterling gifts.

In scarcely a less degree it appreciates the versatility of Mr. Balfour's genius. His resourcefulness in debate is a matter for perennial wonder. He will stroll into the middle of a discussion, of the beginning of which he has heard nothing, and, picking up his facts en route, develop the most finely-strung arguments as a spider spins its thread. Nothing comes amiss to him, and the mere incident that he is supremely indifferent to the dull paraphernalia of dates, figures, and verbatim quotations only adds to the charm of his discourses. In a year when the Opposition has found itself deprived of its chief function of opposing, Mr. Balfour has not had much opportunity for dashing tactics and slashing attacks. The magic of Conference has converted him into Mr. Asquith's loyal coadjutor—aider and abettor, if you will—on the supreme issue of the day, and nothing has been more affecting to those who wish that brotherly love may continue than the manner in which the Leader of the Opposition has beamed and nodded while the Prime Minister has explained that the Conference is "doing as well as can be expected," as Sidney Smith said of Rogers and the infant sonnet. With his own party Mr. Balfour has had infinitely less trouble than, according to the Old Hand, was the case in the last Parliament. The Tariff Reformers are stronger in numbers and abler in debating power than the former Opposition could hope to be, and he has wisely given them their head, and only administered cold water to their fantasies by the egg-cup, whereas he used to employ a bucket. One or two of their most promising young men, such as Mr. Steel-Maitland, are high in Mr. Balfour's favour, and he has taken several opportunities of bringing them to the front in debate, and generously cheering their efforts. The youngsters are very flattered by these attentions, but the worst of it is that he is so detached in manner and speculative in mood that it is quite on the cards that he will pass his protégé in the lobby next day without recognising him.

Of Mr. Redmond we have not heard much since the beginning of the Session; his power has been felt rather than seen and heard. He moves secretly and darkly, with the true Irish liking for mysterious dealings. What will come of it all in the end can only be surmised, but at any rate Mr. Redmond may be trusted to look his part, whether in success or defeat. I do not think that Mr. O'Brien has done him much harm; at any rate, not in the House. The member for Cork is a shaggy eccentric, whereas Mr. Redmond is, for one of his race, almost phlegmatic, and the turgid O'Brienite eloquence surges round him in vain. I have been much impressed by the discipline of the Nationalists. At a nod from Mr Redmond and a beck from Mr. Patrick O'Brien, the "stocky" little Whip of the Party, they troop into the lobby and "vote just as their leaders tell 'em to." Sometimes they are dead against the Naval programme; on another evening they will just as cheerily support Mr. McKenna and his estimates. It all depends into which scale it suits Mr. Redmond to throw them, and their unquestioning obedience is a lesson in Parliamentary training. The only group of importance which does not appear to have made much headway is the Labour Party. Their morose leader, Mr. Barnes, is out of sympathy with the spirit of the House, and cannot control the soaring souls of Mr. Keir Hardie and Mr. Ramsay Macdonald. The Labour men might have been happier in the choice of their leader. As for some of us recruits to Parliament, the Old Hand is so complimentary that I should blush from modesty to record what he says.

NOTES FROM PARIS.

THEIR SPANISH MAJESTIES.

THE King of Spain, who has been once more the guest of France, continues to be a favourite. He fulfils the promises he gave when, little more than a lad, he paid his first official visit to Paris. There is something very gentlemanly in his appearance and in his acts and words, whether in trifles or important matters. Without wearing his sentiments on his sleeve, he remains open-hearted. Nobody, not M. Loubet himself, more laments the death of King Edward, who treated him almost as a son and gave him, when asked, paternal advice in constitutional statecraft. The worries of the general political situation in Spain have told on his appearance, sharpening notably the features and deepening the lines of the face.

The Combes and Briand laws in France are the indirect cause of the present strained relations between Spain and the Vatican. In the first place they led to the multitudinous dumping down on Spain of religious communities dissolved in France. These organisations are generally industrial. The Spanish communities suffer in their well-being from their rivalry in the trades they drive, and as collectors of alms and donations. So do the secular clergy. Hotel and boarding-house keepers are angry at the business competition of monasteries and convents of French origin. The reputation of the latter for culinary talent gives them a notable advantage. The intelligent class in all the great towns are against every kind of monastic or conventual institution. The King, apart from politics—which he has rather kept out of—is of a liberal nature. He had up to this crisis left affairs of State entirely to his mother, so as to throw himself into the sports of yachting, motoring, and cavalry raids over considerable distances. But now he finds that he must be in close touch with his Ministers, not to direct, but to help them in the very serious tasks they have to grapple with. He has to pay with compound interest, so to speak, the debt he incurred in not taking this course earlier. His situation is most difficult, as he may be almost said to stand alone in his Court, which could not be more reactionist than it is.

The Queen, who has given him three Infantes and an Infanta in less than five years, is too busy with family affairs to throw herself into the fight between the Government and the Vatican, but she does not escape furious attacks from the clerical Press. They do not admit her neutrality in the present crisis, and denounce her as of Protestant race. Nevertheless, she flourishes in health and might do to represent Hygeia in a tableau vivant. Her joyousness at Rambouillet seemed that of a holiday-maker in a new and exhilarating atmosphere. She is now in point of bloom just right, and while motherly is not strikingly so. In the carriage with Mme. Fallières she seemed a head higher than that lady. On their way from station to château she laughed constantly as if from the wantonness of hilarious spirits. People noticed her fine set of white teeth. Her gaiety is said to animate the Royal apartments of the Palacio Réal, an austerely grand residence. Nothing amuses her more when she sits on the balcony on the east side with Queen Christina and the children than to be pointed out to Cook's or Lunn's tourists as her mother-in-law's lady of honour. They can, when taking the air there, hear what is said by the people below.

The animation of the High Street of Rambouillet had nothing in common with that of a small Spanish town. If less picturesque, it had more fizz and sparkle. Good-will was signified by the hanging out of French and Spanish flags from all the houses. Windows and footways were thronged with sightseers from twenty miles round, all well dressed. They saw in the Queen a young woman, good-looking, and evidently heureuse en ménage. Her hat, in cloche de melon form, of fine black straw, resembled that of the Queen of Bulgaria in one feature—its monumental plumage the same colour as the hat. The motion of the carriage gave the blue-black feathers lively motion, that accorded with the general sentiment. An official who witnessed the arrival of the Royal visitors at Rambouillet thought they had a fine effect as the Queen alighted, but was sorry the slant down of the hat brim rather hid her hair. Nor did he relish the gold fringe on an overall mantle of voile de soie. This finish weighted overmuch the mantle and prevented it falling into Tanagrian folds. In looking from a window I did not see this fault, and the blue silk dress, with its rich empiècement, was well in view.

The open carriages, in the old-fashioned posting style, were similar to those used by Louis Philippe when staying at Eu, and by the Emperor Napoleon III. and his Empress at St. Cloud. One sees an equipage on this model in some of Vibert's pictures. There is no noisier turn-out; but as the noise is made by an infinite number of little brass bells it is very pleasant. The postillions who drive have long whips with short handles, which they crack lustily. They wear low top-hats of glazed leather, dark green coats with short, jaunty, little skirts, red waistcoats, doeskin shorts, high boots, and the toupet wig of a hundred or more years ago. Nothing can be more theatrical. The horses are dark grey with the shortest possible tails. Four carriages thus equipped formed the cortège, which a company of cuirassiers closed round under the command of Captain Schneider. I did not see it enter the grand courtyard of the Château de Rambouillet, but witnessed there other Royal arrivals. This courtyard is of so great an area that it looks in hot weather a Sahara. As it is completely paved with cobble stones the passage through it of many horses and carriages with tyreless wheels is extremely noisy. To put tyres on the wheels of an old-world posting vehicle would be an anachronism not to be endured. The entrance and sweep round of a cortège such as I describe is stagy, and in the country where people are apt to stagnate, really delightful.

The lunch took place in the great dining room, which is sheer above a rectangular pond of considerable size and length, with islets planted as rose gardens, but without swans or other water fowl. Is not a pond devoid of this form of life like a sea without ships? The dining room I speak of was in the time of M. Félix Faure decorated at great cost with panels, cornices, and dessus de portes representing the seasons from the standpoints of the hunter and the caterer for a chef needing a prodigal supply of fish, game, fruits, and vegetables. The ceiling is high pitched, and the water below the windows throws back the sunlight on them. This gives cheerfulness to the large and massively built room. Rambouillet was to have been the country dower residence of the Empress Eugénie. She got up some lively picnics to the neighbouring forest, ending in amusing dinners in this room. Queen Victoria, her god-daughter, will not, I suppose, have described to her the déjeuner at which she and the King had been entertained by M. and Mme. Fallières. Her Spanish Majesty on her arrival in Paris hastened to call on the ex-Empress at the Continental. The royal pair made the short journey in the President's 60-h.p. Limousine. The suite followed in another.

The King of Spain speaks French fluently. As Clemenceau once said of Louis Blanc, "His French, if correct, is his own." One may add that the King does not hesitate to coin, and the words coming from his mint are ever graphic, not to say picturesque. He also gives an unusual application to many ordinary terms. For instance, M. Fallières is a "colleague" or a "confrère." The German Emperor is, coming from his lips, "mon confrère Guillaume II."

Don Alfonso is keen on every kind of sport, and chafes at the promise he made not to indulge in that

Mr. Irons's Good Fortune.

R. A. Smith and Co., the bucket-shop keepers whom I have so frequently had occasion to pillory, have recently circulated a fac-simile of a letter which they modestly characterise as "a well-deserved tribute to our system of dealing." The letter is as follows:—

65, Chestnut Road, West Norwood, S.E.,
June 30, 1910.

Dear Sirs,—Many thanks for your cheque for £240. I take this opportunity of congratulating you on the perfection of your system of dealing and your promptness in paying.

I sent you yesterday a cheque for £80 for one of your cover transactions, and to-day received cheque as above mentioned.

A profit of £160 (on a cover of £80) in less than twenty-four hours has never been my good fortune before.—Thanking you again, I remain, faithfully yours,

James Irons.

If the writer of this letter is the man I take him to be—namely, James Provan Irons, of the same address, and formerly in business in Great Winchester Street—quite a number of people must regret that he has not more often enjoyed such good fortune. It might have averted the three appearances he has made in the bankruptcy court, the more recent being under an adjudication in April, 1909. Perhaps it would also have saved him from the unpleasant result of the proceedings at the Old Bailey in January last, when he was accused of having obtained credit without disclosing the fact that he was an undischarged bankrupt. Mr. Irons is to be congratulated upon the improvement in his circumstances which enables him to risk £80 in a speculation with R. A. Smith and Co. He is also to be congratulated upon the result. But as R. A. Smith and Co. say that this letter was "selected from hundreds of others similar," I hardly think it is a selection upon which they can be congratulated. In view of Mr. J. P. Irons's financial record, some of the hundreds of others might perhaps have been preferable. But in any case sensible people do not attach the slightest value to such testimonials. The fact that some lucky customers get profits from a bucket-shop does not in any way diminish the folly of dealing with firms of this kind, especially a firm having such a shady reputation as R. A. Smith and Co. It is a class of business in which money can be very well spent upon the maintenance of decoy ducks; and the one essential consideration for the public to bear in mind is that the bucket-shop keeper is absolutely dependent for his own gains upon the losses in which he involves his customers.

The Stampede of a Syndicate.

The desire I expressed on July 27 for some explanation regarding the disappearance of the World's Derby and Horse Stampede Syndicate from its offices in the Strand has been gratified by Mr. Keen, the late managing director and erstwhile secretary of this undertaking. A syndicate, I gather, is very much like a horse in more than one particular. In this instance, in the absence of its managing director abroad on other business it took the bit between its teeth and bolted, being scared at the sight of the bailiffs, and when the managing director returned he found his syndicate gone. It was not much of a loss to him, I fancy, for it must have been eating its head off, as there was no work for it to do. For this unfortunate result I think Mr. Keen and his co-director, Mr. Tupper, may be held guiltless of anything but the incurable optimism which almost invariably afflicts those who promote companies. The syndicate had been formed to acquire the patents for a superlative sort of merry-go-round which would put every other mechanical device of the sort into the shade. Unfortunately, when the time came, so Mr. Keen tells me, for the inventor to fulfil his contract he was unable to do so, owing to his having saddled himself with previous obligations. The money put into the syndicate had been expended, and there was nothing left. Under these circumstances Mr. Keen and Mr. Tupper, not wishing the lady to whom I referred as having put £50 into the syndicate to lose her money, gave her a charge on some promotion profits which should have been paid to them in connection with another venture. Mr. Keen assures me that these profits are certain to be paid, and that the lady will get her money back. I hope so; but then, as I said before, the company promoter is an incurable optimist.

NEW ISSUE.

The Amistad Rubber Plantations and Estates, Limited, has been formed to acquire as a going concern freehold rubber, coffee, and tropical estates in Mexico of about 29,961 acres in extent. In one estate, according to the reports, 30,000 trees tapped lightly yielded last year 8,200 lbs. of rubber, and the whole property is estimated to produce about 60,000 lbs. of rubber in the first year and in the second year 80,000 lbs. Profits are also estimated from coffee, cocoa, sugar, and other products. The property has been valued at £96,500, but the purchase consideration is £25,500 in cash and £24,000 in cash or shares. The capital of the company is £120,000 in 2s. shares, of which 750,000 are offered for subscription. There are no promotion profits.

Railways.

Copthorne.—1. You may have opportunities of selling at a profit, but the market is one liable to quick changes, and you must be prepared therefore to take risks. 2. Northern Pacific Common.

Fulwood.—Prospects not very grand. I should not be inclined to dissuade you from selling.

Harp.—A sound investment, but better not buy merely to snatch a speculator's profit.

Locky.—Not a bond I care for. Better keep what you have rather than exchange.

Medico (Oxford).—May turn out all right, but I should prefer the 5 per cent. fully guaranteed bonds of the Chilian Government.

Riach.—1. The exchange seems worth making in view of the doubt to which you refer. 2. Both fair purchases of a semi-speculative type.

Mines.

Ajax.—1. A fair holding for dividends. 2. Because of the poor returns. I expect to see some recovery in course of the next six months. 3. I have not heard a date mentioned. Argus.—1. A further purchase would be a fair speculation. 2. An amalgamation scheme is on the tapis. Await further details. 3. A highly speculative holding.

Chob.—Very much of a gamble. I should be inclined to put the additional money into something else, so as to spread the risk. Cranbourne.—Keep for the present. No. 3 might be held for dividends. Cavendish.—1. If you mean the shares of the General Mining and Finance Corporation quoted about 2½ I consider them a promising speculative purchase. 2. Better get rid of them.

Doubt.—I do not recommend the shares. Draco.—Fair speculations.

H. M. (Oxford).—Company proposes to reconstruct. Prospects uncertain, and the shares certainly cannot be regarded as a "safe investment."

Perry.—Certainly not a "safe investment." I see no reason at present to advise a purchase as a speculation. Fine.—Better exchange into something more promising.

Query.—1. Yes. 2 and 3. Fair speculations for a moderate profit.

Rodwell.—Keep No. 3. Exchange out of 1 and 2 on a favourable opportunity.

Vides-ne.—Very much of a gamble, and one I do not care to recommend.

Mixed Securities.

A. E. N. W. (Bedford).—It is a small concern that does not figure in the standard reference works. You might inquire through the local Press. 2. A mere gambling counter. At the present price I should be inclined to hold. A. C. L.—1. The company has been merged into the British and Colonial Investments, Limited. 2. Worth holding. 3. Yes, though the industry is at present under a cloud. Abed.—1. Worth holding. Latest advices are of an encouraging nature. 2. These shares are at present very much of a gamble. 3. Very speculative.

B. W.—Thanks for the bucket-shop literature. The mining shares are a fair speculation for a moderate profit.

D. P. H.—New York Telephone 4½ per cent. bonds, Port of London 4 per cent. B stock, and City of Budapest 4 per cent. bonds would make a good combination for the purpose.

Ecru.—1. I do not regard them as particularly attractive. 2 and 3. Fair speculations.

H. R.—1. It is not in the front rank, and you would perhaps be best advised to stick to one of the old-established joint-stock institutions. 2. Hopeful from a lock-up point of view.

IVY.—1. Highly speculative; my advice is still to sell. 2. Well secured.

KITCHIE.—1 and 2. Not "safe investments," but good selections among shares of the class. 3. A stock liable to big ups and downs. Now looks pretty well high enough

MEDICUS (Sunderland).—Nos. 1 and 3 are worth holding. No. 2 is a more doubtful stock, and I should be inclined to realise.

ORILLIA.—Nos. 1 and 2 are excellent. As regards 3, the debentures are redeemable at par in the event of the line being expropriated by the Government. You might, therefore, take advantage of the present price to sell.

PENSIONER.—You have a very fair lot. No. 4 is the most doubtful, as the line is practically unproved, a large portion, in fact, not yet having been built. No. 2, of course, comes into a different category to the rest, but at the present price the shares ought to be worth holding.

QUORN.—1. I am not attracted by the shares. 2. A sound holding of the semi-speculative type. 3. Worth keeping RATHBOURNE.—1. Dividend prospects in respect of your present holding are still remote, but I think you could make a better exchange than that suggested. The railway stock is highly speculative.

SABRINA.—Nos. 1 and 2 are among the soundest in the American group, and now look moderately valued. No. 3 is at present a speculative holding, and the price looks high enough for the present. No. 4 is a promising speculative holding. SELINA.—No. 1 seems secure. Neither of the other two can be called safe.

THURLBS.—1 and 2. Registered under Egyptian laws, but I believe the shareholders are liable only for the amount of their share holdings. 3. It works under an Act granted by the Canadian Government, but the shareholders' liability is limited to the face value of their shares. 4. Not safe, but good amongst high-yielding bonds. 5. A very fair investment. 6. New York Telephone 4½ per cent. bonds and Cunard Shipping 4½ per cent. debentures.

VERDANT GREEN.—Your investments have been wisely chosen, and I do not see the necessity for disturbing any.

OIL.

ANXIOUS (Limerick).—I still advise the sale of 5. Keep the others.

CRAIGEVEN.—The preference are quoted at 1s. 6d. discount. The market at present is not a very wide one. Prospects are regarded hopefully.

FOULARD.—1. Hold. 2. I do not care much for these, but they may be saleable to better advantage later on. Market at present so neglected as to be bad for a seller.

GEORGIUS.—The meeting read well, and according to latest advices the company's prospects appear bright. If you do not mind increasing your risks I see no objection to a further purchase.

OILCAKE.—All depends upon the result of developments at depth. If these turn out well the shares will go higher. Unofficial reports lately favourable.

PORTENI.—Better hold.

TRUSTFUL.—1. I should be inclined to sell both. I still think well of 2, and at present price No 3 might be kept.

UNION.—Sell both.

VESTRO.—You might get out now.

XENOPHON.—Highly speculative. I do not advise you to buy here.

RUBBER.

AMLER.—I do not advise you to cut your loss just now. Both should ultimately become fair investments. At the same time I should not recommend them for purchase just for the moment. You had better wait for better markets. A. B. (Draper's Gardens).—I consider the present managers to be perfectly "straight" men, and think that the company has a good future before it. The cutting you enclose is not disinterested. A. B. (Ashford).—Thanks for letter and comments. It is only what you might expect from a bucket-shop rag. ABBOT.—1-4. I do not recommend any of them. 5 and 6 of those mentioned in the list to which you refer may be bought as good industrial purchases at present prices. A. J. F.—Thanks for your interesting and valuable communication. I shall be glad to hear from you when there is anything fresh, as promised. ABAX.—1-2. Both are plantation companies, but neither will begin to produce until 1912. 3. The market expect a dividend of about 25 per cent. in respect of the current year. Probably there will be a definite announcement on the subject during the next few months. ABSENS.—The annual report will be issued in a few weeks' time. You ought to be able to take a profit if you wish to before the end of the year, but if you can hang on until next year the profit should be much greater. ASH.—1 and 2. Yes. 3. No. Wait for a recovery to the price you gave, and in the meantime take the magnificent dividend provided by the present output. 2. Not at all promising. ACETONE.—1. The price at the time of writing is slightly under par for the 2s. share, but there is really very little market, and it is a concern best left alone. 2-3. Both these companies are much better, but they will not be worth buying at present. AN ADMIRER.—You are mistaken in thinking that there is no market for the shares. There are constant dealings. See first part of the reply to "A. B. (Draper's Gardens)." ALLAGAR.—You may average all of them with the exception of 4, of which I should not buy more.

BALLYKELLY.—1-2. Keep what you have, but do not average at present. 3. I should say, "Don't." BLUNT.—I do not care to fix a selling limit, but I think you ought to see a good profit within the next twelve months. BERKS.—1. I am afraid I cannot give you much encouragement with regard to this share. I do not think the prospects are promising, and I advise you to sell when you get the chance. 2. These should turn out well. BEPPO.—1. Retain for recovery. Information should be published shortly regarding new additions. 2-3. You need not be anxious about these two. Whatever the price of rubber becomes you will always have a good investment while you hold these shares. BRAD.—Of the two companies I prefer Highlands at present prices. I should buy these rather than take more of the first-named just now. Of course, the Highlands capital is much larger, but so is the acreage both planted and in reserve. BARTER.—You give me no clue as regards the length of time your certificate has been outstanding. If more than two months certainly write to the secretary and complain. BIN.—1. Too early to work out annual income with certainty, and I cannot identify the third company on account of abbreviated title. 2. You could keep them all for investment.

CHIDDINGFOLD.—1. I regard this as a promising company on its merits generally, but from the special point of view which you mention it is not easy to form an opinion, as the officials at the office are not at all communicative on the subject. 2. Very little market for them. They are not the class of share that I care to recommend, but if you have them do not try to sell just now; you will probably do better by waiting. CAVEHILL.—You might hold these for about 4s. premium. CLISSOLD.—I regard 3, 4, and 6 as good speculative investments, and 1 and 5 as less promising. I should take a profit on 2 if I could when markets recover. CARAVAN.—Hold for a profit. CHAGFORD.—There is a very simple solution to what you naturally consider such a cryptic utterance on the part of the secretary. The first shipment contains some rubber which may not be a fair sample on account of the coolies being fresh to the work and machinery, but after a few shipments have been made they will have got into their stride. CAPELLA.—There can be no results from the Nyassa property until the end of this year, but I advise you not to sacrifice your shares. The other company you mention should begin tapping in a few months' time. CATAMARCA.—1-2. Average your Malaccas. 3. This is very second-rate. Wait a month or two, then sell and buy the shares mentioned in your second query. CRANBOURNE.—You have a good speculative list of shares, all of which should improve with better markets. 1. Should pay a dividend next year. 2. Is already a dividend payer. 3. In 1912. 4. Perhaps next year. 5. In 1913. 6. I have no information about this company. Where did you get the shares? CAER BADOU.—1. I should average. 2. See reply to "Omen." CASTELL.—1. No. 2. You are entitled to the dividend. 3 Beverleys. CAVAN.—I think it is quite likely that your price will be exceeded this year. As to the other point you raise you need not be anxious. It is perfectly clear that the agitation of which you have heard is only a case of some one trying to get something for nothing.

DUTCHMAN.—I should retain 2 until I could get a small profit, but 1 and 3 I should sell on a market revival, as their future is not promising. DAVID.—1. You bought these at a price which you will probably not see again for a very long time. Make up your mind to get rid of them when markets become active. 2. These should recover and prove a good investment. 3. Mincing Lane has a high opinion of this estate, but you will have to wait rather a long time for a dividend. I should retain these shares for the present. DORE.—1-2. These are shares that I should not buy. If you hold them you will do well to make an exchange when you get the opportunity.

EXMOUTH.—These pay you at the rate of 10 per cent. on your outlay at the present price, on the basis of last year's dividend. I think you would do better to buy Linggis, which yield about 5½ per cent. on a similar basis, as in this case there is a little more to go for in the future. EXPRESS.—1. Beverley Tea and Rubber. 2-3. Being the first transaction, it would, perhaps, be good policy to adopt that method of procedure. ELMBANK.—1 and 3. Both these may be safely held for a profit. 2. No market. You will be lucky if you get your money back. Wait for better markets, then try to sell. ECHO.—1. A dividend expected during the next few months. 2. Probably the best-managed trust company. 3. A good concern. You need not worry about your rubber holdings if these are all you have. ETUDIANTE.—What you have been told is no doubt true. The only thing to do now is to await a market revival. I should not worry so much about the shortcomings as the others.

FAITH.—1. These should certainly be kept until markets revive. 2. Not dear at the price, but I think that you might do better. 3. A promising speculative investment at the price, but I do not care in the present condition of markets to fix selling limits. FAD.—1. Do not keep this as a permanent investment. 2. Perhaps the best share in the rubber list. Do not sell under 3 shillings, as there is a big investment for capital, in addition to giving you a handsome yield now. 3. Take a small profit. These answers are in reply to the questions at the end of your letter. Regarding your detailed list, the shares mentioned are promising, with the exception of 3, 7, and 8. Take an early opportunity of exchanging these. FEATS.—1. Yes. "Honestly." Thousands of shares have been taken off the market recently by those who are familiar with the estates. 2. See TRUTH of last week under "Scrutator." FIZZER.—1. You had better keep these for a time, but make up your mind to sell during the autumn. 2. You can keep these for investment. FOOTPAD.—1-3. All good to hold for dividends. FOULARD.—There is no speculation in the shares, hence the low quotation, but I had better lock them up, taking no notice of them until the estates come into bearing. As this time approaches it will be seen that the shares form a good permanent investment, and the price will improve accordingly. F. L.—Yes, I should average now. FABIAN.—1. In good hands, but you must not expect a dividend for about two years. 2. Not very promising. 3. A good land company, but I do not expect any great advance in the price in the near future. It will be well to retain all these for the present. FEEDALL.—1. Batu Caves, Consolidated Malay, Federated Selangor, Linggi. 2. About 10 per cent. 3. Anglo-Malays last year paid 80 per cent. and London Asiatic 12½ per cent. FISHERGATE.—You can relieve yourself about joining in this agitation, but in the first place it is unnecessary, as the controllers of the company are respectable people, who may be trusted to do all that is possible in the interests of the shareholders; and, secondly, you will probably make yourself responsible for costs. 2. Here again you have only one certainty—viz., that your liability for the 2s. per share unissued is doubtless a very unsatisfactory concern, but it will pay you to let someone else pull the chestnuts out of the fire. 3. Of course, if you can wait and get them back at a lower price than the present it will be to your advantage, but the fact is many people did the same as you did, and jobbers sold short, so that genuine buyers cannot get their shares delivered. This does not indicate a further fall in the near future. FOX.—1. Hold for the guaranteed dividend. 2. A very good share. Hold for recovery. 3. You indicate this company by one word, which is, I believe, incorrectly spelt. If you have written it accurately, then I cannot trace the company at all. Please repeat your inquiry in full and not abbreviate the name. FIRST MAN.—The only shares worth keeping as a lock-up are numbers 1 and 5. 2 is a doubtful concern, while 3 and 4 have the reputation of resembling wild cats. FULWOOD.—My opinion is that you will be unwise to place any reliance in the bucket-shop sheet which you enclose. See first reply to "Fishergate."

GERTRUDE.—I will adopt your suggestion at the earliest opportunity. In the meantime, you need not be anxious about your shares. They recover in the next few months. GREENHORN.—The fact that the option certificate was issued after you had sold your shares is a proof that you must give it up to the buyer, as requested by the broker. GOVAN.—1. I regret that I have no information regarding the company you name, as there is no market in the shares for Malay stocks. It hardly comes within my province to say whether it is advisable for you to let your brother in Singapore buy shares in local rubber companies. If you make investments of this kind you must trust entirely to his knowledge of the companies, and let him sell out there when you wish to realise. 2. A fairly cheap investment at present price.

HOPE DEFERRED.—Only this time next year, at all events, you should be able to take a profit. Average if you can. H. K., JUN.—1. Is good enough to hold for dividends. 2. A fair purchase at present price, but there are better. 3. I am told that these are going better with a return of market activity. When you can get out without loss do so. H. B. T.—Many thanks for your letter and the enclosure from which it appears that this business is being made on a healthy basis. HAYMAJ.—1. I should not hold this share as a permanent investment. 2. Not very attractive. 3. Should go better. You do not say whether you hold the shares. HIGHLAND.—This company is located in the office of a firm whose name is held in high respect in the City of London, but you may rely upon it that they would not stoop to shady tricks. Do not sell your shares now. HARP.—You evidently want to gamble, but a purchase such as you suggest is not the one that I should advise a lady to make. If you would like an investment in rubber shares to give you a fair return, and are willing to eliminate the gold-finding factor, please send me a query with the necessary modifications. HOMER.—I believe that you are a fairly constant reader and correspondent, and consequently I cannot understand your having bought any rubber shares with an overdraft. Almost every week for several months I have pointed out the folly of this. Had you bought one-half these shares you now hold you would have no disposers with borrowed capital, and could have faced a waiting period with equanimity. All the shares you hold are good rubber investments, and you should now await a revival. I expect numbers 3 and 5 to move upwards first. HARRY.—You hold three speculative shares, of which I have an unfavourable opinion. Wait for better markets and then sell. 2. This has the best chance of an advance in the near future, but do not hold too long.

IGNOTA.—1. If you mean the Madagascar Rubber Company, Limited, the address is 3, Moorgate Street, London, E.C. 2. No. 3. It is more speculative. INFELIX.—I think you will be able to sell at a profit or get a good return "within a year or two." (a) See reply to "Omen." (b) The company is doing a remunerative business, and should pay a good dividend this year. (c) For results here you will probably have to wait until 1912, but the estates are said to be developing excellently. IVY.—1-2. You will no doubt see both these back to the price you gave before this time next year. They are in the front rank. 3. This is an outside broker's counter, and will never be a profitable investment. Sell when you can.

JAN.—All good to hold, and likely to appreciate in the future.

its work make a much more modest claim, namely, that only eight per cent. of failures have come within their knowledge. And, when we allow for the thousands of cases in which the treatment has been used, it would not seem very extraordinary that out of that 8 per cent. there should be, within the experience of one doctor, a series of four failures without any successes. Scores and scores of medical men, naturally prejudiced at first against the treatment, could give remarkable testimony on the other side. I admit that there must be many cases of failure which do not come within our cognisance; but, in answer to your medical friend's contention that "in the ordinary course of events the uncured inebriates would not communicate their failure to combat their craving to those who were striving to assist them," there is the obvious reply that this reticence would in many cases be due to the patient's knowledge that he himself had rendered the treatment ineffective by his own neglect of the regulations imposed; and that in cases where there had been failure after a strict obedience to the regulations the tendency would be for the patient to write and protest that his money had been wasted on a useless drug.

I am tempted to ask myself what was the motive of your correspondent in seeking publicity for his "100 per cent." of failures; and I find no satisfactory answer. I find no good purpose served—not even the cause of truth—since a solitary experience on a scale so relatively trivial is practically valueless as a contribution to the facts; and what little value it might have had is made infinitesimal by the reflection that the writer is anonymous—as far as your readers are concerned—and that we have no guarantee that the right conditions were observed. Had there been any suspicion of an attempt on the part of the Normyl Association to make private capital out of a worthless treatment I could understand his desire to warn the public. But neither the success of the treatment nor the bona fides of the association, a purely honorary body, is called in question by any informed person. If your correspondent had, to the general knowledge, done splendid work without personal profit in the cure, let us say, of consumption, and if the few cures that I had commended to him happened by exceptional experience to turn out failures, I should consider it a thankless task to throw doubt upon his usefulness by a public statement of these failures. If the cause of truth were served by such a statement it would be a very poor service.—Yours faithfully,

OWEN SEAMAN.

ROUND THE MARKETS.

HOLIDAY LANGUOR--YANKEES AND DERELICT SYNDICATES —THE OUTLOOK—POLITICS THE BUGBEAR—HOME SECURITIES STILL UNHONOURED AND UNSUNG—FOREIGN BONDS AND RAILS.

APART from a mild little revival in South Africans—more especially Rhodesians—the Stock markets last week were not in a very good humour. Quotations in some directions moved about rather sharply without there being much business behind the movements. It was simply an illustration of the fact that the narrower the market the wider the price movement produced by a given volume of selling or buying. Of course, too much must never be expected of the Stock Exchange in August --brokers and jobbers, like other business men, want a holiday—but the present becalmed state of the House is in striking contrast to the boom times experienced early in the year, and probably is to a very large extent the natural sequel to those times, for it is essential not to forget the enormous output of capital during the first half of this year, and the consequently heavy manner in which the public is now loaded up.

Americans have once more been a paramount influence upon other markets. At one time Yankees suffered a violent break, which was apparently due to the forced liquidation of another syndicate, for which the stronger men in Wall Street had been "gunning." With this derelict understood to have been taken charge of, the market assumed a more healthy aspect. The New York Money market, too, has worked into a comparatively comfortable condition, and with prices of shares now down to much more reasonable levels than those prevailing in the "prosperity boom," a good many people are wondering whether the time has not come to buy. Certainly the yields upon standard dividend payers like Atchisons, Milwaukees, Illinois Centrals, Northern Pacifics, Great Northerns, and Union Pacifics are enough to make the shares appear eligible speculative investments. The chief obstacle, however, to any settled Yankee market yet awhile is politics. Recent developments in the political world have made it increasingly likely that the next Government in the United States will be a Democratic Government, and that spells tariff reform of the kind which the trusts (built up as they have been in a hot-house of monopoly barricaded by huge tariff walls) stand in awe. Thus, I cannot foresee a strong American market yet awhile, though it is not unlikely that good rallies will occur from time to time, if only in order to enable the big houses that have taken over bankrupt stock to lighten their loads.

Home Securities remain badly out of favour. Old hands in the Stock Exchange cannot help contrasting the apathy of the public to the recent splendid dividends declared by English Railways with what would have happened upon similar announcements a few years ago. But for the present, as the public refuses to be tempted by yields of 5 per cent. upon English Railways, and what is of more importance nobody strong enough comes forward to give the market a lead, little practical purpose is served by dwelling upon the past. It is enough to put on record that our railways are now doing well, as a result both of good trade and the adoption of a saner policy of interworking; that the general outlook continues bright and that prices are not much above the low records. When public sentiment towards home securities changes, as change it will before we are much older, these facts will become real ammunition for the "bull" party.

Foreign bonds have pursued an aimless course, prices, generally speaking, having reached a level that leaves no room for further appreciation. Spanish Fours have been affected by the religious dispute in Spain, but this matter has not disturbed other Continental Government securities. Holders of Colombian External 3 per Cent. Bonds have been paid the overdue July coupon, but the July interest upon the various railway bonds and debentures guaranteed by the State is still outstanding. The Ecuador Government, too, has been unable so far to find the wherewithal to meet the July interest upon Ecuador Salt bonds or Guayaquil and Quito Railway Bonds. South American Rails generally have been steady. Another poor traffic was published by the Leopoldine Railway, but this is explained by the fact that the coffee crop is later this year than in 1909. The new harvest, however, is turning out a good one, so that holders of Leopoldinas need feel no apprehension.

RAILWAYS.

QUEBEC AND LAKE ST. JOHN—CANADIAN NORTHERN'S REVISED TERMS ACCEPTED—END OF THE GRAND TRUNK STRIKE—CANADIAN PACIFIC'S RECORD YEAR.

After negotiations extending over about six months a satisfactory settlement has been arrived at between the bondholders in the Quebec and Lake St. John Railway and the Canadian Northern Railway. It may be remembered that in January last an offer was made by the latter concern to the Quebec bondholders which, on account both of the terms and the absence of time given for their consideration, was rejected, amidst a good deal of heated controversy. Since that time two committees representing the Quebec bondholders have been at work investigating the position of the railway, and conferring with representatives of the Canadian Northern, and as an outcome revised terms have been secured, which were agreed to by the requisite majorities at meetings of bondholders held on Monday. The conversion as originally planned is to take the form of an exchange of existing Quebec and Lake St. John bonds for new 4 per cent. debenture stock, bearing the guarantee of the Canadian Northern. The 4 per cent. prior lien bonds will be exchanged at par, as previously proposed, but holders of the first mortgage bonds and of the income bonds, instead of receiving only 60 and 10 per cent. new stock, are to be allotted 70 and 13 per cent. respectively. The new stock is to carry interest as from January 1, 1911, and it is a condition of the bargain that all unredeemed coupons upon the existing Quebec bonds are to be surrendered, with the exception of the April, 1910, coupon on the prior lien bonds. From the point of view of both parties the arrangement now agreed to is a desirable one. The bondholders of the Quebec and Lake St. John, left to work their line themselves, without the co-operation of the Canadian Northern, would have been in an awkward position; absorption by the larger company was the natural step, while in the interests of the Canadian Northern it was wanted, if only on account of the valuable terminal facilities at Quebec possessed by the Quebec and Lake St. John.

Shareholders in the Grand Trunk Railway heard with relief that the strike on the company's system had been settled. The agreement has been reached upon a basis of compromise, and, as not infrequently happens, both sides are claiming a victory. The men demanded immediate advances in wages ranging in some cases up to 45 per cent. The company has granted an advance to take effect as from May 1 last of about 18 per cent., and this revised scale is to continue in force up to the end of 1911, when the company will make effective the standard rates for the train and yards service that are now in force on Canadian Pacific lines east of Fort William. The immediate addition to the wages bill is estimated at the rate of about £75,000 per annum, which is equivalent to 1 per cent. upon Trunk third preference. Further, the strike, while it lasted, of course entailed a considerable loss of traffic. On the combined system there was a decline for the last ten days of July amounting to £92,000, which converts the previous increase in the aggregate receipts from July 1 into a decrease of £64,000. Fortunately, with general business in the company's territory in a flourishing state, neither the temporary drop in receipts nor the promised addition to expenses need be taken very seriously, though they postpone still further the time when Trunk thirds will be getting their full 4 per cent.

The Canadian Pacific finished up its financial year in excellent style. The statement for the month of June shows that out of an increase of $2,258,000 in gross receipts, $829,000 was retained as additional net earnings, the advance in working expenses having been $1,429,000. For the twelve months the company's earnings attain to a new high record. Net receipts amounted to $33,840,000, or an increase of $10,884,000. The company has thus earned fully 12 per cent. upon its $180,000,000 ordinary capital, including the $30,000,000 issued in November last, but which is not yet fully paid and does not this year rank for twelve months' dividend. Having regard, however, to the probability of a higher dividend reviving the question of a revision of freight rates the company is extremely unlikely to alter its previous rate of distribution, namely, 6 per cent. from railway and steamship earnings and 1 per cent. from the land funds. On a 7 per cent. basis the yield upon Canadas at present price is only a little over 3⅝ per cent., but this is, of course, without allowing for the possibility of future capital issues on terms including bonuses to the proprietors, or without taking into account the shareholders' reversionary rights to the company's land holdings, which alone are an asset of immense value.

More Home Railway Dividends—The Brum's Splendid Result—General Survey of the Half-Year—Some 5 per Cent. Yields.

The Home Railway dividend season wound up in fine style with the declarations of the North-Western and Great Western companies. For details of the half-year's working we must await the reports, but one thing stands out pretty clear from the increased distributions made by the leading railways, and that is that the policy of co-operation that has ousted the former régime of bitter rivalry is having very real results in increasing net profits. The North-Western is paying at the rate of 5½ per cent. per annum, putting £100,000 to reserve, and carrying forward £100,000. A year ago the dividend was 4¾, and, while nothing was placed to reserve, the balance forward was only £12,000 more. The increased dividend takes £160,000. Published gross traffics showed an increase of £165,000, but the real gain was £219,312, while working expenses actually showed a small decrease, raising the gain in net revenue to £227,568, and after allowing liberally for under-publication it is evident that the great bulk of the addition to gross takings has been retained in net. In the December half of 1909 the North-Western paid 7 per cent., so that with the 5½ per cent. now declared the distribution for the past year is 6¼ per cent. At 137 cum div. the yield on Brums is therefore £4 13s., with reasonable prospects of a higher rate being paid next February.

The Great Western is distributing at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum, as compared with 3½ per cent. a year ago, and carrying forward £96,900 against £74,500. The addition to dividend and carry forward together account for £110,000. Gross receipts expanded by £147,390, of which only the moderate amount of £36,131 was absorbed by additional expenditure. The Great Western six months ago paid at the rate of 7 per cent., so that the 4 per cent. now declared makes the dividend for the past twelve months 5½ per cent., and the yield on Westerns at 123 cum div. 4½ per cent. At this price the stock ought to be a good purchase for investment. The company has about come to the end of its long period of capital expenditure upon its Irish service and its new route to Birmingham, and has yet to feel the full addition to receipts arising therefrom. It has besides hardly begun yet to obtain the benefit that will accrue from the working arrangement recently entered into with the South-Western.

The little North London, in consequence largely of the scheme for closer working with the North-Western, continues to reduce expenses in satisfactory fashion. The company has declared a dividend of 5 per cent., as compared with 4 per cent., and has put £5,000 to reserve, against nothing at this time a year ago. The extra dividend and appropriation involve the relatively large sum of £16,000, although the company was in the matter of gross receipts assisted to the extent of only an additional £2,023.

Now that the dividend record is complete, it is of interest to summarise the individual results of the English lines, and show how they compare with those for the corresponding half of 1909:—

It will be seen that in several cases returns of 5 per cent. or thereabouts are obtainable on steady dividend-paying stocks. It is certainly a novelty to see Home

Rails on a 5 per cent. basis, more especially with conditions pointing to better things in the near future. That the market has not responded more readily to the good dividends just declared is due principally to the fact that it is still out of fashion. It also arises from the continued uncertainty over the labour outlook, the fears of the capitalist being aroused afresh by the action of a section of the men in the shipbuilding trade, whose striking without notice led to threats of a general lock-out. Given a clearer labour outlook there seems reason to look for some improvement in Home Rails in the course of the current half-year.

RUBBER.

The American Position—Batu Tiga—Madagascar.

As in most other departments, quotations in the rubber market have been left to take care of themselves during the holidays. Quite apart from the rubber trade, much uncertainty still exists, and many are the conflicting rumours which have been afloat as to the position of American trade generally. Although there has no doubt been some ground for apprehension, a danger foreseen seldom leads to any real trouble, and a belief now prevails that, by a temporary curtailment of activity, American trade has been spared from any serious reverse. So far as the rubber position is concerned, the figures recently to hand show at least that the American is as anxious as ever to possess as many motor-cars as he can afford to pay for, and while the United States output of new cars for 1909 is put at 82,000, the estimated production for 1910 is about 210,000, and for 1911 the estimate reaches the enormous figure of 300,000. The increased consumption thus foreshadowed cannot be without its effect upon the raw rubber market, and would appear to furnish good ground for the opinion that with the autumn renewal of activity prices for the commodity should move in an upward direction.

The writer of an article in The Times, after showing that for the past six months American imports of rubber from Belgium, France, and Germany amount to 3,985 tons as against 1,744 tons for the corresponding period of last year, draws from these figures the conclusion that the United States have not been working on short supplies. Such a deduction might be sound enough if America drew a large proportion of her supply viâ the countries mentioned, but it is well known that the United States draw more than one-half of their supplies direct from Brazil. The figures given below compare the United States direct Brazilian shipments for the past six months with the shipments in the corresponding months of 1907, 1908, and 1909:—

Shipments of Rubber from Brazil to America.

| Month. | 1910. Tons. | 1909. Tons. | 1908. Tons. | 1907. Tons. |
|---|---|---|---|---|
| February ..... | 3,000 | 2,480 | 1,960 | 2,740 |
| March ..... | 1,280 | 1,970 | 1,420 | 2,450 |
| April ..... | 470 | 1,900 | 1,050 | 2,000 |
| May ..... | 270 | 1,160 | 1,950 | 1,090 |
| June ..... | 480 | 920 | 1,110 | 930 |
| July ..... | 890 | 720 | 840 | 450 |
| Totals ... | 6,390 | 9,150 | 8,330 | 9,660 |

It will be noticed that during April and May, when rubber was fetching record prices, the American shipments fell to abnormally low figures, and that notwithstanding a largely increased trade demand for the raw article, the imports for the past six months fell short in no small degree of the imports for each of the previous three years. Now, American consumers may have been using a larger quantity of inferior rubbers, but that they have for some months been working on short supplies can hardly be questioned in the light of the comparative table of visible stocks, which I give below:—

American Stocks of Para Rubber.

| Visible Supply at End of Month. | 1910. Tons. | 1909. Tons. | 1908. Tons. | 1907. Tons. |
|---|---|---|---|---|
| February ..... | 150 | 600 | 320 | 170 |
| March ..... | 260 | 1,000 | 620 | 240 |
| April ..... | 90 | 970 | 820 | 505 |
| May ..... | 110 | 630 | 670 | 660 |
| June ..... | 140 | 790 | 510 | 570 |
| July ..... | 310 | 520 | 510 | 530 |

Some appreciable increase, it is true, is apparent in the dealers' stocks for last month, but from every available source of information I gather that the supplies in the hands of the great manufacturing concerns are as low as ever, and I can see no reason for altering my opinion that the demand for the new crop must result in heavy buying at increasing prices.

Investors, it would seem, have but little to lose by buying shares in rubber plantation companies at present quotations, for, with the statistical position so inherently sound, and in view of the magnificent profits which have during the past six months been already secured by the producing companies, a continuance of raw rubber at the present level for the remainder of the year would provide dividends sufficiently handsome to show excellent returns at present prices; while it cannot be doubted that any effort on the part of American consumers to replenish their depleted stocks would result in an increase in the price of rubber, which would soon be reflected in improved quotations for the shares. The present condition of the share market may be regarded as the effect rather of the recent outburst of over-speculation and of the throwing overboard of good shares by disappointed speculators than of any serious alteration in the position, and the exaggerated fears of timid holders and weak speculators are in strong contrast to the undiminished confidence, based on broader views and wider knowledge, which is displayed by all who have seriously studied the solid attractions of rubber as an investment.

Investors should take advantage of lifeless markets to average their holdings of Linggis, Malaccas, and Kuala Lumpurs. The contemplated extension of the Anglo-Malay planted area will materially strengthen the future position of this company, and it is unfortunate that the Cicely directors cannot by the adoption of a similar policy provide their shareholders with a reserve area of young rubber, the future returns from which would make a desirable addition to that company's somewhat weak resources. To my list of promising investments may be added Batu Tiga, an analysis of whose future prospects I append.

The company's capital, after allowing for the conversion of the debenture issue, may be called £70,000, the market valuation of which at 5¼ amounts to £367,500. There is an outstanding liability to the vendors of about £8,400, and the estate has been hitherto regarded as somewhat backward. The substantial increase now shown in the output points, however, to the rapid progress which has been made of late, and as the share is obtainable on a basis of less than six years' purchase I feel every confidence in recommending it to the attention of my readers.

The further shipment of rubber announced by the Madagascar Company brings the total shipments to date up to 33,369 lbs., and the remarkable rapidity with which the difficulties incidental to a new enterprise are being surmounted augurs well for the future of this promising company. In far too many of the flotations which were made during the boom the public were invited to take all the risk while the promoters secured all the profit; and a point which appealed strongly to me on the flotation of Madagascar was the fact that out of a capital of £350,000 only £8,000 was payable in cash for the grants and rights acquired by the company, while the preference shareholders, who supplied the £50,000 (mainly for working capital), were given a preferential charge on the company's vast estate of 212,000 acres. And in addition to being entitled to a return of 100 per cent. from the earnings of the company, they were afterwards to receive in perpetuity a share of the profits which may well amount to 15 per cent. per annum more than the dividend on the vendors' ordinary shares. Not only was the flotation entirely free from promoter's plunder, but the public were protected from loss during the development stages by the pledge of all the property rights and future opportunities controlled by the enterprise, and they were reserved an exceptionally large share of the profits when success had eventually been established. The vendors, in fact, who knew all about the investment, looked not to the public for their profit, but solely to the enterprise itself, and in postponing their own rights to those of the investor they showed that confidence in the future of the company which is now speedily being realised. It would be difficult to find a cleaner promotion or a more promising wild-rubber investment than Madagascar, for which, as my readers may remember, the London Venture Corporation were responsible. With the initial difficulties already overcome, and a substantial bonus in sight, my readers would do well to add to their holdings of Madagascar before the quotation advances.

The Vine and General Rubber Trust is another company issued under the same auspices which followed the commendable practice of issuing to the public shares enjoying a preferential right over the vendors' ordinary shares. As the company made a substantial profit in cash and shares on the flotation of its first subsidiary, this year's 10 per cent. preference dividend would appear to be already secure, and further profits may be expected from the flotations which are in readiness for the coming autumn. The recent attack on the validity of the company's patents may be entirely disregarded, and appears to have been made in ignorance of the fact that the patent authorities of both Germany and the United States have already decided that the Guiguet invention does not infringe Arnaud's old patent.

The market is short of Jequiés and Crude Rubbers, and jobbers are asking for time for the delivery of the shares. I strongly urge all purchasers whose transfers are overdue to write immediately to their brokers insisting upon the shares being bought in. The bears have had a good innings, and it is quite time they were squeezed.

British Guiana Balata Company.

On July 20 I drew attention to some statements of a serious character in reference to the British Guiana Balata Company which had appeared in the Demerara Daily Argosy. The company was formed to acquire fourteen licences granted by the British Guiana Government for the collection of rubber and balata over an area of 448,000 acres on the Essequibo river. For these the company was to pay £25,000 in cash and shares to the promoter and vendor, Captain Brickhill. This gentleman had obtained an option to purchase the licences from a Mr. Veerasawmy for £5,000, the option money paid being £500. According to the correspondence in my Demerara contemporary the purchase money was not forthcoming on a date arranged, and Mr. Veerasawmy's agreement for sale of the licences was thereupon terminated. The matter was obviously one demanding the serious attention of the board of directors, and I trusted that they might be able to show that Mr. Veerasawmy was mistaken in supposing that the agreement for sale had been rendered null and void. This appears to be the case from the following letter which I have received from the company's solicitors, and to which I am pleased to give publicity:—

17, Throgmorton Avenue, London, E.C.,
August 2, 1910.

Dear Sir,—The attention of the board has been drawn to the paragraph appearing in your issue of the 20th ult. relating to this company.

It is quite true that Mr. Veerasawmy has refused to transfer the licences, but in our opinion he has no justification whatever for so doing.

The deposit of £500 referred to in Clause 3 of the agreement entered into by Mr. Veerasawmy was duly made, and in pursuance of the provisions of Clause 5 of that agreement Captain Bricknill was given an option to purchase the fourteen licences, which option had to be exercised at any time before June 10, 1910. The option was duly exercised, and it was then for Mr. Veerasawmy to take steps under the agreement to advertise the transfers of the licences. The company duly transmitted the purchase consideration to bank in British Guiana, with instructions to pay the same out to Mr. Veerasawmy against transfer of the licences.

We believe that Mr. Veerasawmy has misconstrued the agreement and assumed that the above date of June 10, 1910, was the date for completion.

No date for completion was fixed by the agreement, and in the absence of any date the purchasers would be allowed a reasonable time after the exercise of the option within which to complete.

From a cable we have received from the company's lawyers in British Guiana the transfers of the licences have now been advertised, and we gather Mr. Veerasawmy is willing to complete the purchase.

We shall be glad if you will give publicity to the statements we have made in this letter in your next issue.—Yours truly,
Ashurst, Morris, Crisp and Co.

MINES.

Further Progress Towards Convalescence—The Randfontein Group—Bantjes Ready to Start Crushing—Chartered Revival.

On reopening after the Bank Holiday the mining markets had a sharp relapse, which caused some anxiety, but it proved little more than a "mauvais quart d'heure," and for the rest of the week South Africans, at any rate, made further progress towards complete convalescence. There is still not a great deal of life in other sections, although there have been signs of interest in the copper group, which might grow into something if the Yankee position became more settled. To a large extent, indeed, Wall Street still dominates the speculative situation in all markets, and any sustained movement in Yankees one way or the other would have a considerable sentimental influence.

It was evidently the Bank Holiday set-back in Wall Street which caused the Paris liquidation in connection with its end-August settlement to have such a sharp, if only temporary, effect on the South African market. Since then Yankees have been a little more settled, and there is a hope that the latest Paris troubles represented about the last of the big weak speculative accounts left over from the spring boom. It is true that there is a fear that one or two rubber speculators may fail to meet their differences this Friday, but such an occurrence would only be likely to have a passing influence on the mining markets, after the drastic weeding-out to which the position in them has been subjected during the past two or three months. The efficacy of this weeding-out is evidenced by the rapid response of Kaffir and Rhodesian prices to a comparatively limited amount of "shop" and professional support during the past week. With so little floating stock about, jobbers in many cases soon found themselves in the position of involuntary bears, and their efforts to cover themselves, and get a few shares on their books, rapidly forced prices up.

One of the first straws to show which way the wind was blowing was the resuscitation of Randfonteins. These shares are generally among the more staid and steady-going of the leading Kaffirs; consequently options on them are usually comparatively low-priced, so that they appeal to the operator who looks several months ahead. But last week an unusually large deal is reported to have been put through, the Wernher Beit group being said to have given for the call of as many as fifty thousand shares. Messrs. Wernher Beit are believed to be already very large holders of Randfontein debentures, which were significantly strong last week, so that the latest story is of special interest. In the circumstances a rumour from the Rand that a complete change of control of the Robinson group may occur at no distant date has, though promptly officially denied, left a feeling in the market that, to quote the old proverb, "there is no smoke without fire." At any rate, it is believed that the recent renewed criticism of Randfontein policy has caused a healthy stirring-up of the management.

About three weeks ago, it may be remembered, a lengthy official apologia was advertised by the Randfontein Estates in reply to shareholders' complaints as to the absence of dividends which had appeared in several newspapers. The chief feature of the document was the calling attention to the progress of the Randfontein Central, to whose splendid prospects I have several times alluded. It is now hoped that the enormous crushing plant of the Randfontein Central—the equivalent of 900 stamps—may be at work by the end of this year, or several months earlier than originally anticipated. Not far short of 2,000,000 tons of ore per annum should be crushed when the property is in full running, and not only should the company pay handsome dividends, of which the Randfontein Estates as the biggest holder will take a large proportion, but it has gradually to repay to the parent concern the heavy sum borrowed to bring the Randfontein Central to the producing stage. In addition the Randfontein South, which is erecting additional plant, should soon be giving a larger return on the parent company's holding. Within a year or so, then, the Randfontein Estates should be in a position to pay regular dividends if the directors only take a normal view of their responsibility towards shareholders. Last year Randfonteins crossed £3, and in anything like active markets they should easily see that price again.

Like Randfontein Centrals, the shares of other Rand companies approaching the producing stage—such as Bantjes, Brakpans, and City Deeps—have continued in quiet "investment" demand. One of the earliest to start crushing will be the Bantjes, on which I learn, by the South African mail just in, that satisfactory trial runs of a portion of the new plant have already been made. It would not surprise me, therefore, to hear any day that crushing had commenced in earnest. With its 100 stamps the Bantjes is expected to deal with up to 250,000 tons of ore yearly at a profit of, say, 10s. per ton. If the options are all exercised and the whole capital of £600,000 issued the above return would only enable dividends of about 15 per cent. This does not seem much of a yield at the present price for Bantjes of about 2⅝, but as it would take over fifty years to work out the property at the above rate the plant will no doubt be at least doubled within the comparatively early future.

Chartered have so often been the bell-wether of activity in the mining markets, and a rise in them so frequently tends to attract the interest of a section of the public which ordinarily takes little interest in mines, that the moderate move in them last week may prove significant. While it might be difficult to prove that Chartered are worth even their present price, yet their supporters have reason on their side when they argue that if the shares could go over £2 earlier this year there is all the more justification now for such a quotation by what has occurred since. Though not the most spectacular part of Rhodesia's recent progress, the most solid factor has, perhaps, been the steady strengthening of the railway position. Mr. Rochfort Maguire, the chairman, at the recent meeting of the Rhodesian Railways, said that "the time had arrived at last when they might look forward to earning profits in excess of their debenture interest." Traffics on the whole Rhodesian railway system have been growing during recent months, and it looks as if at length the Chartered Company might consider itself free of the constant drain on its resources to carry out its guarantees of the interest on the railway debentures. Moreover, Rhodesian Railway traffics will benefit directly, and the Chartered Company indirectly, from the impending completion of the Katanga Junction Railway to the Tanganyika Company's Star of the Congo Mine. Connection will eventually be established with the Benguella Railway from Lobito Bay, when a good deal of traffic will no doubt go by that route from Europe to Rhodesia and the Transvaal, since it will save time at present lost in the section of the steamship journey round to Cape Town. Tanganyikas and Zambesias have continued to attract Continental attention during the past week in view of the railway progress and the approach of the stage of serious copper productions.

Better late than never. After being in existence for several years the Northern Copper and Rhodesia Copper Companies have just joined the dividend list. The former concern is interested in the latter, and both are interested in the Bwana M'Kubwa copper proposition, which has been floated as a separate undertaking. The Northern Copper is paying 5 per cent. in cash (1s. per share) and 5 per cent. in Bwana M'Kubwa shares, while the Rhodesia Copper is making a 5 per cent. cash distribution. The intention of the directors of the latter concern was to pay the dividend in scrip, but at the general meeting the shareholders indicated that they preferred cash, so they are to get 4½d. per share, the nominal value of the shares being 7s. 6d. as against £1 in the case of Northern Copper. In the Rhodesian boom a few months ago Northern Coppers were run up to 2⅜ and Rhodesia Coppers to 13s. 6d. How long it will be before these prices are again reached I should not care to predict, but any one who cares to lock up the shares for a time should not go far wrong.

Mexico El Oro Ore Reserves—Increase in Quantity, but Decrease in Average Gold Contents.

The directors of the Mexico El Oro continue to give an example to officials of mining companies generally by the promptness of their issue of information. The annual report of the manager, Mr. Main, is issued in advance of the directors' report, which will not be out for a few weeks yet. Mr. Main has apparently nothing to add as regards prospects to the lengthy statement which the local director, Mr. Raymond, made recently. However, Mr. Main supplies the following interesting table of estimated ore reserves at June 30 last:—

| Level. | Tons. | Gold value. | Silver contents. |
|---|---|---|---|
| | | $ | ozs. |
| First | 500 | 10·00 | 5·0 |
| Second | 1,200 | 6·00 | 3·0 |
| Third | 9,010 | 6·30 | 7·5 |
| Fourth | 45,505 | 6·90 | 5·0 |
| Fifth | 85,545 | 9·30 | 6·2 |
| Sixth | 79,395 | 9·10 | 4·0 |
| Seventh, Main and Footwall Veins | 30,080 | 6·21 | 3·9 |
| Seventh, West Sulphide Vein | 10,000 | 25·00 | 15·0 |
| Eighth, West Sulphide Vein | 20,000 | 18·00 | 12·0 |
| Ore Dump | 2,500 | 7·00 | 5·4 |
| Total | 283,735 | 9·57 | 5·9 |

I commented recently on the rather small quantity of ore reserves with which the Mexico El Oro had been content to work, so that it is satisfactory to find that the above figures show an increase of about 50 per cent. on the total of 192,000 tons developed at end June, 1909. The average gold value, however, is over $1 less per ton, and Mr. Main reminds shareholders that on the seventh and eighth levels the development on the west sulphide vein is relatively much further advanced than on the lower grade ore of the main and footwall veins, and for that reason he warns them that during the coming year later development on these levels will probably, while adding to the reserves, lower the average values as now expressed.

INDUSTRIALS.

Egyptians in Request—Maikop Oil Developments—Eastern Petroleums Strong—Bass's Results.

With a few exceptions, there has been little going on in Industrials. Egyptian land and finance shares have been in quiet request. I referred some weeks ago to the opinion expressed by Sir William Garstin that the bottom of the depression in Egypt had been reached, and subsequent events have tended to confirm this view. Of course, a very great deal turns upon the forthcoming cotton crop, about which it is impossible yet to speak positively. But present indications are that the crop will be a good one, the Government having taken serious measures to combat the worm pest, and the present price of the staple is a record for the time of year. The oil market continues devoid of energy. Maikop descriptions are still allowed to languish, though some people expect to see a revival in the autumn. Certainly the indications are that Maikop as an oil producer will soon have to be taken seriously. Development work is proceeding rapidly, and it is interesting to learn that sixty-four wells have either been completed or are being made. Further, the fact that Messrs. Rothschild are transferring their interests at Batoum to the Maikop field is additional evidence of how the latest Russian oil field is regarded by the experts. The Caspian Black Sea Petroleum Company—the largest of the Russian exporters of petroleum products—is dismantling its works at Batoum, and all reservoirs for storing kerosene are being taken to pieces, and will be transferred to Maikop, where it is intended to re-erect them. This step will go a long way towards creating a market for Maikop oil. Eastern Petroleums have been in demand on the meeting; the plain, businesslike, and at the same time very confident speech made by the chairman impressed the market, which is talking the company's shares very much higher.

Bass, Ratcliff and Gretton, the big brewery undertaking, has had a trying year, but the concern is financially equipped to weather storms. Gross profits declined from £828,300 to £715,900, but the sum credited to net revenue was £197,800, as compared with only £162,500 a year ago. The company found itself able to reduce outlays on repairs and renewals, cut down the provision for depreciation, bad debts, etc., and to economise in administration expenses. The exact amount of depreciation of properties and loan securities attributed to the Budget cannot yet be ascertained, but it is thought that it will not exceed £450,000, and this will be met out of the reserve fund, which stands at £840,000. The dividend is unchanged at 7 per cent., and the carry forward has been increased from £8,200 to £42,800. George Newnes, Limited, I am glad to see, has made some recovery, net profits at £35,100 having risen by £4,700. The dividend is 2½ per cent., against 1¼ per cent. for the previous year.

MISCELLANEOUS NOTES.

The Confessions of a Bucket-Shop Man.

A week or two ago I gave some particulars in these columns of a concern which had been carried on at 52, Queen Victoria Street, E.C., under the title of the London and New York Exchange, Limited. It was a private company, with an authorised capital of £5,000, formed to take over the business of a Mr. Edward Moor, who was to act as director for a term of five years. The other director was a Mr. William Boardman Milligan. Within a couple of months Mr. Moor resigned, and another Mr. Milligan was appointed in his place. Then there appeared on the circulars of the "Exchange" the name of Mr. John Sandes as director, and as there was no notice of his appointment nor of Mr. Milligan's resignation on the files of the company at Somerset House, it looked as if the resignation was nothing more than an attempt on the part of Mr. Milligan to shuffle out of any responsibility in regard to claims against the concern. Mr. W. B. Milligan strongly disclaims any such idea, and with the object of convincing me that no reproach can possibly attach to him he has favoured me with an interview at which he has disclosed the history of the company. That history throws so much light upon the whole of the bucket-shop business that I think it is worth reproducing for the benefit of those who may be tempted by the prospect of unlimited profits to purchase options from the outside brigade.

Mr. Milligan tells me that he learnt his stockbroking in a Dublin stockbroker's office. There he made the acquaintance of Mr. John Sandes, one of his firm's clients. Mr. Sandes dabbled to a considerable extent in the American market. Mr. Milligan followed his example on a smaller scale. When the result inevitable to the speculator who gets out of his depth happened, Mr. Milligan came to London and looked out for a job. He had some acquaintance with Mr. Moreton Mandeville, who gave him a berth at the London and Paris Exchange. When the L. and P. came to grief he had to look out for another job. He had kept up his acquaintance with Mr. Sandes, and that gentleman was also anxious to go into business. They put their heads together, and the London and New York Exchange came into being, taking over as its foundation an outside broker's business carried on by Mr. Moor. The foundation was not a very substantial one, and eventually Mr. Moor was bought out for a small sum. Mr. Sandes had supplied the capital and Mr. Milligan the technical experience. Neither of these proved adequate to the occasion. Mr. Milligan was dissatisfied; so was Mr. Sandes. Efforts were made to find a new director with capital to keep the concern afloat. Mr. Milligan gave notice to Mr. Sandes that he wished to resign his directorship. Mr. Sandes asked him to stay on a little longer. Yet during this time the London and New York Exchange was taking money from clients for shares and using it to meet liabilities. Eventually Mr. Milligan forwarded his resignation to Mr. Sandes, but Mr. Sandes omitted to send the notice to Somerset House. What a pretty picture this peep behind the scenes of the bucket-shop presents! Here are a couple of comparatively impecunious speculators, with a capital of £400, opening an office and offering to pay unlimited profits to people who will come and deal with them. The curious thing about it all is that Mr. Milligan does not see that any objection can be taken to such a business, and I have no doubt Mr. Sandes has a similar obliquity of vision. One would have thought in Mr. Milligan's case that his association with the London and Paris Exchange would have shown him that there was neither honour nor profit to be obtained thus. But he is a very young man, and he may have thought that he could succeed where Mr. Mandeville failed. I trust he will be wiser in future.

Bucket-Shop Bananas.

I have received the following letter from the Secretary of the Lami River Rubber, Cocoa and Banana Plantations, Limited, with regard to the "Special Three-day Offer" of its shares made by the Industrial Development Corporation:—

Clarence House,
24, Martins Lane, Cannon Street,
London, E.C., August 6, 1910.

Dear Sir,—I notice in your issue of the 3rd inst. (page 302) you have a paragraph with reference to the Industrial Development Corporation and the shares of the above company. I shall be glad if you will kindly insert in your paper that we do not know the Industrial Development Corporation, nor have we had any communication with them.

The statements made in their circular are absolutely untrue and without any authority from us. This is very damaging to a company with a register of 500 shareholders.

I herewith enclose you a prospectus, which was issued to the public on June 13 last, for your guidance.—Yours truly, Claude L. S. Ramsay (Secretary).

Undoubtedly the secretary is correct when he states that it is very damaging to a company to have its shares hawked about by a bucket-shop, and pushed on the public by means of untrue statements. The directors have my sincere commiseration in the predicament in which they find themselves owing to the attentions of the Industrial Development Corporation, in whom I may say that I fancy I recognise some old acquaintances in a new disguise.

Truth Cautionary List for 1910, 128 pages bound in cloth, price 1s. net, by post 1s. 2d., is now ready, and may be obtained from all booksellers and railway bookstalls.

Mr. Irons's Good Fortune.

R. A. Smith and Co., the bucket-shop keepers whom I have so frequently had occasion to pillory, have recently circulated a fac-simile of a letter which they modestly characterise as "a well-deserved tribute to our system of dealing." The letter is as follows:—

65, Chestnut Road, West Norwood, S.E.,
June 30, 1910.

Dear Sirs,—Many thanks for your cheque for £240. I take this opportunity of congratulating you on the perfection of your system of dealing and your promptness in paying.

I sent you yesterday a cheque for £80 for one of your cover transactions, and to-day received cheque as above mentioned.

A profit of £160 (on a cover of £80) in less than twenty-four hours has never been my good fortune before.—Thanking you again, I remain, faithfully yours,

James Irons.

If the writer of this letter is the man I take him to be—namely, James Provan Irons, of the same address, and formerly in business in Great Winchester Street—quite a number of people must regret that he has not more often enjoyed such good fortune. It might have averted the three appearances he has made in the bankruptcy court, the more recent being under an adjudication in April, 1909. Perhaps it would also have saved him from the unpleasant result of the proceedings at the Old Bailey in January last, when he was accused of having obtained credit without disclosing the fact that he was an undischarged bankrupt. Mr. Irons is to be congratulated upon the improvement in his circumstances which enables him to risk £80 in a speculation with R. A. Smith and Co. He is also to be congratulated upon the result. But as R. A. Smith and Co. say that this letter was "selected from hundreds of others similar," I hardly think it is a selection upon which they can be congratulated. In view of Mr. J. P. Irons's financial record, some of the hundreds of others might perhaps have been preferable. But in any case sensible people do not attach the slightest value to such testimonials. The fact that some lucky customers get profits from a bucket-shop does not in any way diminish the folly of dealing with firms of this kind, especially a firm having such a shady reputation as R. A. Smith and Co. It is a class of business in which money can be very well spent upon the maintenance of decoy ducks; and the one essential consideration for the public to bear in mind is that the bucket-shop keeper is absolutely dependent for his own gains upon the losses in which he involves his customers.

The Stampede of a Syndicate.

The desire I expressed on July 27 for some explanation regarding the disappearance of the World's Derby and Horse Stampede Syndicate from its offices in the Strand has been gratified by Mr. Keen, the late managing director and erstwhile secretary of this undertaking. A syndicate, I gather, is very much like a horse in more than one particular. In this instance, in the absence of its managing director abroad on other business it took the bit between its teeth and bolted, being scared at the sight of the bailiffs, and when the managing director returned he found his syndicate gone. It was not much of a loss to him, I fancy, for it must have been eating its head off, as there was no work for it to do. For this unfortunate result I think Mr. Keen and his co-director, Mr. Tupper, may be held guiltless of anything but the incurable optimism which almost invariably afflicts those who promote companies. The syndicate had been formed to acquire the patents for a superlative sort of merry-go-round which would put every other mechanical device of the sort into the shade. Unfortunately, when the time came, so Mr. Keen tells me, for the inventor to fulfil his contract he was unable to do so, owing to his having saddled himself with previous obligations. The money put into the syndicate had been expended, and there was nothing left. Under these circumstances Mr. Keen and Mr. Tupper, not wishing the lady to whom I referred as having put £50 into the syndicate to lose her money, gave her a charge on some promotion profits which should have been paid to them in connection with another venture. Mr. Keen assures me that these profits are certain to be paid, and that the lady will get her money back. I hope so; but then, as I said before, the company promoter is an incurable optimist.

NEW ISSUE.

The Amistad Rubber Plantations and Estates, Limited, has been formed to acquire as a going concern freehold rubber, coffee, and tropical estates in Mexico of about 29,961 acres in extent. In one estate, according to the reports, 30,000 trees tapped lightly yielded last year 8,200 lbs. of rubber, and the whole property is estimated to produce about 60,000 lbs. of rubber in the first year and in the second year 80,000 lbs. Profits are also estimated from coffee, cocoa, sugar, and other products. The property has been valued at £96,500, but the purchase consideration is £25,500 in cash and £24,000 in cash or shares. The capital of the company is £120,000 in 2s. shares, of which 750,000 are offered for subscription. There are no promotion profits.

5. Inquiries should be put as briefly as possible, plainly written and numbered.

6. Communications received after Friday may not be replied to in the following issue.

Railways.

Copthorne.—1. You may have opportunities of selling at a profit, but the market is one liable to quick changes, and you must be prepared therefore to take risks. 2. Northern Pacific Common.

Fulwood.—Prospects not very grand. I should not be inclined to dissuade you from selling.

Harp.—A sound investment, but better not buy merely to snatch a speculator's profit.

Locky.—Not a bond I care for. Better keep what you have rather than exchange.

Medico (Oxford).—May turn out all right, but I should prefer the 5 per cent. fully guaranteed bonds of the Chilian Government.

Riach.—1. The exchange seems worth making in view of the doubt to which you refer. 2. Both fair purchases of a semi-speculative type.

Mines.

Ajax.—1. A fair holding for dividends. 2. Because of the poor returns. I expect to see some recovery in course of the next six months. 3. I have not heard a date mentioned. Argus.—1. A further purchase would be a fair speculation. 2. An amalgamation scheme is on the tapis. Await further details. 3. A highly speculative holding.

Chob.—Very much of a gamble. I should be inclined to put the additional money into something else, so as to spread the risk. Cranbourne.—Keep for the present. No. 3 might be held for dividends. Cavendish.—1. If you mean the shares of the General Mining and Finance Corporation quoted about 2½ I consider them a promising speculative purchase. 2. Better get rid of them.

Doubt.—I do not recommend the shares. Draco.—Fair speculations.

H. M. (Oxford).—Company proposes to reconstruct. Prospects uncertain, and the shares certainly cannot be regarded as a "safe investment."

Perry.—Certainly not a "safe investment." I see no reason at present to advise a purchase as a speculation. Pine.—Better exchange into something more promising.

Quert.—1. Yes. 2 and 3. Fair speculations for a moderate profit.

Rodwell.—Keep No. 3. Exchange out of 1 and 2 on a favourable opportunity.

Vides-ne.—Very much of a gamble, and one I do not care to recommend.

Mixed Securities.

A. E. N. W. (Bedford).—It is a small concern that does not figure in the standard reference works. You might inquire through the local Press. 2. A mere gambling counter. At the present price I should be inclined to hold. A. C. L.—1. The company has been merged into the British and Colonial Investments, Limited. 2. Worth holding. 3. Yes, though the industry is at present under a cloud. Abed.—1. Worth holding. Latest advices are of an encouraging nature. 2. These shares are at present very much of a gamble. 3. Very speculative.

B. W.—Thanks for the bucket-shop literature. The mining shares are a fair speculation for a moderate profit.

D. P. H.—New York Telephone 4½ per cent. bonds, Port of London 4 per cent. B stock, and City of Budapest 4 per cent. bonds would make a good combination for the purpose.

Ecru.—1. I do not regard them as particularly attractive. 2 and 3. Fair speculations.

H. R.—1. It is not in the front rank, and you would perhaps be best advised to stick to one of the old-established joint-stock institutions. 2. Hopeful from a lock-up point of view.

IVY.—1. Highly speculative; my advice is still to sell. 2. Well secured.

KITCHIE.—1 and 2. Not "safe investments," but good selections among shares of the class. 3. A stock liable to big ups and downs. Now looks pretty well high enough

MEDICUS (Sunderland).—Nos. 1 and 3 are worth holding. No. 2 is a more doubtful stock, and I should be inclined to realise.

ORILLIA.—Nos. 1 and 2 are excellent. As regards 3, the debentures are redeemable at par in the event of the line being expropriated by the Government. You might, therefore, take advantage of the present price to sell.

PENSIONER.—You have a very fair lot. No. 4 is the most doubtful, as the line is practically unproved, a large portion, in fact, not yet having been built. No. 2, of course, comes into a different category to the rest, but at the present price the shares ought to be worth holding.

QUORN.—1. I am not attracted by the shares. 2. A sound holding of the semi-speculative type. 3. Worth keeping RATHDOUNE.—1. Dividend prospects in respect of your present holding are still remote, but I think you could make a better exchange than that suggested. The railway stock is highly speculative.

SABRINA.—Nos. 1 and 2 are among the soundest in the American group, and now look moderately valued. No. 3 is at present a speculative holding, and the price looks high enough for the present. No. 4 is a promising speculative holding. SELINA.—No. 1 seems secure. Neither of the other two can be called safe.

THERLES.—1 and 2. Registered under Egyptian laws, but I believe the shareholders are liable only for the amount of their share holdings. 3. It works under an Act granted by the Canadian Government, but the shareholders' liability is limited to the face value of their shares. 4. Not safe, but good amongst high-yielding bonds. 5. A very fair investment. 6. New York Telephone 4½ per cent. bonds and Cunard Shipping 4½ per cent. debentures.

VERDANT GREEN.—Your investments have been wisely chosen, and I do not see the necessity for disturbing any.

OIL.

ANXIOUS (Limerick).—I still advise the sale of 5. Keep the others.

CRAIGEVEN.—The preference are quoted at 1s. 6d. discount. The market at present is not a very wide one. Prospects are regarded hopefully.

FOULARD.—1. Hold. 2. I do not care much for these, but they may be saleable to better advantage later on. Market at present so neglected as to be bad for a seller.

GEORGIUS.—The meeting read well, and according to latest advices the company's prospects appear bright. If you do not mind increasing your risks I see no objection to a further purchase.

OILCAKE.—All depends upon the result of developments at depth. If these turn out well the shares will go higher. Unofficial reports lately favourable.

PORTENI.—Better hold.

TRUSTFUL.—1. I should be inclined to sell both. I still think well of 2, and at present price No 3 might be kept.

UNION.—Sell both.

VESTRO.—You might get out now.

XENOPHON.—Highly speculative. I do not advise you to buy more.

RUBBER.

AMLER.—I do not advise you to cut your loss just now. Both should ultimately become fair investments. At the same time I should not recommend them for purchase at the moment. You had better wait for better markets. A. B. (Draper's Gardens).—I consider the present managers to be perfectly "straight" men, and think that the company has a good future before it. The cutting you enclose is not disinterested. A. B. (Ashford).—Thanks for letter and comments. It is only what you might expect from a bucket-shop rag. ABBOT.—1-4. I do not recommend any of them. 5 Any of the shares mentioned in the list to which you refer may be bought as good industrial purchases at present prices. A. J. F.—Thanks for your interesting and valuable communication. I shall be glad to hear from you when there is anything fresh, as promised. ABAX.—1-2. Both are plantation companies, but neither will begin to produce until 1912. 3. The market expect a dividend of about 25 per cent. in respect of the current year. Probably there will be a definite announcement on the subject during the next few months. ABSENS.—The annual report will be issued in a few weeks' time. You ought to be able to take a profit if you wish to before the end of the year, but if you can hang on until next year the profit should be much greater. ASH.—1 and 2. Yes. 3. No. AJAX.—1. Wait for a recovery to the price you gave, and in the meantime take the magnificent dividend provided by the present output. 2. Not at all promising. ACETONE.—1. The price at the time of writing is slightly under par for the 2s. share, but there is really very little market, and it is a concern best left alone. 2-3. Both these companies have excellent estates, but they will not begin to tap until 1912. AN ADMIRER.—You are mistaken in thinking that there is no market for the shares. There are constant dealings. See first part of the reply to "A. B. (Draper's Gardens)." ALLAGAR.—You may average all of them with the exception of 4, of which I should not buy more.

BALLYKELLY.—1-2. Keep what you have, but do not average at present. 3. I should say, "Don't." BLUNT.—I do not care to fix a selling limit, but I think you ought to see a good profit within the next twelve months. BERKS.—1. I am afraid I cannot give you much encouragement with regard to this share. I do not think the prospects are promising, and I advise you to sell when you get the chance. 2. These should turn out well. BEPPO.—1. Retain for recovery. Information should be published shortly regarding a new subsidiary. 2-3. You need not be anxious about these two. Whatever the price of rubber becomes you will always have a good investment while you hold these shares. BRAD.—Of the two companies I prefer Highlands at present prices. I should buy these rather than take more of the first-named just now. Of course, the Highlands capital is much larger, but so is the acreage both planted and in reserve. BARTER.—You give me no clue as regards the length of time your certificate has been outstanding. If more than two months certainly write to the secretary and complain. BIN.—1. Too early to work out annual income with certainty, and I cannot identify the third company on account of abbreviated title. 2. I should keep them all for the present.

CHIDDINGFOLD.—1. I regard this as a promising company on its merits generally, but from the special point of view which you mention it is not easy to form an opinion, as the officials at the office are not at all communicative on the subject. 2. Very little market for them. They are not the class of share that I care to recommend, but if you have them do not try to sell just now; you will probably do better by waiting. CAVEHILL.—You might hold these for about 4s. premium. CISSOLD.—I regard 3, 4, and 6 as good speculative investments, and 1 and 5 as less promising. I should take a profit on 2 if I could when markets recover. CARAVAN. Hold for a profit. CHAGFORD.—There is a very simple solution to what you naturally considered a cryptic utterance on the part of the secretary. The first shipment contains some rubber which may not be a fair sample on account of the coolies being fresh to the work and machinery, but after a few shipments have been made they will have got into their stride. CAPELLA.—There can be no results from the Nyassa property until the end of this year, but I advise you not to sacrifice your shares. The other company you mention should begin tapping in a few months' time. CATAMARCA.—1-2. Average your Malaccas. 3. This is very second-rate. Wait a month or two, then sell and buy the shares mentioned in your second query. CRANBOURNE.—You have a good speculative list of shares, all of which should improve with better markets. 1. Should pay a dividend next year. 2. Is already a dividend payer. 3. In 1912. 4. Perhaps next year. 5. In 1913. 6. I have no information about this company. Where did you get the shares? CAER BADOU.—1. I should average. 2. See reply to "Omen." CASTELL.—1. No. 2. You are entitled to the dividend. 3 Beverleys. CAVAN.—I think it is quite likely that your price will be exceeded this year. As to the other point you raise you need not be anxious. It is perfectly clear that the agitation of which you have heard is only a case of some one trying to get something for nothing.

DUTCHMAN.—I should retain 2 until I could get a small profit, but 1 and 3 I should sell on a market revival, as their future is not promising. DAVID.—1. You bought these at a price which you will probably not see again for a very long time. Make up your mind to get rid of them when markets become active. 2. These should recover and prove a good investment. 3. Mincing Lane has a high opinion of this estate, but you will have to wait rather a long time for a dividend. I should retain these shares for the present. DORK.—1-2. These are shares that I should not buy. If you hold them you will do well to make an exchange when you get the opportunity.

EXMOUTH.—These pay you at the rate of 10 per cent. on your outlay at the present price, on the basis of last year's dividend. I think you would do better to buy Linggis, which yield about 5¾ per cent. on a similar basis, as in this case there is a little more to go for in the future. EXPRESS.—1. Beverley Tea and Rubber. 2-3. Being the first transaction, it would, perhaps, be good policy to adopt that method of procedure. ELMBANK.—1 and 3. Both these may be safely held for a profit. 2. No market. You will be lucky if you get your money back. Wait for better markets, then try to sell. ECHO.—1. A dividend expected during the next few months. 2. Probably the best-managed trust company. 3. A good concern. You need not worry about your rubber holdings if these are all you have. ETUDIANTE.—What you have been told is no doubt true. The only thing to do now is to await a market revival. I should not worry so much about the Kamunings as the others.

FAITH.—1. These should certainly be kept until markets revive. 2. Not dear at the price, but I think that you might do better. 3. A promising speculative investment at the price, but I do not care in the present condition of markets to fix selling limits. FAD.—1. Do not keep this as a permanent investment. 2. Perhaps the best share in the rubber list. Do not sell for a few shillings' profit, as they are an improving investment, in addition to giving you a handsome yield now. 3. Take a small profit. These answers are in reply to the questions at the end of your letter. Regarding your detailed list, the shares mentioned are promising, with the exception of 3, 7, and 8. Take an early opportunity of exchanging these. FEATS.—1. Yes. "Honestly." Thousands of shares have been taken off the market recently by those who are familiar with the estates. 2. See TRUTH of last week under "Scrutator." FIZZER.—1. You had better keep these for a time, but make up your mind to sell during the autumn. 2. You can keep these for investment. FOOTPAD.—1-3. All good to hold for dividends. FOULARD.—There is no speculation in the shares, hence the low quotation. You had better lock them up, taking your 6 per cent. dividend until the estates come into bearing. As this time approaches it will be seen that the shares form a good permanent investment, and the price will improve accordingly. F. L.—Yes, I should average now. FABIAN.—1. In good hands, but you must not expect a dividend for about two years. 2. Not very promising. 3. A good land company, but I do not expect any great advance in the price in the near future. It will be well to retain all these for the present. FEEDALL.—1. Batu Caves, Consolidated Malay, Federated Selangor, Linggi. 2. About 10 per cent. 3. Anglo-Malays last year paid 80 per cent. and London Asiatic 12½ per cent. FISHERGATE.—1. You can please yourself about joining in this agitation, but in the first place it is unnecessary, as the controllers of the company are respectable people, who may be trusted to do all that is possible in the interests of the shareholders; and, secondly, you will probably make yourself responsible for costs. 2. Here again you have only one certainty—viz., that you will be liable for 6d. per share. This company is doubtless a most unsatisfactory concern, but it will pay you to let someone else pull the chestnuts out of the fire. 3. Of course, if you can wait and get them back at a lower price than the present it will be to your advantage, but the fact is many people did the same as you did, and jobbers sold short, so that genuine buyers cannot get their shares delivered. These points do not indicate a further fall in the near future. FOX.—1. Hold for the guaranteed dividend. 2. A very good share. Hold for recovery. 3. You indicate this company by one word, which is, I believe, incorrectly spelt. If you have written it accurately, then I cannot trace the company at all. Please repeat your inquiry in full and do not abbreviate the name. FIRST MAN.—The only shares worth keeping as a lock-up are numbers 1 and 5. 2 is a doubtful concern, while 3 and 4 have the reputation of resembling wild cats. FULWOOD.—My opinion is that you will be unwise to place any reliance in the bucket-shop sheet which you enclose. See first reply to "Fishergate."

GERTRUDE.—I will adopt your suggestion at the earliest opportunity. In the meantime, you need not be anxious, as I believe your shares will recover in the next few months. GREENHORN.—The fact that the option certificate was issued after you had sold your shares is a proof that you must give it up to the buyer, as requested by the broker. GOVAN.—1. I regret that I have no information regarding the company you name, as there is no market in London for the shares. It hardly comes within my province to say whether it is advisable for you to let your brother in Singapore buy shares in local rubber companies. If you make investments of this kind you must trust entirely to his knowledge of the companies, and let him sell out there when you wish to realise. 2. A fairly cheap investment at present price.

HOPE DEFERRED.—By this time next year, at all events, you should be able to take a profit. Average if you can. H. K., JUN.—1. Is good enough to hold for dividends. 2. A fair purchase at present price, but there are better. 3. I am told that these are going better with a return of market activity. When you can get out without loss do so. H. B. T.—Many thanks for your letter and the enclosure, from which it appears that the issue is being made on a healthy basis. HAYMAJ.—1. I should not hold this share as a permanent investment. 2. Not very attractive. 3. Should go better. You do not say whether you hold the shares. HIGHLAND.—This company is located in the office of a firm whose name is held in high respect in the City of London. You may rely upon it that they would not stoop to shady tricks. Do not sell your shares now. HARP.—You evidently want to gamble, but a purchase such as you suggest is not the one that I should advise a lady to make. If you would like an investment in rubber shares to give you a fair return, and are willing to eliminate the get-rich-quick idea, please repeat your query with the necessary modifications. HOMER.—I believe that you are a fairly constant reader and correspondent, and consequently I cannot understand your having bought any rubber shares with an overdraft. Almost every week for several months I have pointed out the folly of this. Had you bought one-half the numoer of shares you would have been able to dispense with borrowed capital, and could have faced a waiting period with equanimity. All the shares you hold are good rubber investments, and you should now await a revival. I expect numbers 3 and 5 to move upwards first. HARRY.—You hold three speculative shares, of which I have an unfavourable opinion. I should wait for better markets and then sell. 1. This has the best chance of an advance in the near future, but do not hold too long.

IGNOTA.—1. If you mean the Madagascar Rubber Company, Limited, the address is 3, Moorgate Street, London, E.C. 2. No. 3. It is more speculative. INFELIX.—I think you will be able to sell at a profit or get a good return "within a year or two." (a) See reply to "Omen." (b) The company is doing a remunerative business, and should pay a good dividend this year. (c) For results here you will probably have to wait until 1912, but the estates are said to be developing excellently. IVY.—1-2. You will no doubt see both these back to the price you gave before this time next year. They are in the front rank. 3. This is an outside broker's counter, and will never be a profitable investment. Sell when you can.

JAN.—All good to hold, and likely to appreciate in the future.

LANKA.—1 and 2. I fear that neither of these will ever be a satisfactory investment. You had better sell them when you get the chance. 3. See third reply to H. K., Jun. LAMBRUIN.—1. You might average at present prices. 2. My views with regard to this share are unchanged. On a fair dividend basis they are not likely to be worth the price you gave for the next five years at least. 3. You must write a separate letter about oil shares. LEIRE.—I am sorry to say that the conditions you impose make it impossible for me to help you. I myself am looking for such an investment, so that if you find one I shall be grateful if you will let me know. With regard to the shares you name, I would not touch 1, 2, 3, or 5. The others are promising, but do not fulfil your ideal conditions. The last two shares are quoted at a discount mainly owing to the long time which will elapse before these companies can produce sufficient rubber to pay a good dividend. LE MONT.—It would be the height of folly to sell your Bukit Rajahs, Highlands, and Anglo-Malays now, unless you require the money. Keep all the shares you name at all events until the end of the year, if you can.

MUNRO.—Yes, I think so. MITHAN.—I advise you not to attempt the plan you propose. It is useless to try to make profits by purchasing rubber shares with borrowed money. MUDDLER.—1 and 3. Good to hold. 2. Poor prospects. 4 and 5. Wild cats. It is useless to try to sell the bad ones just now, but you may get the chance before the end of the year. MORTLAKE.—You had better hold all three for the present. 1. Is worth holding for the guaranteed dividend, but in any case you could not sell. 2. Is also unsaleable just now, and probably will be for a long time to come, as it is a "three-years-misery" share. 3. Is fairly promising. MICROBE.—You have some good shares, and need not feel dispirited, as you are getting good dividends on most of them, and likely to get better. Hold them all for better markets. MUNRO.—1-2. Sell these when markets revive, but hold 3 for recovery. You bought 3 at a very high price, but no doubt you will have a better opportunity of selling than the present. MAC.—Try to be patient until the end of the year, when I hope to be able to remind you of the promise contained in your P.S. MOTORIST.—1. The secretary is away, but I agree that you ought to have had an acknowledgment of your letter. 2. After making further very careful inquiries I advise you to keep your shares and wait for the annual meeting, which will be held during the next few weeks. 3. I understand that a large proportion of the amount is still in hand.

NITRAM.—You had better divide the amount between Linggis, Malaccas, Madagascar Preference, and Beverley Tea and Rubber. These are all fully paid, and you can see the prices daily in the Financier. NOWGONG.—You may regard all three as speculative investments. I should arrange them in the order of 3, 1, and 2. NAYVAL.—You have a good list of shares, which you may look upon as investments with the exception of 4. This I should sell when the quotation recovers to the cost price (approximately). I saw the article to which you refer, and no doubt you have seen the further amusing article by the same writer in which he elaborates what he intended to convey in the first one. It was published on Friday last, and seems to answer the points you raise. NON-SKID.—1-2. By next March you ought to see a good profit. 3. Yes. NONEX.—As you have got in at most reasonable prices you can afford to wait for the limits mentioned. NANCY.—1-2. Both these shares may be considered as good rubber investments at the present prices. They have not declined more than the shares of other companies. In each case the year ends on December 31, and the report is issued in April. An interim dividend will probably be paid in October. 3. You must write a separate letter about Mines. See Rule 2. NORTH-EAST.—1. The price should be reached when the estates are in full bearing. 2. I do not think well of this company. 3. See Rule 2. 4. Yes, otherwise he could not issue contract notes to other brokers without stamping them. See Finance Act, 1910, Section 77, Subsection 3.

OSBORNE.—See reply to "Nitram." OMEN.—Retain these until the end of the year, when shipments are expected to commence. ORTLER.—This is a respectable concern, but as there can be no dividend for over a year, and that for 1911 is estimated at 5 per cent. only, the present price seems quite high enough. There is very little market for the shares. OXFORD.—I should hold them all for a time, but should look upon 3 and 5 as shares to be sold when a favourable opportunity occurs. ONSLOW.—1. You had better keep these now for a month or so, but do not hang on too long. 2. Keep the other shares for recovery, and average Madagascar Ordinary. 3. You would do well to avoid the firm whose circular you enclose. OUSEL.—1. I take it that your surmise is justified by the available data. 2. The price should be substantially higher as soon as the matter referred to is definitely completed, but at the moment I cannot say anything as regards a dividend.

PELICAN.—1. A cheap speculative investment at present price, but probably no dividend this year. 2. The difference lies in the fact that the parent company is now tapping, while the trees on the subsidiary will not come into bearing for some months. 3. Stick to your London Venture shares. PRIMAVERA.—You need not be anxious about the shares you hold, and I think you will be very ill-advised to sell 1 this year. In view of the present stagnation in the markets I do not care to fix selling limits. Write again in three months' time. PADDOCK.—These are three companies in which you will probably lose your money unless you sell when markets show signs of a revival. POOR DICK.—1. These are quoted daily in the Financier. 2. Yes. 3. Chiefly in consequence of "bear" sales. PLUNGER.—You had better retain 1 and 3 for recovery. They are fair second-rate concerns. I regret that I cannot decipher the name of your second company. PORTENI.—You should say whether you have bought the shares, and if so, the price given. I could then be of greater assistance to you. 1. This is a company in which I should not hold shares. 2 and 3 are both fair speculative investments at present price.

QUORN.—My opinion is that you would do well to sell as soon as you can.

RADIUM.—Merlimaus and Beverley Tea and Rubber fulfil the conditions you mention. RETIRO.—1-2. Hold both for recovery and a profit. 3. This is a doubtful proposition. You would do well to exchange this for a more promising share on a market revival. RHUBARB.—I will try to get the information about dividends and reply next week. RHUBARB.—(Second letter.) Your assumption is correct. RAASAY.—Yes, hold for a time, but not as permanent investments. RAINBOW.—1. The premium of £2 is in addition to the amount paid—viz., 17s. 6d. 2. Hold for a good profit. 3. Yes. 4. The quotation is included in the list of rubber shares given in most of the financial papers. R. MAR.—You may hold these as an investment. R. H.—It would not be wise to try to sell any of the four shares just now. 1. May become a good investment share some day, but I have never advised a purchase. 2. This should be the first to be got rid of. 3 and 4. You will have to hold these until the beginning of 1912 if you wish to understand their merits as investments, but, of course, market activity in the meantime may result in an advance on the present quotation.

SILBURN.—As your handwriting is indistinct, my reply to you last week was given under 'Lilburn," which please see. The shares named should all be held for dividends, with the exception of 3, which should be sold when you can get a small profit. You ought to have mentioned the cost price. SHEERNESS.—(a) The outlook for this company is less promising than heretofore, so that when you can sell without loss you had better do so. (b) These are considered cheap at anything under 10s., but you do not state what you gave for them. SEPIA.—You must not send eight questions with one coupon. Please see the Rules. I will endeavour to obtain all the information you require, and reply in our next issue. STOCKTON.—I should not buy any of the shares now with the exception of 2, 3, and 4. SHELBOURNE.—I adhere entirely to what I said. Several times every week I beg of correspondents to give me precise particulars of their shares, including the cost price, when asking for advice. You asked me whether I would advise a purchase of shares, and complain because my reply did not suggest that you should sell, when I stated that there are better bargains to be picked up at present prices. I had no means of knowing that you held the shares, and as I have no space in this column to write an essay on the pros and cons of every company about which general questions are asked, I have to assume that each query is put in good faith. SLAINTE.—Do not apologise for writing again. I am always pleased to receive your communications and to help you as far as possible. Do not worry about the shares in question. Wait for the meeting which will be held shortly. SUNDA.—I still think that, considering the prices you gave, you are likely to make a good profit from these shares if you hold for a time, and as you can easily afford to buy some more I should certainly average. SWAN.—I should not take the new shares. SANDHAVEN.—Do not put all the amount mentioned into rubber, but you might with advantage invest, say, 25 per cent., dividing it between Batu Caves and Beverley Tea and Rubber. SPHINX.—The only companies that seem to comply with your requirements are Kamuning and Merlimau.

TALISMAN.—1 and 2. Both shares should be held for a market revival. 3. Yes. You had better write to the company for a copy of the prospectus if you are a shareholder. TRAFOI.—Hold them for the present. If you have no more rubber shares it will be well, as soon as a favourable opportunity occurs, to sell 1 and 3, and reinvest in good plantation companies. Your list, as shown, consists only of second-rate trust companies. TEVIOT.—This is a good company, in which you may safely retain your holding for future dividends. TOBY.—All in the front rank. You could not do better, as you do not wish to speculate. TIPP.—1-2. Both these should ultimately prove good speculative investments. Average. 3. These are well spoken of in some quarters, and I think there is a possibility of appreciation in the price during the next six months.

UTE.—You might keep the shares, but I do not recommend options. UNEASY.—I should not sell any of the shares in your list just now, but if markets become active in the next few months you ought to get rid of 1, 2, 3, 4, and 15. The others you should keep for a year or more.

VICTOR.—Buy the shares mentioned to "Sandhaven."

WAVENEY.—1-3. Keep these all until next March unless in the meantime you can take an excellent profit. 4-6. Madagascar ordinary. WASP.—A complete reply to your letter would occupy two quarto pages, as you have asked more than the prescribed number of questions, and have not numbered one of them. On the basis of the dividend for the last completed year, and at present prices, the approximate yields per cent. of the shares mentioned are as follows:—Bukit Rajah, £7 14s.; Damansara, £5 14s. 3d.; Federated Selangor, £7; Golden Hope, £4 5s. 6d.; Highlands, £5 14s. 3d.; Linggis, £5 13s.; P.P.K., £4 10s.; Selangor, £7 13s. 6d.; and Vallambrosa, £10. If you desire any further information please write again and number your questions. WASP.—(Second letter.) There must be a factor that you have omitted, or no one would think of accepting the offer, but would sell their old shares in the market. W. G.—1. This should turn out well. 2. One of the best of its kind. 3. I think you bought fairly high, but the market think well of the company. If you see a profit take it. 4. I have an unfavourable opinion of this company, but there is no reason for throwing the shares away. Watch your opportunity and sell during the next few months. WOODFORD.—Keep both of these shares for a profit. 1. Ought to return to your price during the next six months. WEARY WILLIE.—My opinion of these companies is favourable. I should average. W. H. C.—1. The price has risen somewhat during the past few weeks, but it will probably advance still further with improved markets generally. 2. The cheapest is the Vine and General Trust 10 per Cent. Participating Preference share. WASHER.—1. I do not think there is any cause to worry about such a contingency. If it happens write again. WOOLLEY.—You ought to have mentioned the prices you gave for the shares. Probably they will all improve in value during the next six months, and should they do so you might take the opportunity of selling 1, 5, and 9. WALES.—You should number your shares. I would not hold any of them with the exception of Labu, but they are of such a class that it is useless to try to sell them just now, as there is practically no market for them. WORRIED.—There is not the least doubt in my mind about the future of this property, which is an excellent one. Hold your shares.

XERXES.—1. See reply to "Omen." 2. Yes. 3. Cheap at 10s. 4. This is a technical point that you do not appear to understand. The mark x.d. appears only for a few days, just long enough for it to be noticed, and then is removed, and does not appear again until the payment of the next dividend demands its reinsertion. 5. The price should improve, as tapping is expected to begin within a few months. 6. Hold your Sekongs.

YNYS.—They are undoubtedly all worth holding for improvement.

ZOO.—1-2. I shall be surprised if the quotation does not recover shortly. 3. I have no knowledge of a call being made in the near future. ZERO.—Your question is vague. All of the shares are likely to rise in value before the estates are in full bearing.

MISCELLANEOUS.

A VICTIM (Aberdeen).—There is nothing in the weekly paper to suggest that it has any connection with any outside firm, but I shall keep in mind what you state. A CORRESPONDENT (Edinburgh).—Thanks. The activities of the firm have been noticed several times in TRUTH lately; I will take an early opportunity of dealing with them again. A SUFFERER (Brecon).—If what you say be correct it is a most extraordinary affair. To fight the company, however, would probably be a costly affair, and hardly worth while unless the shareholders could be induced to take joint action. AKAKAFAX.—1. A sound holding, but I can predict no early increase in the dividend. 2. Trade is good; you might defer selling for the present.

BERKS.—No, there is no connection between the two journals so far as I am aware.

COODEN MOUNT.—The concern is unfamiliar to me. I am afraid there is no market for the shares. CONTANGO (Devon).—A sound investment.

DOUGLAS.—I do not care for 2 or 3, but No. 1 is understood to be doing well, and the shares might be held.

E. A. D.—The concern is unknown to me. The letter is full of wind, but hardly enlightens you much as to the stability of the company. In any case, you would be unwise in buying the land offered without local knowledge obtained first hand.

FIESOLE.—The shares are a high-class investment, and I see no reason why you should sell. If the cotton crop turns out as well as is expected at present a rise to the figure you name is not unlikely this year.

MOTT.—I know of no particular reason why 1, 2, and 3 should be sold now. 4. No reports have been published; dividends have been strangely erratic, but the preference shares may be all right. I have no information about 5. No. 6 has been improving lately, and you might keep the shares.

NOVICE.—Let your losses be the price of a little worldly wisdom, and for the future give the circularising outside broker a wide berth.

PATERFAMILIAS.—You need not be in a hurry to sell any of your rubber or tea shares, but it would perhaps be well to take an early opportunity of getting rid of 2 and 4, as their future is not very promising. I have not been able to obtain any reliable information with regard to 51, for which there is no market here. In the mixed group you have a sound lot as a whole. There is a doubt about No. 19 being self-supporting when the guarantee expires, and if you do not care to face the doubt, sell now. Nos. 42 and 43 are also hardly worth holding. Of the mining shares, Nos. 24 and 48 are promising lock-ups, but No. 37 is a poor holding, and Nos. 13 and 38 are very much of gambles. No. 1 might be sold on a moderate rise.

J. J. M. (Kerry).—Hardly seems worth selling now, but the great bulk of the loss must be regarded as irretrievable.

SANGUINE.—I do not advise purchase of either. SOPWELL.—Sound investment, and call unlikely. I do not anticipate such a rise at present. STAIR.—You might hold 1 and 2. No. 3 is not a strong concern, and I should be inclined to sell the debentures. SCOT.—An unattractive gamble, made additionally risky by the fact—I presume it is a fact in your case—that you know nothing of the so-called banker who is offering the tickets for sale. Dealings in them are illegal in this country, and the English papers are not allowed to publish the results of the drawings.

TWEEDSIDE.—The success of the concern is open to considerable doubt, and the latest borrowing greatly prejudices the prospects for the shareholders. I cannot strongly recommend you to hold.

URUMID.—Three good investments.

W. J. H. (Newcastle).—Thanks for the circular.

YANG GUEI TZU.—1. I know nothing against the firm, but my advice is always to deal direct with members of the Stock Exchange. 2. Not the kind of thing that I should recommend. If you can get a reasonable offer for the shares it would be as well to accept it.

VIGILANT.

INSURANCE.

THE BENEFIT OF INCOME-TAX—WRONG AND RIGHT WAYS OF JUDGING RESULTS—COMPOUND INTEREST AT 4½ PER CENT.—MAINTENANCE OF CAPITAL VALUES.

IN a recent article I dealt with life assurance for the wealthy, illustrating what could be done with a premium of £1,000 a year, taking account of rebate of income-tax, including super-tax, upon the premiums paid. Some correspondents have kindly pointed out that the benefits were greater than I showed, while others have suggested that they were to some extent over-stated. A yet further comment upon that article was that comparatively few people can afford so much as £1,000 a year for a premium on a life policy, and that it would be more useful to give the corresponding figures for a premium of £100 a year, taking into account rebate of income-tax at 1s. 2d. in the £.

A convenient policy to use in illustration is ten year endowment assurance, under which the sum assured, with profits in addition, is paid at the end of ten years, or at death if previous. I will suppose that 1,000 people aged forty take a policy of this kind at an annual premium of £106 3s. 10d., which entitles them to rebate of £6 3s. 10d. for income-tax, leaving their net outlay £100 a year. In the course of ten years it may be supposed that 116 people will die, and that 884 out of the original 1,000 will survive at the end of the term. The 116 policy-holders who die will pay between them £71,044 in premiums. They will receive rebate of income-tax to the amount of £4,144, making their net outlay £66,900 between them in the course of ten years; their estates will receive from the assurance company £127,324, or very nearly double the amount they have paid in.

The 884 people who survive to the end of the term will pay in premiums £938,761, and they will obtain rebate of income-tax to the extent of £54,761, leaving their net outlay £884,000, each policy-holder having paid £1,000 in the course of ten years. In return for this outlay of £884,000 they will obtain, at the end of the ten years, £1,051,076, a sum which exceeds the amount paid in by £167,076. In other words, each policy-holder who has paid £100 a year for ten years will receive back £1,189 at the end of the time. This is the return to the survivors, while the return to the estates of those who die within the ten years is £1,903 for each £1,000 paid in premiums. Thus the total account will stand as follows:—

| | Those who Die. £ | Those who Survive. £ | Total. £ |
|---|---|---|---|
| Premiums paid ... | 71,044 | 938,761 | 1,009,805 |
| Income Tax..... | 4,144 | 54,761 | 58,905 |
| Net outlay ..... | 66,900 | 884,000 | 950,900 |
| Profits..... | 60,424 | 167,076 | 227,500 |
| Yielded by policies | 127,324 | 1,051,076 | 1,178,400 |

This table shows up very clearly three common mistakes which are made by people in thinking about life assurance. Sometimes a man will say that he has paid this premium of £106 3s. 10d. a year for ten years in return for which he obtains £1,189 at the end of the time. Perhaps he calculates the rate of compound interest yielded by this investment, in which case he will find that it is between £2 and £2 2s. 6d. per cent. free of income-tax. He may very naturally consider that so low a rate of interest is unattractive, and decide that he can do better with his money by investing it in some other way.

Although it is true that he has paid £106 3s. 10d. a year to a life office, he has saved £6 3s. 10d. of income-tax, and his net outlay has been only £100 a year, and for this sum to amount to £1,189 at the end of ten years he would have to obtain compound interest at the rate of £3 2s. 6d. per cent; this is the net rate after deduction of tax, and, as a matter of fact, his investment would have to yield him £3 6s. 4d. subject to tax if the net return is to be £3 2s. 6d.

Even if he pays attention to these points, he has not yet grasped the full benefit of the transaction; this is the result to those who survive to the end of the term, but 116 people out of every 1,000 do a vast deal better than this financially; they die during the endowment period, with the result that their estates receive on the average £1,903 for each £1,000 paid in premiums. It is quite impossible for any one of the 1,000 people alive at the start to say whether he will survive to the end of the term or die meantime; he has as good a chance of dying as anybody else, in which case his estate will receive a vast deal more than the total amount he has paid to the life assurance company. This chance, this insurance protection, can be bought by itself, and may be fairly estimated as being worth £6 a year, on the average, throughout the whole ten years. It is worth more than this at the beginning of the endowment period and less than this at the end; but for the convenience of calculation, we may deduct £6 each year from the premium paid, which makes the net amount of the money available for investments or savings only £94 a year. Deduction of income-tax reduces the premium to £100, and the £6 a year paid for insurance protection corresponds exactly to the premiums paid for fire insurance protection; whether a man has a fire or not he has the protection, which is worth what it costs; and, similarly with life assurance, whether he ultimately proves to be one of the 884 survivors of the ten-year term, or one of the 116 people who die during the ten years, he has the protection, and it also is worth what it costs. Now £94 a year must earn compound interest at the rate of £4 5s. a year in order to amount to £1,189 at the end of ten years. This is a net 4¼ per cent., and the interest would have to be at £4 10s. 3d., subject to tax at 1s. 2d. in the £, to yield a net return of 4¼ per cent.

Thus there are many wrong ways and one right way of looking at the results of a life assurance policy. The wrongest way of all ignores income-tax altogether, ignores the value of insurance protection, and works out the rate of interest as being only 2 per cent. It may be recognised that this 2 per cent. is free of income-tax, and that the yield is really above £2 2s. 6d. per cent. subject to tax. Rebate of income-tax on premiums paid may be taken into account, in which case it will be seen that the investment yields compound interest at the net rate of £3 2s. 6d., which is really £3 6s. 4d. per cent., subject to tax. Thus the income-tax regulations, and nothing but the income-tax regulations, increase the yield on the investment from an apparent 2 per cent. to a real £3 6s. 4d. The true nature of the investment is not seen until insurance protection is taken into account, when it is found that the return yielded is more than 4½ per cent. compound interest, subject to tax at 1s. 2d. in the £.

The lucrative nature of a well-chosen life assurance policy is greater the higher the income-tax. People who pay premiums out of incomes subject to super-tax obtain results which are even better than those I have been quoting. Those whose incomes are subject to tax at only 9d. in the £ gain less than the figures I have given, but their gain is also very considerable.

In any case there are two most important aspects of life assurance as an investment. One is that the money paid is automatically accumulated at compound interest, which in actual practice no individual acting alone can obtain for himself. Incidentally the investment of money in life assurance involves no trouble in collecting securities, and no expense for stamps and brokerage. Another solid and remarkable advantage is that the capital cannot depreciate in value. This is an experience only too common with investments of other kinds, and there are numberless securities which in the course of the past ten years have fallen so greatly in value that had the whole of the dividends been applied to maintain the capital value intact, the dividends would have been insufficient for the purpose.

In view of facts of this character it is manifestly advisable for every one to examine carefully the nature of life assurance as an investment, and to consider whether it is not possible to invest his money in this way to much better advantage than in the most carefully chosen securities of other kinds.

COMPANY MEETINGS.

VINE AND GENERAL RUBBER TRUST.

The Guiguet Patents.

The statutory meeting of the Vine and General Rubber Trust, Limited, was held on the 5th inst. at Salisbury House, London Wall, E.C., Mr. F. W. Baker (chairman of the company) presiding.

The secretary (Mr. Henry Richards) having read the notice convening the meeting and the auditors' certificate,

The Chairman said that the report circulated called for no special comment, but he would like to point out that it showed that the total number of shares allotted was 500,000 Ten per Cent. Participating Preference shares, all of which were subscribed on the public issue, upon which a call of 5s. a share had been paid up, and that the cash received amounted at the date of the report to £117,894. Since that date additional amounts had been received in respect of allotments.

Coming to the prospectus, the trust was formed particularly in connection with forest areas where wild vines were found in their natural state, and generally to finance or otherwise assist in the organisation and promotion of rubber industrial and other companies or enterprises. As chairman of the Madagascar and Nyassa Rubber Companies, he had had occasion at public meetings in London to emphasise the importance of this new rubber industry, but it was then only in an experimental state, and had not reached the practical stage which it now had.

He was in a position to announce that they had now on consignment to London from Madagascar a considerable quantity of native dirty rubber cleaned by the Guiguet machine, and a consignment of rubber extracted in the forests by the machine from the Landolphia vines. Few people realised that a large quantity of the rubber produced and sold annually was extracted from rubber vines, root rubber, and rubber bulbs collected by natives under the most primitive conditions and in the crudest manner. It was obtained from the Belgian Congo, German East Africa, Nyassaland, Mozambique, Rhodesia, parts of Natal, Angolaland, Portuguese West Africa, Ashanti, the Ivory Gold Coast, the French Congo, Abyssinia, Nigeria, Madagascar, the Cameroons, and most of the Central American States; in fact, he might say in different varieties throughout the tropics.

It was curious that until M. Guiguet invented his machine a rapid and cheap method of dealing with this valuable product had not been invented. That had now been accomplished. This company had acquired an option over the world's rights for the machine, which would inaugurate a distinct departure from the conditions which had hitherto prevailed, and would establish a new industry. The reasons for supposing it would be a great success were that the vines grew naturally in most tropical countries; that they required no cultivation; after being cut with ordinary care they re-grew and were ready for cutting again at any period from six to eight years; that from tests made an average of 2½ lbs. of dry rubber could be extracted from the bark of each ten-year-old vine; that the quality was good, and that the machine could be easily transported. A further point was that within a year a company could be exporting rubber and earning dividends. Labour, too, was cheap, and no skill was required. They thus had all the conditions for a most successful enterprise. Dealing with what had already been done in Madagascar, the Chairman said that the quantity to be extracted from a ten-year-old vine had been fixed by experts at 2½ lbs. The ten Guiguet machines delivered and erected cost approximately under £10,000. According to an estimate by Mr. Chaplin, and already borne out by practical work in connection with the Madagascar Company, these machines should earn on a conservative basis £40,000 per annum, which was equivalent to a return of 400 per cent. on the actual capital laid out. This was independent of the profits made by cleaning dirty native rubber bought from the natives, and he saw no reason why those figures should vary appreciably from the results which might be expected in other tropical countries, providing the transport and labour conditions were as favourable as in Madagascar.

With regard to the point that any company formed to operate the Guiguet machine on wild vine rubber should within one year of its incorporation be actually producing and shipping rubber to the markets, he might say that the Madagascar Rubber Company was organised on February 2 this year, and notwithstanding the fact that as a pioneer company it had had to suffer considerable delays before the machine could be built and shipped to Madagascar, that would not be the case with any new companies organised now. It had shipped in July, within six months of its incorporation, rubber extracted by the Guiguet machines in the forests of Madagascar, and he knew of no rubber company yet organised which could point to such a successful result. As to the question of labour, judged by the standard of Madagascar, Nyassa, Natal, the Ivory Gold Coast, or, indeed, Central Africa, they should find cheap labour and as much as they required. The latest information from Madagascar indicated that 120 natives were able to cut a quantity of rubber vines in excess of the machine to handle the bark; in fact, it was one of the great features of the Guiguet machine that such a considerable production of rubber could be obtained with so little labour. The labour was required only for cutting down the vines and decorticating the bark, and was not required for keeping the estates clean. He was glad to say that the directors had not been idle since the inception of the company.

As the result of the work done they had made a profit of £10,000 in cash and nearly £92,000 in shares. The larger part of this profit was dependent on the exercise by the company of the option over the Guiguet machine, as set out in the prospectus. Should the company eventually decide to exercise the option, the entire amount of this profit would belong to the company, but should they decide not to exercise the option the profits still remaining would be a very handsome return for the three months since the inception of the company. Of the public issues which had appeared in connection with wild vine rubber they had an interest in the flotation of the Amatongaland Rubber Company, which was formed to exploit an area of 440,000 acres in Northern Natal, which company also owned 5,000 acres of plantation, on which there were already planted 19,000 Hevea Braziliensis of two years' old growth, with nurseries containing 360,000 seedlings ready to be planted out. The directors were also taking part in the flotation of another company in Natal, which would come out after the holidays.

The Ivory Coast Corporation, the prospectus of which was advertised on Monday, was another company in which they had also taken an interest. That company controlled 1,000,000 acres on the French Ivory Coast, and it had a larger capital and a strong board. They had also acquired a three months' option to examine 12,000 acres in the Belgian Congo, part of which was planted in 1901 with 900,000 Landolphia vines, and the company's expert had already left to examine the property. In Angola they had acquired a four months' option to purchase an area of 134 square miles, which was reported to be thickly grown with Landolphia vines. This territory would be examined by the same expert who had left for the Belgian Congo. In Portuguese Guinea they had secured a four months' option, subject to examination, to acquire one hundred square miles of territory thickly covered with Landolphia vines. They were also in negotiation for an area of 100 square miles in British East Africa, which, subject to examination, the board proposed to take over, and which had all the earmarks of a very suitable business for the company. Elsewhere negotiations were proceeding for the sole right to collect rubber from vines over a large area. In Guatemala an option had been secured to purchase 40,000 acres of freehold, and the right to collect wild rubber over 375,000 acres for six years, on which there existed 343,000 Castilloa rubber trees, averaging from five to fifteen years in growth. The vendor covenanted to plant, at his own expense, before the end of this year, a further 160,000 trees. The estate was now producing over 4,000 lbs. of rubber per month. They had numerous other negotiations in hand, one involving an area of 28,000 square miles in Portuguese East Africa, and negotiations for a large area in tropical East Africa. In fact, he might say without hesitation that merchants and others connected with the tropics were inundating the directors with offers either to work their areas on which the Landolphia vines grew or else to take over the Guiguet machine on a royalty basis, and he felt that all they needed now was to be in a position to publicly announce that they had shipped from the vine forests in Madagascar, and had sold at remunerative prices, at least fifty tons of rubber, to put them in a position which would enable them to secure more business than their capital could take in hand.

In conclusion, the Chairman said: We are concerned in the development of what I feel will be a big and profitable industry in an article which seems to grow more and more in importance, and the demand for which is so steadily and rapidly increasing. I have, before closing, to deal with a matter which requires a reference—namely, the letters that have appeared in the Financial News with reference to the interests of a Mr. Fitzpatrick in what are known as the Arnaud patents. We have had this matter under consideration by our lawyers for the last three months, and we have quite satisfied ourselves that Mr. Arnaud's claims in no way affect the value or the validity of the Guiguet patents. The course adopted by Mr. Fitzpatrick in taking the public into his confidence through the friendly services of the financial Press seems to me, as a lawyer, a somewhat unusual method, and I am astonished that, if he thinks his interests have been prejudiced by the Guiguet patents, he has not availed himself of the usual course of applying to the courts for the remedies that are open to all whose rights have been infringed. It must be within the knowledge of Mr. Fitzpatrick and Mr. Arnaud that Mr. Guiguet has been operating his machine in Lyons for the last two years, and, notwithstanding this fact, and also that the Madagascar Company has been in operation for six months and the Nyassa Company for five months, they have not taken any steps to protect their interests. We, as the Vine and General Rubber Trust, merely hold an option from Mr. Schlesinger, who is the option holder from Mr. Guiguet over the Guiguet patent rights, and I do not think that I could do better than ask Mr. Schlesinger, who is here to-day, to read you the letter which he is to-day sending to the Financial News, and which I hope will have the effect of putting a stop to this correspondence, which during the holiday season becomes somewhat of a nuisance, and it certainly will give Mr. Fitzpatrick an opportunity of protecting his rights in any way that he thinks necessary. (Applause.)

Mr. Louis G. Schlesinger also spoke to the effect that nothing could affect the validity of the Guiguet patents. He had written that day to the Financial News to the following effect:—"Sir,—Your esteemed paper has published a new letter, which Mr. Cahill wrote yesterday to the directors of the Vine and General Rubber Trust, Limited. You will note that nothing which he says affects the accuracy of my two statements, namely: (1) That I am the sole option holder over the Guiguet patents; and (2) that Guiguet's and Arnaud's mechanical processes are totally and absolutely distinct. The only claim put forward by the writer seems to be that Arnaud first conceived the idea of separating the rubber from the bark by mechanical means—viz., pounding, washing, and rolling. This is a claim of purely historical interest, and if it aroused, as Mr. Cahill says, great interest in scientific and industrial circles, then such a circumstance must have afforded considerable amusement to the African natives, who from time immemorial extracted rubber from the bark by the mechanical process of pestle and mortar. In fact, there is a far greater analogy between this native 'master idea' and the Arnaud method than between the latter and the Guiguet processes. As I have no wish to prolong this unusual and unnecessary correspondence, I have only to add, in conclusion, that if Mr. Cahill's clients feel that their interests are in any way prejudiced by the Guiguet patents, instead of laying their case before the public, through the kindly services of financial papers, they would be well advised to protect their rights in the usual legal manner." (Applause.)

No resolution was submitted, and the proceedings closed with a vote of thanks to the chairman.

QUEER STORY.

A SPORTING DREAM.

CAPTAIN PERCY GASCOIGNE was a keen horseman. But, keen as he was, and ever ready to accept the offer of a mount for a race, it is doubtful whether even he could have faced the hopeless chance which "Mugwamp" presented for the Rangalore Cup had the pony belonged to any one else than Miss Cicely Graham. That Cicely and he were more than friends had been for some time a recognised fact amongst the ladies of the station. That "Mugwamp" was a fat, lazy beast, with vicious tricks, was equally known to Percy's brother officers. The 1st Hussars of the Line were themselves possessed of some remarkably good ponies, and Gascoigne's refusal of all other mounts in favour of Miss Graham's could only be explained in one way. Where woman wills man must mostly yield, and when Cicely's blue eyes softly pleaded they would have melted a much less susceptible heart than Captain Gascoigne made any pretence of possessing.

In an Indian station, where most information is common property and outside competitors few, it is not surprising that the chances of each horse can be gauged to a nicety, which, however, interferes most seriously with betting. In fact, so difficult was it, as a rule, to make a respectable book upon a classical race that professional bookmakers seldom cared to journey all the way from Madras for the meeting. This year proved to be no exception to the general rule. Until almost the first day of the races the totalisator appeared to be the only hope for those whose soul yearned for gambling.

To everybody's surprise, however, at the last minute there arose, to gladden the hearts of the station, an amateur firm of "bookies," in the shape of two subalterns of the Native Regiment. They were cautious to begin with, refusing to take any serious bets until the horses should have passed the weighing-room. To all importunate customers they pleaded patience, but, in spite of this, there surrounded them, long before the Cup race, a crowd of waiting aspirants asking for prices.

Captain Gascoigne and Miss Graham, after watching the first races together, wandered towards the paddock. There, as one of a line of ponies slowly showing their paces in the hands of their syces, marched the graceless "Mugwamp." With an inward groan, Gascoigne listened to the final exhortations of his pretty companion, and, leaving her to caress her pony, made his way to the dressing-room.

He had barely given himself time to change into his racing kit, and already the weighing had begun. The dressing-room beneath the grand stand was full of gentleman jockeys and their servants, dressing and undressing amidst a litter of clothes indescribable. Percy, pushing his way through the throng of loiterers, nodded here and there, answered chaffing questions concerning his mount, whilst he looked about for his native servant.

As he peered on all sides in vain, his glance met that of a civilian who was sitting on a chair near the door. The latter, by no means more than a mere acquaintance, seemed, for some peculiar reason, to at once awaken to a special interest in the young cavalry officer.

"Good afternoon, Captain Gascoigne," said he, politely. "Here's a chair. You haven't too much time if you're riding in this race."

"Ah—er—thank you, Parkins," drawled Percy, looking anxiously amongst the lines of kit bags.

"Lost anything?" asked the other, civilly.

"Yes. My confounded servant hasn't turned up with my bag," cried Percy.

"Come along, Gascoigne! Hurry up! You're keeping the whole show waiting," called a voice from outside.

"All right," shouted Percy, irritably, "I can't ride in my shirt!"

The room was hot and ill-ventilated. The sun at that hour of the afternoon had not nearly reached the horizon. With no servant in view and no apparent hope of finding him, added to the heat and by no means exciting prospect of riding a rank outsider, it is hardly surprising that Percy began to lose his temper. In fact, circumstances, apart from inclination, were all driving him towards what seemed the one and only possible course—to wit, scratching the pony. Indeed, if he wasn't extremely quick, it seemed probable that the stewards would do it for him.

Giving another hurried look about the room, he was striding towards the door when he was arrested by the polite voice of Mr. Parkins.

"Look here," said the latter, hurriedly, "I have an outfit here, that will not be wanted to-day, which I'll lend you with pleasure, if you care to use it. Of course, the colours are not yours, but there is plenty of time to declare your change to the stewards. It's a pity to scratch for nothing."

Percy's immediate inclination was to refuse. He didn't know anything against Parkins, but for some reason he didn't like the man. To ride, also, in any colours but those of Miss Graham was extremely distasteful to him.

For a few seconds he stood irresolute, the words of abrupt refusal upon his lips. Then, floating across his mental vision, came the memory of a pair of beseeching blue eyes, whose soft glances were worth all else beside. The thought of those eyes, wet with tears, caused such a revulsion of feeling, that he resolved to get to the post at all costs.

The work of getting into the borrowed plumes, eagerly assisted as he was by Parkins, was completed in record time. By an extraordinary coincidence even the boots fitted to a nicety, and Percy hurried forth just in time to save the situation. They were not very strict at Rangalore, and the delinquent was an undoubted favourite with the stewards. Consequently, no serious objection was made to the latter's appearance, arrayed as he was in glaring yellow and black stripes in lieu of the advertised colours of mauve and white. The change of colours being officially declared, Percy passed the scales, and within a few seconds was hurriedly explaining the situation to Cicely as he sprang into the saddle.

In the interval, the unobtrusive Parkins might have been seen executing a curious manœuvre. With marvellous rapidity he dodged between the sauntering groups of people in the enclosure until he had found the two amateur bookies. So anxious did he seem to reach them that it is surprising how short an interview seemed sufficient to satisfy him. A quick nod and an answering wink from the sharp-featured youth, who, with pencil in hand, was slowly laying the odds, ended the conference, and Mr. Parkins melted again into the crowd.

No sooner had he gone on his way than the betting began with remarkable celerity. What was more remarkable, the whole of the Gunner mess suddenly seemed to lose their heads and began to jostle one another to back "Mugwamp." The odds, which had started at twenty to one against, fell with lightning rapidity to tens, and, as the betting still continued, before the flag fell the odds against the late outsider had reached twos. The recent favourite, who had a few minutes before seemed a dead certainty, receded in demand until the bookies were taking bets at longer and longer odds.

As Miss Cicely, escorted by one of Percy's brother officers, reached the stand, her cheeks burned with delight and anticipation. That her own dear little pony should be in such extraordinary demand was strangely incredible, and yet how sure she had felt of his chance! Her escort, tactfully reticent, was as puzzled as even Percy would have been, and could hardly believe his ears. But whatever the cause of the sudden rise to favour, there was now little time left for speculation. The bell rang. The usual cry of "They're off!" brought all eyes with one accord to their glasses.

With her diminutive lace handkerchief rolled into a ball in her perspiring hand, Cicely was shaking with nervous tremulousness. Her eyes, feverishly watching, saw that the start was good. For a furlong or more "Mugwamp" ran second. Then, amidst a spontaneous hum of voices from the stand, the erstwhile favourite fell behind. Presently, for all eyes to see, "Mugwamp's" jockey began to use the whip. Half the course had still to be covered. "Humph!" grunted Miss Cicely's escort, "he's beaten."

Apparently the Hussar was not the only observer, for with a rush the Gunners made for the bookies. To hedge at the last moment was the only hope. Even as they ran, "Mugwamp" was dropping farther and farther to the rear. The bookies, however, as they themselves expressed it, were not "taking any." The Gunners might grouse as they liked, but their language was of no avail. "Mugwamp," lazily lolloping up the straight, absolutely indifferent to his rider's angry cuts, crossed the line, without a vestige of shame, a good last.

That night Percy was due to dine at the Gunner mess. Delayed by a highly gratifying ride home with Cicely, he ran into his bungalow with barely sufficient time at his disposal to dress. In the memories of that drive, the race had almost been forgotten. In fact, had it not been for the guilty expression of his errant servant, standing in his dressing-room at his usual post of duty, it is probable that Captain Gascoigne would have forgotten the latter's recent delinquency altogether.

The bearer, obsequiously salaaming, began to busy himself with his master's uniform.

"Hullo, Abdul, you scoundrel," cried Percy, "what have you to say for yourself? Where were you this afternoon?"

"As the sahib ordered, so did I go with the sahib's bag to the race plain, and——" He hesitated, grunting as he squatted on the floor to unlace his master's boots.

"Well!"

"At the gate, sahib, another sahib's bearer did bid me not enter, saying that at the order of his master he would take my bag and himself serve the captain sahib."

"Who was this other master?" asked Percy, his suspicions again aroused.

Abdul grunted disparagingly. "That master, he some civilian sahib—railway employ—Pertekeans sahib."

"Do you mean Parkins?" asked Percy.

"Hah, sahib!"

"Well, I'm d——d!" gasped Percy.

As he finished his dressing his brain was racked with perplexing thought. What earthly reason could that little bounder Parkins have for concealing his bag? What connection, if any, could there be between such an incident and the fact that such a well-known outsider as "Mugwamp" had started as first favourite?

The mess that evening was very full. The Gunners, burning with race-week hospitality, had invited friends from every regiment in the station. Amidst the hum of conversation, the clinking of sherry glasses, and the monotonous swish of the punkahs, the ante-room seemed a veritable beehive. But the entrance of Captain Gascoigne, modestly as it was effected, drew all eyes with one accord upon his bewildered countenance.

"Ah, here he is!" cried Molyneux of the Horse Battery. "Come along, Gascoigne, and tell us all about it."

"About what?" asked Percy, quietly.

"Why, the race, of course! How the deuce did 'Mugwamp' become favourite?"

The rows of eager faces watched Percy with burning interest, and for an instant nothing but the swish of the punkahs broke the stillness.

"Upon my word, gentlemen," said Percy, slowly, "I have no more idea than the man in the moon!"

"But, look here, old fellow," insisted Molyneux, "why did you change your colours? You can tell us that?"

"You see," broke in an excited subaltern, "we all backed the black and yellow."

"And are all stony-broke in consequence," groaned another.

"Backed the colours!" exclaimed Percy, a glimmer of light crossing his puzzled brain. "Ah!"

At that moment the Colonel led the way into the mess-room, and the officers were forced to follow. The required explanation, however, was not long in forthcoming. Presently Percy's attention was arrested by the voices of several subalterns in heated argument a little way down the table.

"I tell you," said a youngster but lately joined, "I know no more than you do. I wish you fellows would chuck it!"

"Oh," said Molyneux to Percy, "there's that young ass Simpkins again. He's the cause of the whole business. He has cost us more than his whole carcase is worth."

"He! How?" asked Percy in surprise.

"Why, haven't you heard the gruesome tale at all?"

"Not a word."

"Ah! Well, he has made us all look remarkably foolish, I'm afraid; but you are bound to hear it. Simpkins has been imitating Joseph. The young blighter took to having devilled bones and beer for supper, and consequently dreamed a dream."

"I couldn't help it," interrupted the wretched Simpkins, upon whose reddened visage the glances of the whole table were now centred. "I dreamed the beastly thing two nights running."

"What was it?" asked Percy.

"I saw," said Simpkins, "as plainly as I see you now, a jockey in yellow and black colours romp home in the race for the Rangalore Cup."

"And there were no such colours advertised," murmured Percy.

"Quite so, old fellow," cried Molyneux, "but you wore them, didn't you? There lies the mystery."

For the moment all other conversation had ceased.

The attention of the whole table was concentrated upon Gascoigne's troubled countenance.

"Humph!" grunted the latter at last. "Do you happen, Simpkins, to know anyone of the name of Parkins?"

"Met him once!" replied Simpkins, draining his glass.

"May I ask where?"

"At the Native Infantry Mess. I dined there last week."

"Ah!" drawled Percy, thoughtfully. "Do you know anything of the little bounder?"

"No, nothing," replied Simpkins. "He was dining with Smith of the Rajputs."

"By Jove!" ejaculated Percy. "I've got it!"

"What?" demanded a chorus of voices.

"Oh, it was a delightful plot," said Percy, slowly. "Nevertheless, I'm extremely sorry that I was the cats-paw." He turned once more to Simpkins. "You told your dream to the Rajputs, I suppose?"

Simpkins, reduced to speechlessness, nodded.

"Out with it, Gascoigne. We've paid the price, and at least deserve to hear the swindle," cried Molyneux.

"Well, gentlemen, it appears that Simpkins dreamed that certain unknown colours would win. Simpkins tells his dream in the presence of Smith and this fellow Parkins. Parkins sent a bogus message to my bearer this afternoon, which lost me my kit-bag. The same Parkins, conveniently present in the dressing-room, lends me an outfit—strangely enough, of yellow and black colours. You fellows, unable to resist such an apparent tip from the spiritual world, proceed to back my wretched pony for all you're worth. Who was to gain? Parkins was a friend of Smith, didn't you say?"

"Yes," stammered Simpkins.

"And wasn't Smith one of the two beauties who took your bets?"

"And our money!" cried a subaltern opposite. "Oh, Simpkins, when we reach the billiard-room, you may fear the worst!"

Over what happened to Simpkins after dinner history has spread a veil, but certain it is that the senior officers wisely avoided the billiard-room, from whence echoes of shrieks rent the hot atmosphere as of howls from the torture chamber.

BOOKS.

IN an elaborate study of "The Women of Shakespeare" a learned German critic, Dr. Lewes, infers that the poet's wife must have been a shrew, since nearly all the women of his early plays are shrews. But these early plays are imitative, as all early work is, and Shakespeare in them merely caught the tone of the dramatists of the day, and, for that matter, of the day itself, towards women. Ben Jonson's women, e.g., are more repellent even than these women of Shakespeare's early plays, for rare Ben was simply echoing the tone of the day towards the sex. In Mrs. Stepney Rawson's "Bess of Hardwick" (1), e.g., the Bishop of Lichfield and Coventry writes thus to the Earl of Shrewsbury in urging upon him a reconciliation with this masterful termagant:—

> But some will say in your Lordship's behalf that the Countess is a sharp and bitter shrew, and therefore like enough to shorten your life if she should keep you company. Indeed, my Lord, I have heard some say so; but, if shrewdness or sharpness may be a just cause of separation between a man and wife, I think few men in England would keep their wives long; for it is a common jest, yet true in some sense, that there is but one shrew in all the world and every man hath her; and so every man might be rid of his wife that would be rid of a shrew.

That was the tone of the day—the day of great Elizabeth—towards women, and great Elizabeth herself and her understudy, as I might almost call her, Bess of Hardwick, may well have set to their sex this fashion of shrewishness. Elizabeth, however great she may have been as a queen, shows herself here, as in all other intimate records of her, the pettiest as well as the most detestable of women. To speak, as Mrs. Stepney Rawson does, of Elizabeth's "immense sacrifice of her womanhood for England" is preposterous, since if ever there was a monarch who believed "L'état, c'est moi!" it was Elizabeth, and that "immense sacrifice of her womanhood" was made to her own masterfulness which would allow none to share her power. The paradoxical thing about Elizabeth which strikes you in Mrs. Stepney Rawson's interesting work, as in all domestic revelations about that queen, is that so much littleness should go with so much greatness and so much silliness with so much shrewdness. Her vanity was almost insane—for extreme vanity is one of the indications of insanity—while her amenability to the most outrageous flattery was almost imbecile. Then, the pettiness of her spite, her jealousy and her revenge is almost incredible in a woman whom Tennyson calls "man-minded." These littlenesses, however, are to be found in every domestic record of Elizabeth, but Mrs. Stepney Rawson gives you also a choice specimen of the smallness of her wit. When the Earl of Leicester, the most favoured and the least worthy of all the men Elizabeth played with, went to stay with the Shrewsburys the queen wrote to the countess a letter (which was suppressed by Burghley or Walsingham because of its silliness) assuring them that whatever honour they did the earl she would take as done to herself, and that she herself would be their debtor for whatever expense they were put to in entertaining him. She adds then that as she was to pay for his board:—

> We must prescribe unto you a proportion of diet which we mean in no case you shall exceed—and that is to allow him by the day of his meat two ounces of flesh, referring the quality to yourselves so as you exceed not the quantity; and for his drink one-twentieth of a pint of wine to comfort his stomach, and as much of St. Anne's sacred water as he lusteth to drink. On festival days, as is fit for a man of his quality, we can be content you shall enlarge his diet by allowing unto him for his dinner the shoulder of a wren, and for his supper a leg of the same, besides his ordinary two ounces.

The most amazing letter in the volume, however, is that which Mary Queen of Scots wrote to Elizabeth spitefully reporting Bess of Hardwick's accounts to her of the unspeakable licentiousness of the Virgin Queen, of her silly and insatiable vanity, and of her incredible brutality to her maids of honour. But Bess of Hardwick herself, as Mrs. Stepney Rawson remarks, was very like Elizabeth both in her strength and in her weakness. That she should have survived four husbands is certainly more natural than that any of the four could have survived her. How Mrs. Stepney Rawson can think that the "lovely redolent aeglantine" appropriately symbolises her heroine I cannot imagine. Hunter was nearer the mark in suggesting that Massinger must have based his character of Sir Giles Overreach upon Bess of Hardwick, and Lodge was nearer the mark in describing the lady as "violent, treacherous, and cruel." I think it was a mistake to interpolate fictitious drawing-room dramatic scenes, as Mrs. Stepney Rawson rather fantastically has done, into her historical essay, since this sudden striking of a new key is not only discordant but disillusioning.

Mr. Ernest Scott's "Terre Napoleon" (2) is a singularly elaborate, lucid, and convincing refutation of an idea to which Dr. Holland Rose amongst others has given currency—that Napoleon sent a French admiral under the guise of being an emissary of civilisation to claim half the continent of Australia for France. To begin with, the Terre Napoleon was far from being half the continent of Australia, while the expedition to it was purely scientific, sailing under the command, not of a French admiral in French men-of-war, but of a captain who had never served in the navy, only in the merchant service and on scientific expeditions. Mr. Ernest Scott, in a word, completely demolishes Dr. Holland Rose's idea that "the unknown continent of Australia appealed to Napoleon's imagination, which pictured its solitudes transformed by French energy into a second fatherland." By the way, in this most interesting and entertaining book I came upon for the first time this Talleyrandian mot of Napoleon's. In reply to Napoleon's insistence on ships being sent forthwith with supplies for the support of the Isle of France, Decrès wrote, resignedly, "I shall recognise the will of God and will send them." Napoleon thus begins his rejoinder: "I will pardon you for comparing me to God." Napoleon is not reported to have rebuked either wittily or gravely the speech of the Prefect of the Pas-de-Calais as reported by Madame de Staël in a letter to Lord John Campbell: "Have you read the speech of the Prefect of the Pas-de-Calais to the First Consul? He says that God, after creating Bonaparte, rested. They are the exact terms of the Bible," Madame thinks it necessary to explain to a Scotch Protestant, "on the creation of the universe."

Mr. John Foster Fraser in his most instructive "Australia" (3) notes that Australian writers always speak dismally of their country, and that each province of that continent belittles its neighbour with the venom of feminine rivalry. An Australian, writing of the exhibits of his country in the Franco-British Exhibition, says that this mutual abuse by the agents of the several provinces so disgusted intending emigrants that they turned away to the Canadian Court, "where all were for Canada and none for Quebec or Manitoba or any particular province." The most interesting, but also the most disheartening, chapter in Mr. Foster Fraser's book is that describing labour legislation and its effects in this labour-governed continent. Skilled labour is not only kept out of the country, but discouraged within it by the fixing of a minimum wage, which practically means, what Trade Unionism always means, the discouragement of superior skill or industry. Though Mr. Foster Fraser is himself an ardent Trade Unionist, he notes that Wages Boards and Arbitration Courts operate exclusively against the employer if he should refuse to comply with their award, and are practically inoperative against the workmen if they should decline, as they often do, to accept their decision. "The reciprocity," as the Irishman said, "is all on one side," and that side the working man's. The general impression left upon you by this excellent book is that such selfishness must defeat itself, labour legislation exclusively in the interests of labour being thus as impolitic as it is inequitable.

In "The Rural Life Problem of the United States" (4) Sir Horace Plunkett plays in America the part that Mr. Foster Fraser played in Australia—that of Captain Grose:—

> If there's a hole in a' your coats
> I rede ye tent it;
> A chiel's amang ye takin' notes,
> And, faith, he'll prent it.

But Sir Horace has the justification for the intrusion of his advice that he is an expert in the subject on which he gives it, and that he is not inexperienced in the condition of the country to which he gives it. After taking his degree at Oxford he was driven in search of health to the Rockies, where for ten years he worked as a ranchman. It is odd, by the way, that Sir Horace's Oxford education should leave him in ignorance of the source of the very tritest quotation from Shakespeare. What Sir Horace sets himself to prove, and has proved up to the hilt, is that modern civilisation in America, as in England, is dangerously one-sided in sacrificing the country to the town, and that the balance must be readjusted by such an improvement in business and farming methods and in the attractions of social life as can be brought about chiefly through co-operation.

Whether a heroine can be extemporised, so to say, into a famous danseuse by a few early lessons in the art, and whether a hero can be extemporised by discursive and superficial reading in a free library into an epoch-making thinker, are difficulties which will try the faith of the readers of Miss Louise Mack's "In a White Palace" (5) and of Mr. Jack London's "Martin Eden" (6). But "Martin Eden" is a most powerful novel, describing the successful struggle of an indomitable will to achieve all it aimed to achieve only to find all hollow. There is, perhaps, too much brass, played staccato, in Mr. Jack London's orchestra, but at least its effects are startling. Miss Mack's heroine estranges your sympathy half-way through the book by expecting too much from her hero, and even from human nature, but she recovers it before the close of this romantic story.

DESMOND B. O'BRIEN.

Mr. Justin Huntly McCarthy dedicates his latest novel, "The O'Flynn" (Hurst and Blackett, 6s.), to Sir Herbert Beerbohm Tree in memory of a pleasant jest. Presumably that pleasant jest is the O'Flynn himself, and it is one which loses none of its savour by being transposed from stage to paper. As a rule the play made into a novel reverses the faults of the play made out of a novel, but somehow Mr. McCarthy's style enables him to make the best of both worlds—the stage and the library worlds. Of course, the O'Flynn is quite an impossible creature outside of these spheres, but in them he is a most delightful companion.

A dash of style, good style or bad style, any sort of style would be a godsend to the author of "On Desperate Seas," by F. W. A. Fisher (Everett and Co., 6s.). One would have liked to believe in Mr. Fisher's impossible captain and his adventures; one would have liked to believe in the still more impossible Spanish-American heroine who becomes a famous operatic star, but with the best will in the world one realises that they are nothing more than novelist's dummies. Mr. Fisher lacks just that something in his writing which would endow them with life. In fact, one might almost come to the conclusion that the author had gone to a school for novelists and that he was the prize student, there is such a lack of spontaneity and individuality about his style.

Mr. Walter Pulitzer, the son of the late millionaire proprietor of the New York American, is proposing to take up his father's "Memoirs" at the point where the latter left off, and incorporate them in a biography. The result ought to be an interesting volume, for the late Mr. Albert Pulitzer came into contact with many of the most notable figures in both hemispheres in the course of his journalistic career. The book is promised for the autumn by Mr. John Long. Meanwhile Mr. Walter Pulitzer will be pleased to hear from any one who knew his father or with whom his father had any correspondence, either at the New York American office, New York, or through Mr. John Long, Norris Street, Haymarket, London.

The coming Thackeray centenary is sure to produce a flood of memorial reprints, and already Messrs. Smith, Elder and Company have in preparation a new Biographical Edition, for which Lady Ritchie has rearranged the biographical prefaces, making various changes and additions. The edition is to be in twenty-six volumes, each of which will have a portrait of Thackeray as a frontispiece—different portraits, it is to be hoped.

Another interesting publication which Messrs. Smith, Elder and Company promise for the autumn is a new work from the pen of Major Gambier-Parry, entitled "Life's Pageantry." It is an excursion into the not too frequented land of allegory.

The essay is so neglected a form of literature to-day that one fears lest it should become a lost art. Welcome, then, if for no other reason would be "A Creel of Peat," by Desmond Mountjoy (The Adelphi Press, 2s. 6d. net).

But this collection of what Mr. Mountjoy calls "odd papers" will be welcomed for much more substantial reasons than this. In his modest preface the author tells the reader that they were one and all "inspired by some personal sympathy and devotion, and any value they may have can, at best, be a vicarious one, . . . just as from sheer love great winds blow largely on the sapling to make it grow. For such largesse the sapling can claim no credit; but it may, perhaps, by responding eagerly and lovingly to the wind, be permitted even to hope that it may ultimately make a wan, timid music of its own." The wan, timid music is there, and it would not need an expert to associate it with the music of the harp. Some of Mr. Mountjoy's papers are appreciations of the work of others, and here he shows himself a whole-hearted champion of his friends. But really everything he has gathered into his "Creel of Peat" has a definite value of its own.

ART.

THE PENALTIES OF SOCIALISM.

IN the first year of its existence the London Salon, held by the Allied Artists' Association at the Albert Hall, rather resembled a waste-paper basket, into which some cheques might inadvertently have fallen; if, indeed, you took pains to make a thorough examination of interminable works—deathless since they might so well have died, but didn't—you might even discover some of the cheques. In the second year the cheques were reduced to postal orders; in the third and present exhibition you are fortunate if you discover a few halfpenny stamps.

It was in the nature of things that, from the point of view of art, the London Salon should serve as an object lesson to Anarchists and Socialists alike. The well-known painters represented at the first exhibition would have been superhuman had they continued to uphold the theory that, the path of artistic endeavour being the easiest in the world, success should accrue equally to the just and to the unjust. The London Salon is indeed a practical illustration of the way in which we good Britons adopt French theories upside down. The "Salon des Refusés" began on the principle of liberty, equality, and fraternity. But it did not end there. It had an excellent hanging committee, who, while accepting everything, yet sorted the sheep from the goats by hanging them in ovine and capric rooms respectively. So whole-hearted, however, is the war waged by the great British Unappreciated against the wicked middleman and his kind that, besides unquestioned acceptance, it draws lots for places and has an alphabetical hanging committee as well. Logically it only remains for the Allied Artists to toss for expert opinion, so that even the humblest of their co-operators may perchance come in for some of the unstinted praise usually denied to anything but really fine painting. Even apart from this, however, democracy at the Albert Hall is supremely triumphant except in so far that its aristocracy is not there to witness its elation.

There are those who will protest that the Albert Hall Salon is, after all, the only art institution in this country which has real confidence in the taste and judgment of the greater public. Personally I am inclined to think that it is relying for success upon a complete lack of both these qualities in the public mind. The unsophisticated person, for instance, might regard Mr. Wassily Kandinsky's "Composition No. 1," if seen only in a studio, as a youthful experiment with a new paint-box; seen at the Albert Hall, however, where he has been thrilled by Patti's "Home, Sweet Home" or Miss Clara Butt's "Oh, Rest in the Lord," he is practically bound by all that pertains to culture to look upon it as high art. The charitable again may make allowances for the gentle melancholy shed by the Albert Hall upon paintings whatsoever. Not even the Royal Academy, he might exclaim, could look merry and bright amid such surroundings. The hanging of such pictures as Mr. Walter Bayes' "Kermesse" round the arena, with rows of sad-looking red seats intervening to prevent them from being looked at, lends some colour to this view. At the same time, no one could doubt that, quite apart from reasons of size, the Albert Hall is really the only building in London suited to such an exhibition. For since the London Salon itself is based upon every principle which tends to extinguish mere picture-painting in this country, so the Albert Hall is the antithesis of every previous convention with regard to picture galleries.

Taken as a whole, the London Salon has one great pull over every other gallery in London. With rare exceptions, such, for instance, as Mr. Fergusson's "Studies," Mr. Hering's "Yorkshire Fells," Miss Defries' "Wind and Waves," Mr. Cayley Robinson's "Dawn," and above all Mr. Epstein's remarkable and original "Portrait Bust of Mrs. Mary McEvoy," together with other characteristic examples of his work—with such exceptions, I say, it rouses positively no envy, hatred, or malice among its contemporaries. It cannot be said to have seceded from the Academy any more than from the New English Art Club; it has brought to light no astounding genius—on the contrary, the few works of any distinction have long been recognised elsewhere; financially there is no danger of its proving a serious rival to any other exhibition. What other exhibition, even the worst abused, can say as much? And if in addition to all the negative virtues it adds that of making a number of people, from mediocrity downwards, happy and contented, who among us has the right to say it nay? Next year, however, I should certainly advise the Hanging Committee to note that point about drawing lots for appreciation.

MUSIC.

THE UNIVERSAL QUEST.

A FAMOUS essayist, tiring of sempiternal lamb, beef, and mutton, once expressed the wish that some one would invent a new kind of animal for the service of mankind. The need for a new kind of music becomes equally pressing at times. The beef of Bach, the mutton of Mozart, the cutlets of Schubert, the sweetbreads of Chopin, the pungent paprika of Richard Strauss, and the delicate insipidities of Debussy's forcemeat—which of us does not know too well the flavour of one and all, and long, at moments, for something with a newer tang, a keener zest? The musical menu, like that of more material needs, is not wanting in variety, but, even so, the jaded appetite of the epicure longs always to have it increased. Yet how to accomplish this? Certainly it is not for lack of trying that the feat is not achieved more often. All the world over, wherever composers are putting pen to paper, they are striving to do this very thing—to invent some music of a kind which has not been heard before. Once it has been accomplished nothing seems easier, and the wonder is merely that no one ever thought of writing music of that particular kind before.

But in point of fact it is given only to the very few to succeed. There is no other characteristic which distinguishes more surely the genuine creative genius from the mere imitator and clever reproductive artificer than this. And perhaps in the whole history of music the most remarkable instance of all in this regard was not Bach or Beethoven or Mozart, but a composer of our own time in the person of Richard Wagner; for he was original and distinctive, not only in one way, but in half a dozen. To have written the "Ring" alone or "Die Meistersinger" or "Tristan" would have been glory enough of itself, but to have written all three, with "Tannhäuser," "Lohengrin," and "Parsifal" as well, each so absolutely distinctive from its fellows, here was an achievement to the like of which there is absolutely no parallel in music. Beethoven had his successive periods, but the essential qualities of his music, the distinctive Beethovenish characteristics, were the same in one and all. So, too, in the case of all the other masters without exception. We reckon it enough when any has a voice distinct from that of any other. Chopin had a wondrous individuality of utterance—but only in one way. So, too, had Schubert, Schumann, Brahms, and a dozen others who might be named; but none, save Wagner, ever revealed the marvellous capacity of expressing his individuality equally distinctively in half a dozen different ways.

This, then, is what is lacking in most of our modern music. In all other respects it is entirely excellent. Technically there is not a fault to be found with it. Excellently conceived, soundly constructed, admirably written—the well-meaning and industrious composer may well wonder what is amiss with it. What is lacking is that little incommunicable something which no amount of industry, or study, or searching of heart, or taking of thought can ever supply—that something which is like the salt that was described by the small boy as what makes the potatoes taste nasty when it is left out. No doubt it is possible for a composer to have a thoroughly distinctive note and yet not to rank with the highest. Such an one was Grieg. Hardly any composer's music is more intensely individual, but it is not reckoned with the greatest all the same. Quite distinctive also is that of many still smaller men, as, for example, Gounod and Sullivan, though in a general way the rule would seem to hold good that individuality of utterance and high creative gifts go together. On the other hand, it is possible for a composer to have a distinctive note and not to make a very general appeal. An example of this was Brahms, whose idiom is certainly individual, but whose work, taken as a whole, commends itself only to the minority. Another who might be reckoned in the same category perhaps was Liszt. To the faithful his music is full of beauty and significance, but the world in general has steadily declined up to the present to regard it in the same light. It would doubtless be a mistake to argue that individuality of utterance and a high order of genius are necessarily convertible terms. What, however, can be laid down with confidence is that supreme creative power inevitably reveals itself in a distinctive voice, and if at the present time such voices are few and far between this may be accepted as the surest possible sign that while talent is more plentiful to-day probably than ever before, that which goes by the higher name of genius is as hard to find as ever.

A correspondent writes to call attention once more to the common practice in the violin trade of inserting imitation labels of Stradivari and other famous old makers in modern instruments, a practice which he denounces as a barefaced fraud on the public. So it certainly might seem to be, but yet it is often nothing of the kind. The whole question of violin labels is a rather curious one. Messrs. Hill in their well-known monograph on Stradivari devote a very interesting chapter to the subject. In earlier days it is certain that the copyists of old instruments reproduced the old labels as well, simply with the notion of completing their work—somewhat on the principle adopted by the Chinaman who reproduced the patch on the trousers given him as a pattern. This is conclusively proved by the fact that they not infrequently inserted their own labels as well elsewhere. It was also the recognised practice for the makers of a given school (Amati, Stradivari, and so on) to adopt their master's labels, even when themselves makers of eminence, and this practice extended in good faith to quite modern times. Certainly it is a practice not free from objections, but there is probably no fraudulent intent in most cases, since neither instrument nor label would deceive an expert for an instant.

Busoni has been giving in an American paper some interesting hints to pianoforte students. A point which he specially insists on is the need of cultivating the art of listening to one's own playing. "At my own recitals no one in the audience listens more attentively than I do. I am always in quest of new beauties, and even while playing in public it is possible to conceive of new details that come like revelations." Specific exercises for specific defects is another of Busoni's tips. In his own case, long after he had been accepted as a virtuoso of note, he was profoundly dissatisfied with his playing. The critics lavished praises on him, but he knew better. "I never neglect an opportunity to improve. In fact I often go directly home from the concert and practise for hours upon the very pieces that I have been playing, because during the concert certain new ideas have come to me." Yet how many, one can't help wondering, are capable of appreciating such alterations? On the supreme importance of phrasing Busoni is very strong, while he places Bach beyond all other masters for the purposes of study.

Pity the sorrows of a poor tenor weighed down by the burden of a famous name! Many people think of Caruso as the most enviable of mortals, who gets his £500 a night—or is it £5,000?—with the maximum of pleasure and the minimum of exertion. How different is the reality—as confided by the famous tenor to a friend:—"When I was unknown I sang like a bird, careless, without thought of nerves. But now my reputation is made, my audiences are more exacting. Here I am to-day bending beneath the weight of a renown which cannot increase but which the least vocal mishap may compromise. My audiences, well disposed towards me as they are, have to pay such high prices to hear me that they imagine I am a unique singer, and I appear before them stared at and envied. That is why I am often the unhappiest of men." Yet how many self-sacrificing souls there are who would be only too glad to take up Caruso's burden!

Is stage deportment one of the subjects taught at our musical academies? I ask the question because if it is, the result is not very apparent. It is the exception rather than the rule to see a young artist, or an old one for that matter, who knows how to walk on to the platform properly. Some roll on, some slouch, some are deprecating, some over-bold; few seem to possess the art of being at once natural and dignified. Another detestable practice which has recently come into fashion, and seems to be growing, is that of affecting absolute indifference to the audience's expressions of approval. Young British artists, I have noticed, seem to be particularly prone to this most odious practice. Apparently they think it clever to adopt an attitude of utter contempt for their hearers. The audience good-naturedly applauds, but the performer takes not the slightest notice. The thing sounds almost incredible, but I have observed it again and again. Only a few weeks ago I was present at a concert at which two young English artists played a duet together, neither of whom deigned to acknowledge in the slightest degree the applause which the audience was good enough to bestow on them. This sort of thing, however, is not so much a matter of deportment; it is a question of manners.

THE THEATRES.

UNTIL the end of the month matters are bound to be very quiet in the theatrical world, but then there will be a very interesting crop of novelties. First among these will be "The Rejuvenance of Aunt Mary" at Terry's. Miss May Robson, who appears in this, must not be confused with Miss Eleanor Robson, as she is not even an American, but an Australian. Talking of this play, an American friend of mine tells me that it is the most striking play that has been produced the other side for a very considerable time—in fact, the only one of any dramatic importance. Beyond the fact that it has, I believe, an elevating tendency, I know nothing more, however, about it. Our friends across the Atlantic are very appreciative just now of elevating plays. They like to feel morally uplifted.

"The Naked Truth" is shortly to be transferred to the Prince of Wales's, where "The Balkan Princess" is nearing the end of its successful run, and when a successor is required this will be Miss Gladys Unger's version of MM. de Flers and Caillavet's farce "L'Ane de Buridan." This comes viâ New York, where I saw John Drew playing the part which will over here be taken by Charles Hawtrey. It says much for Miss Unger's skill that she has managed to make a possible farce out of this play, because in the original it is very "French." As far as I recollect the Ass of Buridan was a beast who nearly came to grief because he could not decide whether he wanted to eat or to drink, and the hero in this play is equally undecided in an even more important matter.

"The Chocolate Soldier," with which F. C. Whitney will open the Lyric next month, has been a huge success in New York. It is, of course, the operatic version of "Arms and the Man." Mr. C. H. Workman has been engaged for the part of the hero. Mr. Bernard Shaw has, I believe, specially requested that his name should not be mentioned in connection with this production. In order to encourage him in this retiring attitude, why not put on the programmes "The Chocolate Soldier, a comic opera, Not by Bernard Shaw?"

On September 1 Sir Herbert Tree reopens His Majesty's with "Henry VIII.," in which he will have the support of Mr. Arthur Bourchier and Miss Violet Vanbrugh, while on the preceding day Miss Evelyn Millard begins her season at The New with "La Rencontre."

* * * * * *

I have only just had an opportunity of seeing Mr. C. Wilhelm's revised ballet "The Dancing Master" at the Empire. It is an exceedingly charming production, and the old-style dresses are delightful. When originally produced under the name of "The Débutante," Mlle. Genée played the little dancer who springs into fame, but now Mlle. Kyasht takes this part and dances her way into your heart as surely as she does into the heart of Mr. Fred Farren—dancing master. I never weary of seeing the latter, he is so marvellously light and agile; and as for little Miss Phyllis Bedells, I have watched her grow from a nonentity into a star of the second magnitude, and she will loom much larger yet. An exceedingly amusing interlude at this house is provided by Mr. George Mozart, who gives an imitation of a cinematograph play called "The Thief." On a slightly darkened stage in a quivering light he and his little company enact a melodrama in dumb show imitating most cleverly all the quaint jerky movements of the people you see flickering about in one of these living picture shows. Just as the photographs caricature humanity, so does Mr. Mozart caricature photography, and the thing is not only a happy idea, but it is so well carried out that the audience is kept convulsed with laughter from start to finish.

* * * * * *

"On the Sands," which has just been put into the Alhambra programme, is I believe an old ballet revised and brought up to date. It is a capital holiday frolic, in which Miss Rita Leggiero plays a little schoolgirl who is annexed by gipsies. To these yellow sands come all manner of people—Eton boys, sailors, mixed bathers, and, of course, gipsies, the last giving a picturesquely Oriental touch to the ensemble. The dances are gay and lively, and Mr. Byng's music is happily tuneful, wherefore the whole thing is an attractive and merry romp.

* * * * * *

It is now some nineteen or twenty years since Miss Annie Abbott, the little "Georgia Magnet," sent all London mad with her feats of strength or skill, and I found her again the other night at the London Pavilion looking younger than ever, and performing perhaps even more astonishing feats than of old. An unofficial committee test her curious powers, and it is most amusing to see how easily she foils them. She allows a six-foot sceptic to lift her easily one moment, but the next moment, when she has established "flesh contact," not all his efforts can raise her one inch. She is rooted to the ground, and you might as well try to lift a tree. The united efforts of twelve men cannot force downwards a stick which she holds lightly in her open palms, nor can the same number of men push her against a wall against which she merely rests her fingers. If you don't believe any of these things you can experiment for yourself. All is open and above board, and any and every one is invited to put her powers to the test. I can lift seven stone easily, and that is all that Miss Abbott weighs, but I cannot lift the Georgia Magnet when she wills that I shall not, though £50 would be my reward if I could. Altogether it is a most interesting show. There is a very clever company at the Pavilion just now, and a most interesting programme. Mr. T. E. Dunville is always quaint and amusing, so I will not enlarge on his merits. I admired Miss Violet Loraine, too, for her pointed singing of "All out of the Park." She is a real comedienne, but she should be clever enough to sing the best verse of her song last! Miss Wish Wynne is new to me, but I certainly want to see her again. Her first song, "Charm," is not very effective, and does not prepare you for the real talent which she shows in such trifles as "Misery Jane" and "A Country Girl." As the crying school girl drudge, and again as the shy rustic girl in love, you see that she is an actress of great ability who is trying to get away from the conventional music hall tricks, and she should make a considerable name for herself. I hear, moreover, that she writes her own songs, so she is certainly versatile. "The Five Cliftons," who come near the end of the programme, give an acrobatic turn which is a genuine pleasure to watch. They are extraordinarily skilful and muscular, and give you a most astonishing performance, but what pleased me most about them was their charm. One and all are good to look upon, and they appear so happy in their work that you feel the contagion of this good humour. I am not very fond of acrobats as a rule, but I do not think I have ever seen a better troupe.

* * * * * *

There is no end to the procession of actors going from the theatres to the music halls, and the latest is Mr. Ben Webster. He is now appearing at the Tivoli in a little sketch in which a husband teaches his wife a lesson by re-entering his own house as a burglar. The burglar sketch has been rather over-done, but this is quite amusing, and it is very well played by Mr. Webster and Miss Harrison. The only thing that is wrong with it is the end, for it trails off at the finish as though the author's invention had failed him just when he should have provided a dramatic touch.

* * * * * *

Two striking new features come into the Palace programme this week. One of these is Mlle. Regina Badet, the première danseuse of the Opéra Comique in Paris, and the other is Mlle. Myrma, the "Diving Venus." To exploit the latter an enormous tank has been sunk into the stage, for she has a great reputation as an exponent of swimming and diving.

SPORT.

THERE is a general hope that the Stewards of the Jockey Club will propose, at one of the three meetings which are to be held at Newmarket in the autumn, that the date for commencing two-year-old handicaps be changed from September 1 to the first day of Goodwood races. No reasons with one particle of soundness can be urged against this alteration, and the change would be highly desirable. It is impossible to understand why nurseries should be prohibited until September 1, and there can be no possible objection to letting them begin at Goodwood, when the two-year-olds will have been running for over four months. Of course, there is no desire to alter the excellent rule which prohibits two-year-olds from running in handicaps with older horses.

The ignominious performances of Delirium and Perdiccas in the Stewards' Cup are pronounced by their admirers to be all wrong, it being asserted that neither horse showed its true form at Goodwood, and it is confidently believed this view of their running will be proved to be correct before the season is over. Wedding Bells II. is sure to win a good handicap during the autumn when she has quite recovered her form. I remarked the other day on the mistake so often committed by owners in withdrawing horses from handicaps because they are considered to be overweighted. It was noted in Truth some time ago that Sunder had been an early and strong tip for the Stewards' Cup. It is quite certain that Sunder would have won the race with 8 st. 3 lb. if he had started, for this was conclusively demonstrated by his fine performance in the Chichester Handicap, when he had 8 st. 9 lb. on his back. If Sunder had not won a race at Ascot his weight for the Stewards' Cup would have been about 7 st., and he would have come in alone. Master Hopson's easy victory in the Singleton Plate showed clearly that he would have finished first or second for the Stewards' Cup if he had run. A coup was evidently intended to have been brought off at Goodwood with Bachelor's Charm, whose prominent running in the Chesterfield Cup will considerably increase his weight in handicaps for some time to come.

Many good judges of racing are of the opinion that Pietri will ultimately prove himself to be the best two-year-old of the season, and his meetings with Cellini and Wrinkler in the Champagne Stakes at Doncaster, and with Seaforth in the Middle Park Plate, will be very interesting.

The St. Leger bids fair to be a most interesting race, but the betting which is daily reported by the papers is wholly unworthy of serious notice, the odds quoted being perfectly ridiculous. If there were any place betting it would be very much better business to back Swynford for a place than to support any horse whatever to win. Swynford was wisely withdrawn from his two-year-old engagements last season after he had been beaten for the Exeter Stakes at the Newmarket First July Meeting, and this judicious policy has answered splendidly. He was well galloped before Epsom, and he would have come very near winning the Derby but for his being struck into and seriously injured. I predicted that Swynford would win a race at Ascot for which he did not start, but which was carried off by a stable companion. As he could not have entirely recovered from the effects of his Epsom mishap, his performance in winning the Hardwicke Stakes was a remarkably good one, and a horse which stays the Swinley course at Ascot may be trusted to achieve the St. Leger distance. Swynford is a very fine colt, and still capable of much improvement. He is grandly bred, being by John O'Gaunt (by Isinglass out of La Fleche) out of Canterbury Pilgrim, winner of the Oaks. Every one can remember how Your Majesty began to run into form at Ascot, and what a fine career he had afterwards as a three-year-old.

The fillies will be represented at Doncaster by Winkipop and Rosedrop, of which pair I expect that Sir William Bass's animal will prove the best. It is believed that Rosedrop can stay well, but it is exceedingly doubtful whether Winkipop is sufficiently endowed with stamina to win over the St. Leger course. Both fillies are engaged in the Park Hill Stakes, and they will meet in that race at even weights. Yellow Slave is entered, and it is quite likely that Mr. Nelke's filly will have come on considerably before Doncaster. She is left in for the Great Yorkshire Stakes on the 25th.

I see it is stated that never has there been such an "upset" at Goodwood as was seen there when Magic beat Bayardo for the Cup. This is all stuff and nonsense, for the defeat of Friday by Tristan was quite as sensational, and for that race the winner had started at 66 to 1. The greatest "upset" at Goodwood was in the Cup race thirty-nine years ago. There were only five starters, and the race was regarded as a match between Favonius, winner of the Derby, and Mortemer, winner of the Ascot Cup. Shannon, who had been defeated earlier in the week in a small race, beat the two favourites for speed at the finish, coming with one run. There was a hundred times more betting over that race than there was over this year's Cup, as the gambling between Favonius and Mortemer was tremendously heavy, and the speculation of plungers was practically limited to this pair, but both Ripponden and Dutch Skater were well backed.

I am assured that the winner of the Cesarewitch was seen at Goodwood. The horse named to me ran miserably in the race for which he started, his performance being very much below what might have been expected after his promising form earlier in the season.

I hear that Persephone will start either for the Prince of Wales' Plate at York on the 23rd or for the Champion Breeders' Foal Plate at Derby a week later. It will probably turn out that at present Persephone's best course is five furlongs, and at that distance she could have won the Rous Memorial Stakes at Goodwood. The extra furlong settled her chance.

Neil Gow has not done much work since Sandown Park, but he will now commence a special preparation for the St. Leger and the Jockey Club Stakes. The Doncaster course will suit Lord Rosebery's horse very well indeed, but I doubt very much whether he can stay the distance. The stamina of the two favourites has to be taken upon trust.

The pecuniary conditions of the July Stakes and the Chesterfield Stakes are singularly unattractive, but the Stewards of the Jockey Club need not trouble themselves to carry out any alterations while their races continue to be so generously supported by owners. For next year's July Stakes there are forty-nine entries (at £50 each, £30 ft., with no added money), while for the Chesterfield Stakes (£30 each, £20 ft.) there are fifty-eight entries. The events to run at three years old, which have just closed, have also done well, there being sixty entries for the Hastings Plate and forty-five for the Zetland Plate. I am pleased to see fourteen subscribers for the Boscawen Post Stakes of £100 each, and the King has engaged two of the Sandringham foals in this old-fashioned race, one being an own sister to Princesse de Galles.

As to the Ascot events for 1912, sixty fillies have been engaged in the Coronation Stakes, and there are forty-four entries for the St. James's Palace Stakes. The Richmond Stakes at Goodwood for next year has obtained seventy-four entries, and there are fifty-six for the Sussex Stakes of 1912. His Majesty has entered yearlings in all four races.

The Chester Vase of £2,000 for 1913 has obtained 140 entries, the largest subscriber being the Duke of Portland with nine, while next comes the Duke of Westminster with eight, one of his lot being a foal which is half-sister, by Troutbeck, to Flying Fox. The Atlantic Stakes of £2,000 at the Liverpool Summer Meeting in 1913 has done well with 175 entries, the largest subscriber being Mr. H. Cholmondeley, who has engaged fifteen of the Sledmere yearlings. Mr. H. P. Whitney comes next with twelve yearlings and foals, all bred in the United States, and Lord Derby has eleven entries. The Royal Stakes of £1,500 at Newbury, and run in June, 1913, has done best of these races, there being 199 entries, but Mr. H. P. Whitney's name does not appear in the list. Mr. H. Cholmondeley with fifteen and the Duke of Portland with eleven are the largest subscribers to this race.

It has been stated that the Eclipse Stakes was run this year at a loss of over £3,000 to the Sandown race fund. As a matter of fact the deficiency was £1,809, and last year £2,051 had to be added from the fund in order to make up the advertised value of the race. The Eclipse Stakes has been the most successful of all the big races of that class which were started in the late eighties and early nineties. It has deserved to flourish, as the penalties are reasonable; there is no maiden allowance, and, above all, there are no breeding allowances, which are a mischievous absurdity when carried by winners of big stakes.

It has been proposed that the Bibury Club Meeting shall be removed from Salisbury to a racecourse in the neighbourhood of London, it being the opinion of some visionaries that the old glories of this society might be revived by the suggested change. The Bibury Club is about the last of the old racing clubs which were established in order to provide quasi-private meetings with most of the races ridden by gentlemen riders. The most important of the others were Heaton Park, Gorhambury, Petworth, and Brighton. In these days a gentleman rider on the flat is as rare a creature as a bustard. It was a piece of flagrant absurdity for the Stewards of the Jockey Club to allow the Bibury Meeting at Salisbury to be dragged over three days, considering that the added money to the club races during the three days was only £700. The fact is that the decisions of the Newmarket authorities in the licensing of meetings are not only not guided by any fixed principle, but they are not guided by any principle whatever. Here is a meeting with miserable sport and every imaginable drawback (the course being difficult of access, and having wretched accommodation for the public), with three consecutive days, whereas Newbury, with excellent racing and every conceivable advantage, has never been allowed three days in succession. Some of the writers who have been discoursing on the Bibury Club affairs appear to be under the delusion that the Stockbridge meeting was exclusively a Bibury fixture. In the old days "the Hampshire week" meant Odiham on Tuesday, and Stockbridge on the three following days, Wednesday being the Bibury Club meeting. The great days at Stockbridge, which was one of the most important of the summer meetings, were Thursday and Friday. Stockbridge was a minor Goodwood, for many of the best horses in training ran there, and the betting on every race was tremendously heavy. The late Lord Portsmouth always entertained a large party of Turf magnates at Hurstbourne Park, and every country house in the neighbourhood was full for the week, while many men stayed at Andover, Romsey, Southampton, or Winchester. King Edward (then Prince of Wales) went down to Stockbridge several times, and this was the first English racecourse visited by the late Emperor of Russia, who accompanied his brother-in-law during a visit to London, when he was Cesarevitch.

One of the papers has expressed disappointment because none of the three-year-old "cracks" were seen out at Goodwood. It was preposterously unreasonable to expect to see Lemberg or Neil Gow running at Goodwood after their severe race at Sandown Park, and with the St. Leger and Jockey Club Stakes in prospect. Greenback had no engagement at Goodwood, and, of course, he could not have started for any race for which he might have been entered, as he has been coughing. Charles O'Malley was withdrawn from the Sussex Stakes in view of his later engagements. The fact is that St. Leger horses cannot be prudently started at Goodwood after they have fulfilled a fair number of their earlier engagements. Eighteen years have elapsed since St. Leger favourites were seen at Goodwood. La Fleche (winner of the St. Leger) carried off the Nassau Stakes, and Orme and Watercress also started at this meeting.

There were fair fields at Brighton, but the meeting suffered through the competition with a new fixture at Manchester, which ought not to have been allowed. The class of the racing was really very poor. The Sussex fortnight has now become a mere orgie of plating. The Brighton Cup was formerly a most important race, which brought out some of the best horses in training, but it has now gone to the dogs, having been converted into a three-year-old handicap. Avernus, who started favourite, won for Lord Rosebery, but he only beat Glacier by a neck, and the pair had nothing to boast about, as they were receiving 20 lb. both from Wolfe Land and Spanish Prince, who finished close up. Before the race Mr. J. B. Joel bought Spanish Prince for £4,000, and his late owner is to receive another thousand the first time the colt wins. He seems to have been well sold. Avernus was a miserable sort of animal to win the Brighton Cup, which in its palmy days was carried off by Derby, Oaks, St. Leger, and Ascot and Goodwood Cup winners.

There were six races at Manchester on Wednesday, which brought out only thirty-five starters altogether, and on Thursday there were thirty-one runners for six races. Such wretched fields afford conclusive proof that it was a stupid blunder to have sanctioned the fixture, quite apart from the unfairness to Brighton. Devil's Dyke, one of the late King's two-year-olds, won the Maiden Plate for Lord Derby. He was a great tip at Newmarket, but much of the money won over him on Wednesday was lost on Thursday, when Nerestan was supposed to be a certainty for the Summer Plate, and odds were betted on him. The colt repeated the antics which caused his defeat at Newmarket, as he swerved badly at the start, and lost several lengths, the result being that Manwolf won in a canter. If ever Nerestan gets fairly well off in a race he will win it, as he was very highly tried some time ago, but he is invariably left at the post. Manwolf, however, is a very smart colt, and it is a pity that he has so few engagements. He runs next at Derby on the 31st. Nerestan's next engagement is the Champagne Stakes at Doncaster, but he is more likely to win the Clearwell Stakes at the Newmarket Second October Meeting.

Hair Trigger II. justified her private reputation on Friday by winning the Astley Stakes at Lewes for Lord Derby. Her previous performances had been most disappointing, and a lot of money was lost over her both at Newmarket and at Liverpool. Hair Trigger II. has nice speed, and she won very easily at Lewes. I suspect she needs to have it all her own way in a race, as she seems to be somewhat jady, and she would have no taste for a severe finish. She has been left in for the August Plate of £300 at Hurst Park next week.

M. E. Blanc has a very smart two-year-old in Lord Burgoyne, by Persimmon, who last week won the principal stake at Maisons-Laffitte. Lord Burgoyne has been left in for next year's Derby and St. Leger.

Next week there will be racing at Wolverhampton, Stockton, Folkestone, and Hurst Park. Stockton is greatly indebted to Lord and Lady Londonderry, who always have a large party at Wynyard for the races, and many of the guests make a point of sending horses to the meeting. There were forty acceptances for the Great Northern Leger of £500, and Rochester may win for Lord Durham if he is now all right. Charlemont, Cardinal Beaufort, and Willonyx are all engaged in this race. The Wynyard Plate of £600 may be won by Cyrilla. Night Rider and Meleager are left in for this race. Seaforth will win the Hardwicke Stakes of £500 if he starts. There are ninety-two entries for this race. There were thirty acceptances for the Durham County Produce Plate of £1,000, including Winkipop, who has earned the extreme penalty, but the others are a very moderate lot.

Lemberg was left in for the Lennox Plate of £1,500 at Hurst Park, but he is not likely to run. There were fifty-four acceptances for this race, including Winkipop, Maid of Corinth, Rochester, Louvigny, and Charles O'Malley. I expect that Charles O'Malley will win if he starts.

GOLF—COWES—CRICKET.

Once in the dear dead days beyond recall a lady golfer wrote to me and asked if a lady receiving bare expenses for playing for her county from her county was a professional golfer, and I said no, not within the meaning of the amateur definition. This judgment aroused the ire of Mr. Garden Smith, of Golf Illustrated. I argued that if receiving such expenses was playing for a consideration, then playing for a sweepstake was playing for a consideration, and all were professionals. I was adopting the reductio ad absurdum argument of Euclid's childhood days. But with a perverseness which reminded me, as an eminent naturalist observed, of a purblind race of miserable men who forge a lifelong trouble for themselves by taking true for false and false for true, Mr. Garden Smith would represent me as saying all amateurs were professionals, when all I said was that the huge majority were professionals if his contention was correct. Then he trimmed. Yea, he specially pleaded. The person who played for a consideration was not an amateur—that was all the rule said. He was not a professional, and so there he had triumphed over Truth by a legal fiction. What a clever man he must have felt himself! He the superb genius who does not object to a player's expenses being privately subscribed, but does object to a club, where they would be properly vouched, paying them. He asked would I prevent a rich uncle paying or tipping a poor nephew so that he might enter for the championship. Of course, I wouldn't, nor would I prevent a rich nephew tipping a poor uncle. All I said was that it was playing for a consideration within his hair-splitting definition of the rule. Now, thank goodness, after all the trouncing Mr. Garden Smith gave me—after all his heroic efforts to make me appear either a prattling knave or an ignorant fool— and I assure him his mental calisthenics amused me vastly—I have found an ally of no mean order. Mr. Horace Hutchinson, in the Westminster Gazette, says many players have their expenses paid when they play in the amateur championships. He would not have it otherwise. Only bare expenses should be paid. He says the same happens in cricket. To inquire who pays is unnecessary. Obviously it does not matter whether it is a club or a private syndicate, so far as Mr. Hutchinson's views go. I say club expenses can be audited, bare expenses can be checked, and to say payment by a club is a consideration and by a few friends is not is pure and unadulterated bunkum.

The Calcutta Cup was played for last week by the members of the Royal and Ancient over the new course at St. Andrews. There were only forty-nine entries. The competition is dwindling in numbers. And yet at the autumn meeting the members will swarm. A sarcastic professional once observed that the substantial sweepstakes drew together these amateurs. What a rude thought, and how bluntly expressed. Mr. Fairlie + 2 was easily beaten in the final by Mr. Richardson—2 by five up and four to play. The winner will be joining the select number of plus players before long.

Lord Kitchener has now taken to golf. He must have been amused and disgusted with the penny-a-line fluff with which a section of the daily press described his first efforts at the game at North Berwick. At last he is confronted with the real problem in life. Having determined to golf, he obviously had no time for the Mediterranean command or a seat on the Council of National Defence. He is now studying the best methods of overcoming natural inertia by physical inefficiency. In time he will learn that most golfers make more mistakes than the worst generals. Already he has no doubt realised that the sand at North Berwick presents more difficulties than the wastes of the Soudan, and that Point Garry requires an army corps of mashies and niblicks before it can be carried or evenly effectively invested.

Lord Kitchener and other golfers will be delighted to know that if they compete in the open championship they will not be able to swim as amateurs. This is a horrible thought which may affect some young university men. Thus it has been decreed by the International Amateur Swimming Federation, or thus it will be at the meeting at Brussels next month when the resolution passed at Paris will be adopted. To frame a rule in this way is to ask for trouble. It is positively scandalous that our greatest general should be prevented from entering for the open golf championship because by so doing he would forfeit his status as an amateur swimmer. It is an insult to the nation. Mobilise, advance, seize Brussels, and let the leaders of the Amateur Swimming Association be taught that they are legislating nonsense when they make such rules. According to the same definition, billiards or similar indoor amusements are not athletic games or exercises. So those who play bridge and blind man's buff need not worry.

Ancient mariners say that Cowes week was, owing to the King's death, far less of a social function, and more like Cowes of thirty years ago, when only business was meant. A perusal of journals of those periods leads me to the conclusion that the ancient mariners of those days said the same sort of thing. Well, for Cowes the weather has given every sample of English climate. There were two events of importance. White Heather has been fitted out again just in time to have one race with Shamrock. The refitting has made her a new craft, and Shamrock never saw the way she went. On this form, and on the handicap allowance, White Heather would have beaten Westward, the new American schooner, on August 1. Shamrock led both Germania and Meteor. The Westward is easy and handy when hard driven in a breeze, and a perfect ship in a sea. Compared with the two German schooners, she is fitted more lightly, and this alone must give her an advantage. She is in fact a racing schooner pur et simple, with cruising accommodation of the simplest order. She does not sail in handicaps where the old rule of thumb rule gave a bad ship and a poor skipper every chance. She is built to make a class. And class racing has come to stay. Next year will see the first international race meeting under international rules at Cowes. It will be a big event, and may there be plenty of wind and not too much. Yacht racing is neither dead nor dying.

Of all the matches played on Bank Holiday where there was a full day's play, the fastest scoring match was that between Hants and Sussex. It was played at Southampton, where there was a record gate. The crowd was loyal to its county. Their delight was unbounded. When three wickets fell for under thirty Newman was the finest bowler in England, and every fieldsman the smartest in the country. Certainly the fielding all day was smart. Chaplin, the visiting captain, drove finely and hit freely, and the last three wickets added runs at a tremendous pace, the last wicket putting on a hundred in just over half an hour. The crowd gave the visitors a splendid reception. Chaplin's 172 was a fine innings, made without blemish. It was interesting to see Brown, originally a wicket-keeper, bowling fast with a Knox-like run. He is a hard-hitting batsman and a fine field. He and Captain Greig and Johnstone scored freely for Hants, and the rain made the game a draw. Surrey had an easy win over Notts. What a pity it is that E. C. Kirk is not a man of means. But fate compels him to be in a bank. He was put in to bat early, and played well for 43. Then he bowled admirably, taking seven wickets for 42 runs. He keeps a good length, and the ball comes quickly off the pitch. But he should vary his pace. Leicestershire, after beating Lancashire, were beaten by Northampton by four wickets, and Lancashire simply mopped up Yorkshire, declaring in their first and only innings for five wickets. But then Spooner made 200 not out in perfect form. The weather spoiled the Canterbury week. The Kent team beat Middlesex easily enough, as the latter had all the worst of the luck. The rain gave Carr and Woolley the pitch they wanted. One only realises the strength of Kent's batting when one sees J. R. Mason going in seventh wicket down, and playing a perfect innings of over fifty. It is seventeen years since he first played, and it is a pity he cannot give more time to the game. He steps into first-class form at once. Jessop against Somerset gave one of his merry centuries that suited a Bank Holiday crowd. But his team failed by an innings against Blythe's bowling in the second match of the Canterbury week, and Surrey just won after a glorious finish on a queer pitch against Middlesex at the Oval. By the way, for the eighth successive year Hirst has taken a hundred wickets and scored a thousand runs.

MOTORS AND MOTORING.

THE COMBINE THAT FAILED.

AN event of note next year will be the Prince Henry tour. A certain amount of misunderstanding existed on the subject at first, especially in trade circles, but it is now clear that the scheme is one to which no exception whatever need be taken. The project is really Prince Henry's dignified answer to the sharp practice trade tactics which have nullified year after year his attempt to institute a genuine touring car competition in Germany. Since it is hopeless to get trade competitors to play fair (he says in effect) let us have a purely amateur and sporting competition instead, with every vestige of the commercial element carefully excluded. Hence, therefore, the unusual conditions proposed. They certainly seem to have been carefully drawn to effect the purpose aimed at.

But I am not so sure that the "trade" in both countries will not contrive even so to get its "ads.," unless stronger measures still are adopted, such as actual prohibition under the usual R.A.C. penalty of any individual achievements being advertised at all. If not, we shall infallibly be told after the event that a 30-h.p. Blazer went through the whole tour without the bonnet being lifted; that a 40-h.p. Snorter climbed Porlock Hill on top with ten up, and so on and so on. The commercial element is so terribly intrusive nowadays. Whatever precautions may be adopted, it "creeps, climbs, and intrudes into the fold" in a manner which would certainly have made Milton "stare and gasp." Otherwise the jaunt should be good fun enough, and as making for good-fellowship between the two nations is all in the right direction, though personally I should not covet greatly the pleasure of touring about the country in company with ninety-nine other cars.

The failure of the big motor combine which was recently formed—or, to be more exact, which it was recently attempted to form—under the name of the Motor Trades Association, for the purpose of maintaining list prices in the motor trade and preventing undercutting, is a matter deserving a good deal more attention than it has hitherto received. From whatever standpoint it is looked at—whether that of the trade or the private owner—the significance of the event is not to be overlooked. The circumstances will be readily recalled. The association was brought into being in April last, and its members were asked to pledge themselves:—(1) To deal only with members of the organisation; (2) not to sell below list prices, whether in the case of their own or other members' goods; and (3) not to give discounts to those not entitled to receive them as properly qualified agents. Some of the biggest and most important firms in the trade, such as the Daimler Company, Messrs. S. F. Edge, Limited, the Humber Company, the Lanchester Company, and others were behind the movement, and it was confidently hoped that the whole trade would be eventually roped in.

It was a great scheme, but it has not come off. These things are worked out so much more easily on paper than in practice. When it came to descending from the general to the particular all sorts of unsuspected difficulties presented themselves. Price maintenance in the case of a single proprietary article is one thing; when it is a case of applying it to a whole trade it is another thing altogether. The various interests involved were found to be too many and too diverse. All sorts of knotty points cropped up. Was it really to be laid down, for instance, that the big trader was to get no more discount than his smaller rival? Such a proposition was against all the principles of commerce. Yet it was in the bond. Again, of two firms who had traded together to their mutual satisfaction and profit for years, was one to boycot the other for ever and a day, and incidentally to sacrifice a valuable connection, because in the case of some one else's goods it had departed from the compact? Again self-interest protested against the notion. Yet, again, if a maker found himself overstocked or in urgent need of capital, was he actually to be debarred from selling off at a discount? These and such like were the points that arose.

Above all, there was the difficulty of ensuring that members of the combination would actually keep their pledges and carry out the agreement. To sign an agreement is one thing; to carry it out is another. Take the case of a maker who sees a £1,000 sale slipping through his fingers because he won't give 10 per cent. discount off his list price. Fabricius himself would hardly resist the temptation. There are ways and means in which the thing can be done, too, so easily. Taking an old car in exchange, for instance, at an extravagant price is one, and many interesting stories could be told illustrating the extent to which this plan is followed even by firms who nominally are the stoutest defenders of the list price rule. One hears, for instance, of £200 being "allowed" for a car subsequently sold at £60 or £70. And if these things are done by big firms of the highest standing, how is it to be expected that the smaller fry will be less scrupulous? As a matter of fact, this is the fundamental difficulty of the price maintenance principle. It leaves too much to the honour of the individual, with the inevitable result that those who do fulfil their pledges find themselves undersold in secret by their less scrupulous rivals. Naturally this is not a satisfactory state of affairs, and so the whole thing breaks down. It is said that the promoters of the recent movement have not yet entirely abandoned the project, and that the scheme will be worked out more thoroughly and brought up again in due course. But I greatly doubt myself whether it will ever become an accomplished fact.

Touching on the question of finality in design, a writer has recently been expressing the hope that the absolutely perfect motor-car will never be evolved, for the reason that "a thing which can be no further improved—which has reached a state of finality—is not, in the opinion of a majority of people, a very interesting thing to own." I am not so sure, however, that the majority of people really hold this view. Perfection, indeed, is not quite so unattainable as the remark would seem to suggest. Most of the ordinary articles and appliances of everyday existence have reached that stage of finality which the writer deprecates, but I am not aware that they are any less appreciated on this account. One does not yearn for a razor that won't cut or a table that won't stand straight, or a pen that won't write, or reckon that such articles would be more "interesting" than those fulfilling their functions more efficiently. Makers and designers need not hesitate, therefore, about producing the perfect car. Automobilists in general will gladly accept it with all its virtues—when it comes, which will probably be when pigs take to aeroplaning.

WOMAN.

ON SENDING GIRLS TO GERMANY.

GENERALLY speaking there is no doubt that the average English girl enjoys a year in Germany more than a corresponding period in France. And if enjoyment were the sole consideration I should not hesitate in advising parents meditating a foreign school to decide in favour of the Fatherland.

The homeliness and tolerance of the German professional classes add greatly to the well-being of the young stranger; to hear Germans contradict each other flatly without turning a hair is a liberal education in good humour. Whereas the French show a polite reserve towards every foreigner, the Germans welcome her whole-heartedly, if only for the reason that they have long recognised in the acquisition of cosmopolitanism a valuable business asset. Further, the difference between German and English ideas is not nearly as great as that which exists between the component parts of the entente cordiale, nor do the two methods of living show so fundamental a contrast. Sausages, it is true, form a staple article of diet in the lower middle classes in certain parts of Germany—not more staple, however, than are eggs and bacon in our own country; sauerkraut once a month, moreover—not three times a day—is not the thing of horror into which English inexperience has exalted it.

From the educational point of view the advantages of good music and a cultivated intelligence—even under the most remarkable disguises—are not to be gainsaid, and even in the smaller German towns are both to be found. For Germany has the advantage over almost every other country of not concentrating all its intellectual life in Berlin. It has not one capital, but many, and where in France and England the enterprising foreigner has only a choice of Paris and London respectively, the English girl can get all she can possibly want in a score of German towns.

Against all these advantages, it must be remembered that whereas French is practically a "lingua franca," German, except for scientific purposes, is relatively almost provincial. English girls on the whole learn German more easily than French, but its very similarities with English, its contortions, and the rare opportunities of using it cause it to be much more easily forgotten. On the whole, too, a study of German makes for intellectual untidiness, whereas the subtler and more suggestive French is productive of clear and concise thought.

This lack of subtlety pervades German life generally. It is the cause of a certain lack of reserve, and of a curiosity that, less good-natured, would amount to impertinence. Matters religious and moral are treated in a philosophic spirit which, held in control by German judgment and caution, has an excellent effect upon character; superimposed upon the slender foundation of an English education, it often results in a top-heaviness that leads to disaster. I shall never forget the horror of some good conventional English parents when their offspring returned to the bosom of her family talking Nietzsche with fervent conviction. Alone in his music and his theatre does the German combine both breadth and subtlety; but for a fuller appreciation of these a year is all too short.

I have spoken of Germany as though it were as compact and uniform as might be one of our English counties. Except for almost complete unanimity in its intellectual life this is by no means the case. To take only a broad differentiation, North and South show much greater contrasts than do, say, England and Scotland. In the South you have a bad accent, great good-temper, and an inclination to take life pleasantly; in the North you find academic German, manners rather suggestive of a book on etiquette, and more strenuous living generally. In both you get good music and a well-developed intellectual life. If good recommendations are obtainable I should prefer for the would-be student a German family rather than a German school, which is apt to give an artificial view of German life. Care should be taken to discover the English-speaking capacity of the family. For your German too often considers the English miss legitimate prey upon which to exercise a knowledge of English varying from five words to five hundred.

Thus, if a girl is only to have one year abroad I should, with certain reservations—a desire on her part to study music or special personal characteristics—send her to France; if she is fortunate enough to have more time at her disposal a year in Germany should do much towards a wider understanding and enjoyment of life generally.

DOLLY'S APPEAL.

(Especially commended to TRUTH's lady readers.)

I find it, Sir, extremely chill
To wear "the altogether."
Enough it is a doll to kill,
This so-called summer weather.

Apart from that, a modest maid
Of reputation blameless,
I blush to have my form displayed
With candour quite so shameless.

Besides, my sawdust legs and arms—
Strictly, dear Sir, between us—
Scarce rival, let us say, in charms
The Medician Venus.

She'd no artistic cause to shun
Such unarrayed exposure.
I have. My form's not made to run
The gauntlet of disclosure.

So send me, Sir, a pretty frock
And things to wear beneath 'un,
Including what was called a "smock"
By birds Elizabethan

(Nay! Longer still ago than that;
The word is found in Chaucer),
And also, please, throw in a hat
Inverted like a saucer,

A tailored coat, a blouse or two,
And several pairs of stockings;
Lisle-thread, or silk, they'd either do;
But don't forget the clockings.

Some house-shoes, too, I quite expect,
As well as walking-boots—size
One half—to show to good effect
My pretty little tootsies.

By bearer, please, kind Sir, reply,
I vow, unless you do so,
Of cold and shame I'm like to die;
So send along my trousseau.

MRS. A.'s DIARY.

Wednesday.—I continue to be Florence's unpaying guest, and shall so remain until after the 12th, with no hope, however, of being allowed the attractive sport of shooting the resident young, though I find them too strong in numbers and too weak in humour for my taste.

There is some excitement locally, for the village hall is to shelter a subscription dance, and the matrons and maids for miles around are occupied in collecting that almost extinct bird, the dancing man. There are many golfers in the district, various oarsmen, and a not unworthy tennis player or so, but the male devotees to the arts of Terpsichore are conspicuously few, and these few are stout and baldheaded husbands, but not too firmly held in the bonds of matrimony to be withheld from tripping it merrily when occasion offers. Their complacent wives, indeed, look on and proudly beam whilst their portly spouses hop with truly rural enthusiasm and energy in the intervals of announcing as a plausible suspicion "I believe I am growing old."

Florence and I drove in to Maidenhead this morning, and carefully selected the special cakes and sweets of our personal predilection, and then wandered round the drapery shops in search of some alluring excuse to purchase oddments which might occupy my leisure moments in discovering their utility.

Thursday.—As I cannot contrive to sit within sight and sound of the merry sea waves for a few days I have decided to employ my unsocial hours in retrimming ancient hats and supervising the maid's struggles to inspire an evening dress, by the aid of a chiffon tunic, transparent high yoke, and long sleeves, with that sense of decorum which will fit it for appearance in the evening at an English hotel dinner-table. I have three days in this neighbourhood, and they must be disposed of industriously. I will devote them to the desecration of one or two of my town triumphs, and I will blunt the edge of my amateur efforts on an old white satin evening frock of my amiable sister's. This I will cut short and supply with a tunic of black net dotted with infinitesimal jet beads, with corners bearing the burden of black jet tassels. The bodice shall be lightly draped, and possessed of transparent yoke and collar-band, the addition of a pink rose at the belt being guaranteed by the gardener, and all responsibility of results being carefully denied by the designer.

Friday.—I have achieved the pinning of the renovation, and Florence and I are still on speaking terms. I have now been entrusted with the retrimming of a last year's hat, and accepted the burden with great courage. The shape is a dark grey straw, the former decoration a band and monster bows of grey velvet, whose present destiny is to represent a plain band of velvet with a narrow kilting outlining it, while a large velvet button is to have the privilege of fastening down one end of this band, which is to cross the other end at the left side.

Having completed that triumph I shall do my worst with an open-brimmed black hat of my last year's possession, which shall be wreathed generously with white muslin wistaria.

This afternoon we again discussed the dance, finding that no matter how often we added up the number there were still only two more men than women. Whilst we were deploring this fact Nita came in to tea, bringing with her Captain G., a sunburnt traveller from Nigeria, who is home on leave with various other martyrs to their country's good. He cheerily gave us the option of three of these valiant warriors, whom he guaranteed would be delighted at the chance of a dance, the like not being often procurable in the wilds of Nigeria. The Nigerians, I gather, have quaint habits and customs, and a further acquaintance with the manners of the Hausa women would add considerably to my education and even more considerably to my entertainment. It is a pity that a week-end trip to their country is outside the pale of practical politics.

Purple and blue-checked tweed for the moors.

In truth, I am getting rather tired of this country, and wonder how within the conversational limits available Florence retains the intelligence she appeared to possess when she praised my amateur millinery efforts.

Saturday.—I went up to town and dined with B., who is off to-morrow to the Black Forest, where she says she proposes to walk barefooted and eat nuts. All the same, she has supplied herself with a considerable collection of clothes and showed me a pleasing example in black and white foulard, with buttonholes and rosettes of cherry colour and a vest and yoke of embroidery. With this she wishes to wear a broad-brimmed hat with a wreath of red roses round the front and a brush of black osprey at one side. The omission of the black osprey I suggested might be to the advantage of the scheme, and she affected to agree with me, but, like the majority, she will faithfully follow her own advice.

The dinner-table looked delightful, its bare boards glistening between mats of old lace, while down the centre was a narrow strip of Oriental embroidery, and placed upon this was a statuette of terra cotta flanked on either side by a slender vase of gold-traced glass holding dark red and pale pink carnations. There was a pleasantly expensive simplicity about it, and so there was about my hostess's frock—half dress, half teagown, and a delightful combination of pale yellow crêpe meteor with Italian lace bordered with gold, and a black sash passed twice round her waist, with a pink rose held in the centre of its knot at the side. It was "only an old rag," I know, for she told me so several times as we sat on the balcony and gossiped of men, and women, and things, and admitted that on the whole there had been some glad moments in this sad season.

Later I foregathered with Joan at her club, where I found several dames d'industrie standing at their bridge at midnight in most merry mood and excellent clothes. There was L. in a black satin short skirt with a tunic of net bearing broad hems of pin-spotted jet, outlined at intervals with lines of large beads. Her fair hair was waved high in the front, and an enormous twist, hers by right of purchase, centred a group of curls on her crown held with square jet pins. Miss T. had on a Saxe blue chiffon gown bordered with little silken balls and traced with shaded blue bugles. Joan wore a black frock with grey crystals and jet decoration, and little Miss Q. typified simplicity in an elaborately embroidered soft muslin gown with Malines lace outlining the décolletage, and a pale blue ribbon in her hair and about her knees. Amongst other items of supreme interest we discussed Miss T.'s new motor coat of dark red serge lined with red and white spotted foulard, with a monster collar of black velvet at the back, and long revers of black satin in the front doing their drapeful duty with much becomingness from neck to waist. Details were forthcoming also of a model of simplicity to grace the North, made in purple and blue-checked tweed with woollen crochet buttons, and a hat to match, decked with band and crochet quills.

I left Joan's cheery society at something like 2 a.m., much the poorer in pocket and much the richer in jests, and to-morrow I return to Florence for further participation in her fresh air fund.

Monday.—I spent an idle morning reading "Leaves from a Garden," whose anonymous author is amongst the best-known secrets of Polichinelle. Her writing always attracts me by its strong personal note, its never-failing wit, and its unerring instinct towards the faults of others. There is an indefinable and vital charm about it all, and she sets her scenes and her people so that I see and hear them. I was entertained by her "Leaves from a Life," and this new book has like privilege, and she is to publish a third. May I be here to read it, and discern accurately which halo fits what head, and learn more of the difficult art of thinking kindly of your fellows, while so completely understanding them. Florence's youngest prodigy always says: "Mummy, must I have my little friends to tea? I do so hate them!" Mayhap she voices a popular sentiment? H. came down, bringing his mother-in-law, in dark blue and white spotted foulard, and a purple hat outspread with dark blue wings. He is a great expert on savage tribes, and professes to have discovered, among his other adventures, that mothers-in-law are not the fearsome creatures they are popularly misrepresented to be. He finds that his wants mobilising, and that she has brought inactivity to a fine art. He declares that when enjoying what she calls a strenuous day she rolls from her native sofa into a taxi, thence to a train, and later into a waiting motor; that on arrival at her destination she falls upon the nearest couch, only uprising for meal times; and ultimately she returns to town in the same energetic fashion, only to declare herself utterly worn out and just fit for bed. On the whole he considers her as curious a creature as any he has come across in the wilds, whilst he informs all his friends confidentially that he knows exactly how to treat her. He pats her and strokes her soothingly at intervals, places chairs, and footstools, and sofas beneath her at every opportunity, and pronounces her entirely tame. I wonder what the mother-in-law thinks? But as he is quite nice, and, like the hero in the song, has "blue eyes and green socks," doubtless she acquiesces calmly in his methods, and may be disposed to let him practise them until further notice of his removal to foreign climes. Her daughter is meanwhile careering round England on active service in the tennis tournaments.

WORK AND PLAY.

During October and November Dr. Lionel Taylor will deliver a very interesting series of lectures on Public Health and Citizenship to the members of the Lyceum Club. The Public Service Board, which has organised the lectures, has drawn up a list of books bearing on the subject, with their publishers and prices, for those who wish to enter thoroughly into the course.

I have been asked by one or two enterprising parents for books bearing upon the idiosyncrasies of their offspring, particularly on the girl half of those offspring. "Broad Lines in Science Teaching" (Christopher, 5s. net) is one of the most suggestive disquisitions I have recently come across. Roughly speaking, it expresses the difference between the old and the new methods of teaching—or the difference between the date of William the Conqueror and the life of the bee. Written, among others, by Mr. Baddeley, co-educationist and founder of Bedales, it opens out a number of problems to agree or to disagree with which is equally enlightening. Of special interest is the discussion on the teaching of science to girls. Concerning very small children, Professor Sully's "Studies in Childhood" is extremely illuminating.

At the Wesleyan Conference held recently at Bradford there was a discussion on the legislation of 1803 with regard to the preaching of women, and it was finally resolved that those women who undoubtedly possessed special gifts should have powers to exercise them, subject to certain regulations. The number of women in England who have aspired to the pulpit at present is not large. The Rev. Sarah A. Dixon, Ph.D., is a minister of the Congregational Church, and Miss Harriet Offer Baker had charge of a Congregational hall at Horsted Keynes, Sussex, and also worked at Brighton; Miss L. C. R. Smith is the pastor of Hannah Street Congregational Church, Cardiff. She was a member of Dr. Horton's congregation at Hampstead, and received her theological training at the Glasgow Biblical Institute.

The United States seems to offer a good field for the woman minister, having over 4,000. Not all of these, of course, have charges, but many are home missionaries, assistant pastors, and workers in settlements. One of the best known is Miss Gertrude Von Petzold, who was the pastor of Leicester Unitarian Church in England. Perhaps the most celebrated of women ministers in America is Miss Anna Shaw, who, an Englishwoman by birth, left this country in childhood, and was educated in America. She had a three years' theological course in Boston, graduating as B.D. in 1878. Afterwards she went in for a medical course, and took the M.D. degree. Her first charge was in a small town in Massachusetts, and her second was at Cape Cod. In 1904, on the death of Miss Anthony, Miss Shaw became President of the National American Women's Suffrage Association.

All women who take an intelligent interest in matters concerning the welfare of their sex will learn with regret that that most helpful and instructive quarterly, the Englishwoman's Review, is to be discontinued. It is proposed to supply the gap thus left by a yearly volume which is to be a "Record of Work" done at home and abroad, to include such subjects as Women's Suffrage at Home and Abroad, Legislation for Women, University and Educational Intelligence, elections and appointments of women, and so forth. To make this scheme a success it would be necessary to secure a circulation of, say, 2,000 copies, and it is hoped that the number of women in England alone interested in the "things that matter" will make this a feasible project.

Women of a sporting turn who are sojourning by the sea at present should try the delights of deep-sea fishing. One need not be an angler to enjoy this sport. It has fascinations that do not belong to any other kind of fishing. There is none so healthily invigorating, and none which makes a stronger appeal to the sporting instinct, while the life of a fishing boat is as novel as it is stimulating. Getting up at 3 a.m. may not charm everybody, but it will not terrify the girl who has enjoyed "cubbing," and arrayed in "oilies" and a "sou'-wester" she will brave the weather and return to breakfast as hungry as a hunter.

One reads with some amusement that a certain mayor has been scandalised at the costume of Madame Franck, the gallant French "air-woman" who so narrowly escaped adding her name at Blackpool to the list of aeroplane fatalities. If women are adventurous enough to compete with men in this or any other sport, it stands to reason they must be clad accordingly. The conditions of aeroplaning will not allow of any adherence to convention in the matter of costume. The worthy mayor must have been born several decades too late.

FOUR NOVELS.

"Wayward Anne" (John Long, 6s.) is wayward, partly on the wilful-woman principle, partly because Miss Curtis Yorke requires a plot. She lives in the usual flat by herself, writes the usual impossible stories, loves a man under a cloud, and quarrels with him when he emerges from it. Here comes in her waywardness. "Wayward Anne" is one of the most innocuous books I have read.

Mrs. L. T. Meade's "A.B.C. Girl" (White, 6s.) is dedicated to all A.B.C. girls. Now, in my experience your real A.B.C. girl, rising superior to her own surroundings, has a strongly marked preference for duchesses, even if disguised. "The A.B.C. Girl" after all marries a scion, not of the Navy, but only of the merchant service. It is true he declares himself to be a gentleman, which I am very willing to take for granted, but then Rose Fitzhardinge—mark the name—was daughter of an assistant-master in a school for the sons of gentlemen. Her fortune therefore can at best be regarded as ordinary. It is nevertheless pleasant to find some one ready to champion that overworked, underpaid member of society, the A.B.C. girl.

In "The Purple Butterfly" (John Long, 6s.) Mrs. Henry Tippett describes a young woman with positively no redeeming quality. It is true that her mother has had a past, which past makes somewhat bitter her daughter's present; true is it also that the virtuous Lady Fleming is in too lurid contrast with Babette not to provoke an explosion. At the same time, when a girl steals her mother's lover there is no real reason for her to treat an estimable young man thoroughly badly; and the killing of the horse by Babette is almost revolting. The return of Tony to his mother and the flight of Babette with her lover is the end of a clever but entirely unsympathetic book.

The story of Blondel has led most of us to oversentimentality with regard to the troubadour generally. It is a much fresher and more virile view of him that is given by Mr. Lindsey in "The Severed Mantle" (Methuen, 6s.). Raimbout is troubadour and warrior too. He combines with the power to overthrow the Spanish Berguedan a gentleness which leads to his wearing of the severed mantle in imitation of the great St. Martin. He combines the lover and the man of honour. In the background of the story is the usual intrigue which eventuates in Raimbout's finding himself to be somebody else. But even here Mr. Lindsey loses none of his freshness, and the part played in it by the Book of Hours is both ingenious and picturesque.

LETTER FROM MADGE.

Dearest Amy,—Watching a tennis tournament the other day I noticed one extremely graceful girl whose movements were as light and flexible as those of a kitten. It was a pleasure to see her run. The other girls were very different. Their limbs seemed as though weighted with lead when compared with the Diana player. She had a way, too, of twirling her racquet after hitting the ball that gave the inanimate thing the air of being pleased with itself. I remarked on all this to my companion. He said, "Well, look at her feet. They are very small and beautifully arched. That is why her movements are so very graceful." They certainly were lovely little feet, but talking later to the girl herself I said I loved to see her run, she was so light and quick. "All fencing," she replied. "Father insisted on my taking lessons when I was about ten, and I practise constantly with him." I am sure that fencing ought to be included in every girl's training. As to calisthenic exercises, it is only too easy to overdo them, and when this is so the girl becomes squat, and develops in latitude instead of longitude. I know of one girl whose figure became dumpy after a long course of these exercises, and some one advised her mother to stop them at once and let her girl play tennis, row, and ride. She is now tall and has a pretty figure. What would have happened if she had gone on with the exercises?

How cleverly caterers do things nowadays! A friend who has just had a daughter married tells me that the firm employed to provide the refreshments carried the piano and the dining-table away, and packed chairs and couches and smaller tables under tarpaulin in the yard. This left the floor-spaces free for the guests on the day of the wedding, and the refreshments were arranged on a long buffet in the dining-room. The bride and bridegroom went away soon after four, and by the dinner hour everything had been taken away, the dining-table and piano replaced, and only a few scattered flower petals were left to show that there had been anything unusual going on. What would our grandmothers have thought of this way of doing things? A wedding in their day meant a weary business of preparing to turn the house out of the window, turning it out, and then getting it in again. All but the very wealthy were inconvenienced more or less, but now the only thing there is to do is to state clearly what one's wishes are, and when all is finished write the cheque.

In speaking at a dinner given to distinguished Turkish guests by the Lyceum Club, Sir Charles Tyser said interesting things, chiefly about Cyprus. He told us that there are strict rules in the island for the conduct of Courts of Justice, and one of them is that a judge must restrain himself from making any jokes while a case is going on. What a relief to some of our wretched prisoners such a rule would be here! I am told that it is only in Paris and London that magistrates relieve the tedium they feel by perpetrating jokes. In Cyprus it is considered inhumane. Which is the more civilised view?

People brought up on good old Lindley Murray were under the impression that their hardly won acquaintance with the English grammar would serve them to the end. They are annoyed with all this pother about split infinitives. "Have we not been splitting them daily?" they ask. "And is any one a bit the worse?" Even more disgusted are they with the atrocity of "like I was," "like we do," "like George did," and the "Whatever did you do it for?" "Wherever have you been?" and other cognate etymological crimes that would make Lindley Murray execute a somersault in his grave could he hear them.

"Don't leave your money laying about," said the head of an institution to the young women in it. "I only wish it would lay about," murmured one of them. "What a time I should have picking up small coins!"

The twenty-first Cookery and Food Exhibition is to be held at the Horticultural Hall, Westminster, on November 1 and four following days. Mr. A. Escoffier, the famous chef at the Carlton, is chairman of the jury, and I see that Countess Carrington is president, and the Countess of Bective vice-president, of the Domestic Cookery Group. This comprises two sections, the first dealing with elementary cooking as taught in schools, the second with household cookery for the families of artisans. The children's competitions are always interesting, and the competitors in the second section may be domestic women cooks, amateurs or housewives. Section three is styled, rather misleadingly, invalid cookery, but it is not the invalid who is cooked, but only his food. In this division there is a special class open to trained nurses only. It is to be an invalid tray (tray for an invalid!) with a nice little luncheon daintily served.

The artistic cookery is always attractive at these exhibitions. There are valuable prizes in the class open to hotels, restaurants, and clubs. Another section is open to cookery teachers and women cooks. Three dishes have to be sent in, either fish, meat, poultry, game, salad, sweet, or savoury.

One gets many hints from these competitions, and also from those in sauce-making. The time allowed for making three quick-process sauces is fifty minutes, and the varieties are melted butter, hollandaise, and mayonnaise. Can this last be called a quick-process sauce? It always seems to take a long time. When will some one invent a mechanical egg-beater and cream-whipper? It would be difficult, but in these days of science nothing seems impossible. The cook would find it very convenient to adjust the eggs all ready, consign them to the care of the mechanical beater, and turn her attention to something else instead of spending ten minutes over the process and getting cramp in her hand. Some one gave me a recipe the other day in which the directions were to whip some cream for an hour. Is life long enough for this?

Among other competitions I notice vegetable-turning and decorating, also pancake-making. This last can be so very good when well made, and what a toss up it seems whether it will come to table tough and dry, or soft, moist, or succulent! Even the very best cooks seem to misunderstand sometimes the pancake and the potato.

Clare sends me the following from Dublin:—

and the Horse Show week beat all its records of success, splendour and fashion. So say our prophets. Of course everyone knows the danger of prophecy in an age of "pace," when the face of things changes in a moment with the suddeness of a thunderclap, the modern atmosphere being so charged with bolts from the blue that the unexpected may always be more or less confidently expected to happen. Still, we permit ourselves many hopes; they keep up our spirits and materially help the planning and arrangements for a high festival time.

Already we have had and are having more than our usual share of visitors, in fact we and our island seem to be awaking in others, as in ourselves, a strong new growth of interest. The Pole has been discovered and now the Ultima Thule of the Romans must be explored.

Lord and Lady Iveagh are expected to have an unusually brilliant Horse Show party. They not only have one house but two houses suited for entertaining on a large scale. The great Guinness residence in St. Stephen's Green and the glorified villa, "Farmleigh," on the outskirts of the Phœnix Park, are only a few miles apart, and ten minutes or so distant by motor. Both residences are kept in full habitable order. Farmleigh is quite a country residence, as it lies north-west of Dublin, to where the suburbs have not spread. Lord and Lady Iveagh make it principally their home in Ireland, and their sons, Mr. Ernest and Mr. Walter Guinness, have residences in the same neighbourhood. If the prosperity of the Guinness family is great, it is also the cause of prosperity and comfort to a large number of families as well. Lord and Lady Iveagh are spending some time at Buxton before coming to Ireland.

Sir George and Lady Morris are also staying there. Sir George is a retired official of one of the Irish Government Departments, and strongly resembles, especially in his voice, his brother, the late Lord Morris and Killanin. He is one of the most popular members of the Kildare Street Club, the kindliest and most genial of Irishmen.

Lord and Lady Ashbourne have gone to Homburg for a "cure," or, at least, Lord Ashbourne has. The family have now no residence in Ireland, although the heir, Mr. William Gibson, is devoted to the Gaelic revival in the country. Last week he attended the Gaelic Festival held in Dublin, wearing the saffron kilt and other fancy selections from the dress of far-away times which reviving Gaels affect. One wonders why we should hark back to the dress fashion of early centuries, any more than you should to that of Hengist and Horsa or of the men of the Bayeux Tapestry. Dress fashion never does and never did stand still except in places where everything else stands still. Is not progressive Japan now adopting the modern dress that best suits modern needs?

Lord and Lady Lansdowne will, as usual, make a summer stay at Derreen; Lord and Lady Kerry are also at their place near Kenmare. Sir W. Petty, the founder of the family fortunes in Ireland, founded the town of Kenmare. Almost every shop in its streets bears the name of O'Sullivan, giving an interesting illustration of Irish history, the confiscated land, the whole country side in fact, having been the possessions of the O'Sullivan family.

Sir Henry and Lady Bellingham gave a large garden party at their residence in Louth last week, at which a select county was numerously represented. Lord and Lady Bute, with their family, frequently visit Sir Henry, who is Lady Bute's father, at Castle Bellingham.—Yours ever, CLARE.

I think you will find the following recipes for luncheon dishes very much to your taste:—

Melted Cheese with Truffles.—Cut up and grate any quantity you may require of good Parmesan cheese, put it on a chafing-dish with half a glass of white wine, season with pepper, nutmeg, parsley, and some fresh truffles chopped very small. Place on them pats of butter. When the cheese begins to melt, stir it well with a silver fork; when it is properly melted, stir in the well-beaten white of an egg—the yolk may be used if care is taken. Fry some sippets of bread as long as the finger, and with these garnish the dish. Squeeze the juice of a large orange over it. Serve it very hot.

Cheese and Anchovies.—Break a dozen small eggs into a stew-pan, reserving the whites of six of them. Mix three blanched and boned anchovies with them. Season them with salt, pepper, nutmeg (grated), a gill of good gravy, and 2 ozs. of butter. Knead in a little cornflour, then set the whole to cook. When it is done, stir in 1½ oz. of grated Parmesan cheese, the juice of a lemon, and of an orange that has been sprinkled with cayenne. Serve it hot on toasted bread buttered and cut into 2-inch squares.

A Stuffed Pancake.—Cut up the cold roast breast of a chicken into tiny pieces, also some lean ham (pounded), some mushrooms (blanched), and a lamb's sweetbread (blanched and minced). Now season the whole with pepper and grated nutmegs. Stew them in rich gravy, as you would a ragoût. Form a pancake in the pan. When one side is done place the mixture on it; have ready in another pan a pancake, then arrange it upon the mixture. This pancake may be cooked only on one side. Place the whole upon the dish, screen the top with Parmesan cheese, hold over it a red-hot salamander, and send it to table hot and quickly.

Broad Beans à la Maître d'Hôtel will be sure of appreciation.—Boil a quart of quite young, tender beans with a sprig of parsley, strain them, and remove the parsley. Make a gill or more of white sauce, seasoned nicely, and to it add the yolk of an egg mixed with two tablespoonfuls of cream. Mix a tablespoonful of chopped parsley with half an ounce of butter and a good squeeze of lemon juice on a plate with a palette-knife until well blended, then incorporate it with the sauce. Add the beans, which must be made quite hot, without boiling. Serve them in a dish previously stuck with a border of croûtons, and pass the yolk of a hard-boiled egg through a sieve upon the surface.

Ever your loving Cousin, MADGE.

ABRIDGED PROSPECTUS.

This Company has been formed to acquire as a going concern the Rubber, Coffee, and Tropical Estates known respectively as "La Amistad," La Amistad Extension, Achotan, Buenos Aires, and Miahuapa, in Mexico. La Amistad and La Amistad Extension are situated about four miles from railway station on the Pan American Railroad, in Chiapas, Achotan, less than 30 miles from Tecoman Station, on the Mexican Central Railway, in Michoacan, and about the same distance from the Port of Manzanillo, Buenos Aires, and Miahuapa in Vera Cruz. The former is about 15 miles from the port of Naula, and the latter about 37 miles from the Port of Tuxpan. The properties are all on good wagon roads. The Company will take over the properties as from the 30th April, 1910, up to which date the Vendors will discharge all liabilities and outgoings.

The Estates are all Freehold, and have a combined area of about 27,961 acres.

All the Estates are easily accessible and well situated for economic working under one management. Having been in the producing state for several years past, their productive capacity under good management and with sufficient working capital should be considerably enhanced.

The Estates are Revenue producing from Rubber, Coffee, Vanilla, and other products, and the Company should be dividend earning from its inception.

According to the reports, in the Amistad Estate alone, some 30,000 trees, 7 to 8 years old, were tapped lightly last year and produced 8,200 lbs. of dry Rubber, which was sold in New York at 6s. per lb., and this year the yield is expected to be 18,2 0 lbs., and next year 28,740 lbs. of Rubber. It is estimated that the four Estates with about 100,000 trees ready for tapping will produce in the first year about 60,000 lbs of Rubber, and in the second year about 80,000 lbs. of Rubber, with an increasing yield from year to year as the other trees on the Estate become tappable.

RUBBER.—Dr. Olsson-Seffer reports there is a total of 126,000 Rubber trees (Castilloa lactiflua) planted on the Estates, and that these trees are in good condition, varying in age from 2½ to 9½ years. It is gathered from the report that fully seventy-five per cent. of the trees are ready for tapping.

Samples of Castilloa Rubber were recently submitted for valuation to Messrs. Wm. Jas. and Hy. Thompson, Produce Brokers, whose report on the value of the different samples will show the excellent quality of the Rubber:—

To the Directors of THE AMISTAD RUBBER PLANTATIONS AND ESTATES, LIMITED.

Dear Sirs, London, 2nd July, 1910.

(1) Light Sheet Castilloa clean, fairly strong, attractive in appearance, and slightly smoked. Value ..... 9s. 0d. to 9s. 6d. per lb.

(1a) Dark-ribbed Sheet Castilloa, strong, smoked. Value to-day ..... 9s. 0d. to 9s. 6d. ,,

(2) Sheet, very thin, not so attractive as above lot, fairly strong. Value ..... 8s. 6d. to 9s. 0d. nominal

(3) Sheet, smoked, clean and strong, a portion showing virgin, which somewhat depreciates the value. If free from virgin the value to-day is about ..... 9s. 3d. ,,

(4) Sheet, smoked, virgin, fairly strong. Value to-day about ..... 8s. 0d. to 8s. 6d. ,,

The above samples are without doubt a very fine quality of Castilloa Rubber, and prove that this quality of rubber scientifically prepared will undoubtedly hold its own in the market.

(Signed) WM. JAS. AND HENRY THOMPSON.

The cost of producing and marketing the Rubber is about 6d. per lb. but has been calculated at 1s. per lb. in the profits below stated.

The Government Taxes on all the Properties do not exceed £260 per annum, and there is no export duty on Rubber, Coffee, or any other product grown on these Estates.

Dr. Olsson-Seffer estimates the nett profits as follows:—

| Year. | Rubber. | Coffee, Cocoa, Sugar, and other Sources. | Total Nett Profits. | |
|---|---|---|---|---|
| 1910 | £6,712 | £6,892 | 13,104 = 13 | per cent. on the Capital Issued |
| 1911 | 7,788 | 8,103 | 15,893 = 15 | ,, ,, ,, |
| 1912 | 10,226 | 10,835 | 21,053 = 21 | ,, ,, ,, |
| 1913 | 15,296 | 11 700 | 26,996 = 26 | ,, ,, ,, |
| 1914 | 21,613 | 12.300 | 33,913 = 33 | ,, ,, ,, |
| 1915 | 31,736 | 12,400 | 44.136 = 44 | ,, ,, ,, |

The above profits are calculated on the basis of only 4s. per lb. Rubber, but present selling prices are more than double.

BUILDINGS, LIVE STOCK, &c.—There are on all the Estates the necessary buildings for superintendents, overseers, and labourers, and the Estates are well equipped with the usual agricultural machinery, tools, implements, etc. The sanitary condition is good and the climate healthy.

Management.—The Company has secured the services of Dr. Pehr Olsson-Seffer as General Manager for the term of three years on terms which the Directors consider favourable to this Company.

Dr. Olsson-Seffer is one of the highest authorities connected with Rubber, and for three years held the position of Professor of Botany at the Stanford University of California.

VALUATION AND PURCHASE CONSIDERATION.—Dr. Olsson-Seffer values the properties to be acquired, including Buildings, Machinery, Crops, etc., at £96,500, but the Company will purchase the Estates for £78,000, payable as to £25,500 in cash, as to £24,000 in cash or shares at the option of the Directors, and as to the balance in fully-paid Shares in the Company. No part of the purchase price is in respect of goodwill. No intermediate profit has been or is intended to be paid to the Globe Rubber Corporation, who are the Vendors to and promoters of the Company, but the Company has agreed to allot to the Vendors or their nominees at par so many of the 150,000 unissued Shares of the Company as they may apply for prior to the 1st September, 1912.

The qualification of a Director (except a first Director) shall be the holding in his own right and as the sole holder of Shares in the Company to the nominal value of not less than £150.

A brokerage of 6d. for every 10 Shares will be paid by the Company on Shares applied for and allotted upon applications bearing the stamps of brokers and approved agents.

It is intended to apply for a quotation for and Special Settlement in the Shares on the Stock Exchange, London.

Application for Shares may be made on the form accompanying the Prospectus, and which can be obtained from the Bankers, Brokers, and Solicitors, and at the Registered Offices of the Company.

London, 5th August, 1910.

"TRUTH" PUZZLES.

"TRUTH" DOLL AND TOY SHOW.

PRELIMINARY NOTICE.

It seems early days yet to be reminding my readers of an event which is still four months ahead. But the fact that some 4,000 of dolls have already arrived from the manufacturers, and are crying aloud for clothes, impels me to direct the attention of TRUTH'S lady friends to their condition, and to the fact that they will be required for exhibition at the Albert Hall in the middle of December, prior to distribution among the London Poor Law Schools and Hospitals.

I hope that many ladies will take pity on the poor dolls, and forward their applications as soon as possible. The usual prizes for the dressing of the dolls will, of course, be awarded after the Show.

HOME-MADE TOYS.

The exhibits in this class last year did not come up to expectations. This year special efforts will be made to stimulate amateur toy-makers to take part in the Competition. With that object in view the Editor of TRUTH has decided (assuming the entries warrant it) to give a Special Prize for

HOME-MADE DOLLS' HOUSES,

in addition to the usual Prizes offered in the Home-Made Toys Class.

He desires me now to direct particular notice to this, as he is of opinion that the making of Dolls' Houses is an art in which amateur talent is likely to find congenial scope for its exercise. Moreover, a Dolls' House is a peculiarly serviceable sort of plaything for children, both because it is one in the delights of which several can share simultaneously, and also because it is better able to withstand the wear and tear of daily use than smaller and more fragile toys.

A further and more detailed announcement of the Show will appear in due course. Meanwhile, let readers of TRUTH make a careful note of the date, which is Wednesday and Thursday, December 14 and 15, 1910.

CONDENSED RULES.

All answers to the current Puzzle must be sent in on or before the morning of the Monday week following the date of that Puzzle's publication to the PUZZLE EDITOR, TRUTH Buildings, Carteret Street, Queen Anne's Gate, London, S.W. The answers must be signed by a nom-de-plume of not more than twelve letters, and must not be sent on postcards, nor by telegraph, nor by hand, whilst in the case of new competitors the real name and address must be forwarded with the first reply sent.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE No. 1,643.

By the time the entries for this Puzzle close, the cricket season of 1910 will be drawing near its end. Owing to the new system of scoring points in the county championship, which has been tried this season as an experiment, the relative positions of the various counties have been followed, week by week, with perhaps more than usual interest. As all my cricket-loving readers are doubtless aware, this new system places drawn and lost games in the same category, and estimates a county's position by the percentage of wins on the total number of games played. Thus a county which has played sixteen games, winning ten, losing two, and drawing four, would be reckoned to have scored 62.5 points, and not 83.3 points, as would have been the case under the previous system, when drawn games were ignored. The advantage of the new system, of course, is that it incites a team to go all out to win at any risk, and so tends to do away with the tedium of over-cautious play. The disadvantage is that a draw which is to all intents and purposes an overwhelming victory for one of the contestants is equally as prejudicial as a crushing defeat; and this, under certain circumstances, may easily give rise to the most absurd situations.

However, I am not now concerned to debate the pros and cons of this vexed question. The system is there—for this season, at any rate—and must be taken for granted. My particular purpose, at the moment, is to invite my readers (with the stimulus of the usual prize of two guineas)

TO FORECAST THE RESPECTIVE POSITIONS OF THE FIRST-CLASS COUNTIES AT THE END OF THE PRESENT CRICKET SEASON, STATING THE PERCENTAGE OF POINTS WHICH EACH HAS SECURED ON THE SYSTEM OF MARKING NOW IN FORCE.

It merely remains to add that no competitor may submit more than one forecast, and that all forecasts must reach TRUTH Office by the first post on Monday, August 22.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

The real name, with the address, of JAR, winner of 7s. in connection with TRUTH Prize No. 1630, is J. A. Reid, Esq., Parkgate, Kingsmills Road, Inverness.

G. W. S.—I must think your suggestion over. The main objection to it is that so comparatively few people nowadays read Disraeli's novel that such a competition would only appeal to a limited circle.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE, No. 1,640.—ASSORTED SPECIMENS—GOOD AND OTHERWISE.

TRIUMPHAL ODES CELEBRATING THE RECENT VICTORY OF THE WOMAN'S SUFFRAGE BILL IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Fruit of padlocks, pins, and whips,
Fruit of pinches, bites, and nips.
Victory sweet the conqueror sips.
We have got a Bill!

See uprise brave Shackleton,
Chivalry's own champion:
"Woman's Cause" he's girded on,
Father of the Bill.

Surely now the cause is won,
Surely now the battle's done—
Out, alas! here cometh one
To oppose our Bill.

Oh, the wicked Chancellor!
Thought we he would never more
Vials of his wrath outpour
On our little Bill.

'Tis a fickle, faithless crew;
Who'd have thought that Winston, too,
To our cause would prove untrue,
Faithless to the Bill.

For the women's cause to care,
By some means or foul or fair,
We will teach all those who dare
To oppose our Bill.

"Ostrich."

Suffragist Leader Loquitur:

Girls from whom Asquith oft fled,
Girls whom I have often led,
Welcome to your Tory bed,
Or to victory.

We will expose each traitor knave
Who took back the pledge he gave:
Who so base as be man's slave?
Let her turn and flee.

By oppression's woes and pains,
By our sex in servile chains,
We will strain our tongues, hearts, brains,
But we shall be free

Now's the day and now's the hour;
See our foes who shirk and cower,
Hide behind proud Asquith's power,
Words and knavery.

Who that woman's cause be law
From pledg'd word will not withdraw;
Women stand till men we awe,
Let them follow me.

Lay proud men usurpers low!
Tyrants fall in ev'ry foe!
Man-made law's a blooming show!
Let us vote, or die.

J. McGrigor Allan.

Women oft by Pankhurst led,
Women who would not be fed,
Women (wanting franchise) dead—
Conquer by your will!

"Now's the day and now's the hour;"
Men, your foes, with envy glower;
Victory is in your power.
Desperandum nil!

Spite of Asquith's feeble speech,
Spite of weak-kneed sisters' screech,
Suffrage is within your reach:
Fivescore votes and nine!

First-fruit of the fight is won;
Soon the battle will be done;
Useless strife the foe will shun;
Wreaths of laurel twine!

Fickle friends the Bill may shelve;
Deep its grave they fain would delve;
Though the clock may point to twelve,
Rise will soon the sun!

Cease not then the power of tongue;
Ne'er control the force of lung;
Let your harps anew be strung;
We [illegible] are won!

Poor Punica

Woman's Victory: July 12, 1910.

Woman who, in freedom's cause,
Trampled on the man-made laws,
Heeding not a world's applause
Or contumely:

In the gruesome Second Div.
Forced (by feeding-tube) to live—
For these things no quarter give—
Trousered tyranny!

See! your hosts with banners come,
Blowing trumpet, beating drum;
Now will woman "make things hum!"
Io triumphe.

Commons' House, which, bent on ill,
Drove you from behind its grille,
Now to sovran woman's will,
Bows on bended knee!

Vain is Asquith's blatant "No,"
Vain Lloyd George's backhand blow,
Vain young Winston's playing low
And his perfidy!

Hark! the Second Reading's passed!
Suffrage, long sought, comes at last!
Let not woman be downcast:
Let her "wait and see."

Trelaw.

(Parody—"Scots wha hae.")

Lassies wha by force were fed,
Mithers oft by Pankhurst led,
Welcome to your convict bed
Or to victory!

Now's the day and now's the hour;
See approach wee Winston's power,
See his bluecoat Bobbies glower,
Chains and slavery!

Wha will be a muckle fool?
Wha will fill a duckin' stool?
Wha sae base as stand the rule
O' men and tyranny?

Wha for wimmen's votes and right
With tongue and hands will brawly fight,
And put the coward foe to flight,
Let her follow me?

By oppression's pains and woes,
By each lass in prison clothes,
Our bluid we'll pour from every nose,
But we shall be free!

Lay the hopes o' Asquith low,
And wimmen's guidly cause will grow—
Votes for Wimmen—all the go!
You just wait and see!

Roumanian.

Women, who the vote demand!
Suffragettes, our martial band!
Who have fought with tongue and hand,
Hail the victory!

Ours the day, and now's the hour,
One strong blow to strike for power;
Man, the tyrant, now must cower,
And the vote decree.

Jeered at as appalling freaks,
Sentenced by remorseless beaks,
Pent in Holloway for weeks—
Now we shall be free!

By the strength of women frail
Shall our righteous cause prevail;
Ministers we've forced to quail,
Tremble, bolt, and flee.

Now to strike the final blow,
Catch M.P.'s and let them know
That our Bill now through must go.
Up and follow me!

Tony.

Comrades of the mauve and white,
Heroes of a stubborn fight,
Ours a cause both just and right,
Over tyranny.

Step by step we gain the way,
Till success shall crown the day,
Overthrow man's galling sway—
Votes and victorie!

We have faced the convict's cell,
Stormed the haughty citadel,
Followed, bravely, Christabel,
Laid some tyrants low.

Not of us shall it be said
That we feared the prison bed,
Even though by force we're fed,
We with valour glow.

Weak, we seek to fight the strong,
Hard we toil to right the wrong,
Raise we now triumphant song—
Women must be free!

By the perils undergone,
By the battle nearly won,
Keep your armour girded on—
Votes and victorie!

Ephesea.

Females who have fought so long,
Sing, Oh! sing the joyful song:
"Now to us the votes belong!"
Patient Suffragette!

We have struggled long with man,
Starved and bullied the whole clan,
Underneath a prison ban,
Misused Suffragette!

Banged about with chains and stick,
Up to every wily trick,
"Gives us votes!" and, Oh! be quick!
Worn-out Suffragette!

Fed by force, half-killed with fear,
Oft we shed the briny tear,
Difficult our way to steer,
Courage, Suffragette!

See the "House" at last caved in,
Half-acknowledged 'twas a sin
Woman's wits ne'er had a spin.
Triumph, Suffragette!

"Women," now we've got our way,
Let us give the men their sway—
And "our Lords'" commands obey.
Married Suffragette!

F. M. T.

Women all! Your voices raise,
Our great victory to praise,
For, despite man's artful ways,
We shall have the vote.

Though they may hang up our Bill,
We shall get our freedom still;
Nought can stem a woman's will.
We shall have the vote.

Why should men alone make laws,
And to keep them women cause?
Let us ever show our claws.
Till we get the vote.

And when we that vote have got,
How superior our lot!
Soon we'll clear each social blot,
When we get the vote.

For in yonder House we'll sit,
Though the men may growl a bit;
They'll not keep us out of it
When we get the vote.

And the breeches we will don;
All men's power and glory gone,
They shall be the slaves anon;
So we'll use our vote.

Almaviva.

Suffragettes! on skilly fed,
Raise erect each martyred head.
See, at last our Bill has sped
On to glorious victory!

Ours the day, and ours the hour,
See both Rads. and Tories cower.
Asquith, trembling in our power,
Learns to rue his knavery.

What although we represent
Of our sex not five per cent.?
We've persuaded Parliament
Women all with us agree.

Who will now despise our yells,
Dog-whips, chains, and dinner-bells?
Strategy like ours compels
Man's admiring sympathy.

We, who boldly broke the law,
Fought policemen tooth and claw,
Now our great reward shall draw—
Prize of pertinacity!

We who, at our own sweet will,
Hurled the brickbat, smashed the Grille,
Shall Imperial tasks fulfil,
Shaping England's destiny!

Winifrith.

Maids whom duty oft hath led,
Matrons who have husband wed,
Welcome to your prison bed,
Or to victory!

Who will not join gallant throng,
As through the streets we march along,
Singing this our battle song—
"Let women voters be!"

Who for Scotland Yard will care?
Who chains and padlocks fear to bear?
Who will mind forced-feeding fare?
Surely never we!

The day has come, the welcome hour,
'Spite opponents' faces sour;
Every itch will bring us power—
No more slavery!

Nemo.

Women who with men compete,
Shout with joy and throng the street,
Celebrate your latest feat—
One march nearer goal.

Heed ye not the crafty move,
Futile it is safe to prove,
Meant to block you in your groove—
Fail not in your rôle.

Long as ye have been in thrall,
Hearken to the clarion call;
Charge the barrier, break the wall
Limiting your sphere.

Boldly face the craven crew
Who would cheat you of your due;
Vain devices let them rue—
Such ye need not fear.

Prison walls ye may deride:
Stone without, but down inside;
Tasks upon the ebbing tide
Lightly drift away.

Sound the tocsin, beat the drum,
Make the welkin ring, "We come,
Never more, inert and dumb,
Weakly to obey!"

Suffragettes, who long have waged
War against a foe enraged,
Ev'ry faculty engaged,
Struggling for the vote.

Victory behold in sight,
And acclaim with deep delight,
Speedy triumph of the right
From your point of view.

Now's the day and now's the hour—
See approaching woman's pow'r;
TRUTH may scoff and Asquith low'r—
Woman wins the day.

Future chronicles shall tell
How the early martyrs fell,

Fell, for fourteen days!

Keeping in Health

is a much easier matter if you have your bedroom floors covered with LI-NOLA. You spend many hours in the bedroom, and whilst sleeping it should be your extra aim to breathe air as pure as possible. With dust-filled carpets in the bedroom, dust germs and dust are inhaled. The lungs do not get the pure reviving air they should, and the result is injury to your health, limpness when you awake, and a "throaty" feeling. LI-NOLA gathers no dust, and does not pollute the bedroom atmosphere. Free patterns show you how the luxurious colour of a costly carpet is equalled at a little cost. ## ENTRE NOUS.

THE King and Queen drove from Ballater Station to Balmoral in an open carriage drawn by four horses, with postillions and out-riders. Their Majesties were received by the Balmoral Highlanders at the entrance to the castle grounds, and a short speech of welcome was delivered by Mr. Michie, the "Commissioner" for the Royal estate on Deeside, to which the King replied. The Royal carriages went on up the avenue in procession at a walking pace, preceded by six pipers, who played "Highland Laddie." At the entrance to the castle the Highlanders drank to the health of their Majesties amidst loud cheering, and they were afterwards entertained at dinner in the ballroom.

A guard of honour furnished by the Royal Scots has arrived from Edinburgh Castle at Ballater Barracks, and will be stationed there during the residence of the Court at Balmoral. It has always been asserted that the barracks at Ballater were built from a design which was to have been carried out at a station in India; but there was some muddling at headquarters, and the plans were sent by mistake to Scotland.

---

The London and North-Western Royal train which conveyed the Court from Euston to Ballater last week was the largest and heaviest which has ever travelled North. It consisted of a dozen saloons (several of them double ones), besides the luggage vans, and it was about 270 yards in length.

---

The announcements in some of the papers respecting the King's plans for the Twelfth were exceedingly absurd and nonsensical. It was stated that his Majesty would shoot over "Whitemouth moor." There are no grouse on Whitemouth, which is one of the best beats in Abergeldie deer forest. The fact is that grouse are very scarce indeed at Balmoral, the deer forest always having been first object there. Until King Edward rented Micras moors, in Glen Garry, from Mr. Farquharson, of Invercauld, he was a guest for grouse shooting either at Brackley or at Invercauld, but he never went out on the Balmoral or Abergeldie grounds, owing to the scarcity of birds.

---

The King and the Prince of Wales drove through the Royal deer forest on Wednesday to Loch Muick, where they spent several hours in trout fishing from boats. Luncheon was served at the Glassalt Spiel, Queen Victoria's cottage on the north side of the loch. The fishing has been much improved during the last few years, as King Edward caused the loch to be stocked with Loch Leven trout. Loch Muick is over two miles long, and it is situated at a point where the estates of Abergeldie, Birkhall, and Glenmuick all meet, the fishing being shared among them, but the King rents all the angling. The scenery is very wild about, and the loch is surrounded on three sides by mountains. Queen Victoria frequently spent a few days on Loch Muick, when she occupied the Glassalt Spiel, and the suite and servants stayed at the Royal hut near the foot of the loch.

On Friday the King and the Prince of Wales drove up to Bridgend of Birsh, and shot over the Gealaig beats from ten o'clock until four, when sport ceased at Braenaloin. Seventy-five brace were killed by four guns. These moors are on the north side of the Dee, and they extend to Gairnside. The King will commence deer stalking in the Royal forest this week, and later on in the season there will be drives for stags at Ballochbuie, and for roedeer from the Abergeldie and Birkhall woods.

---

Lord Knollys is to reside at Craig Gowan House during the stay of the Court at Balmoral Castle. During the last reign Craig Gowan was occupied each autumn by Lord and Lady Knollys for several weeks. This house was built by Queen Victoria in the seventies, and it was "gifted" to John Brown, on whose death the property passed to his brother, from whom it was privately purchased by King Edward shortly after his accession. At one time Craig Gowan House was a veritable museum of the gifts received by John Brown from Imperial and Royal personages.

The King has placed Abergeldie Castle at the disposal of Lord and Lady Carrington for the season, as the place will not be occupied by any member of the Royal Family this year. After the death of the Duchess of Kent Abergeldie was lent for one or two seasons to Lord John Russell, but since 1863 the place has always been occupied by members of the Royal Family. Abergeldie, which is leased from Mr. Gordon, is a picturesque old house, pleasantly situated on the banks of the Dee, about two miles from Balmoral. The deer forest on the Abergeldie estate has some very good beasts, and the extensive woods are full of roedeer. The celebrated Whitemouth section of the Royal deer forest is on the Abergeldie estate, and the salmon fishery on the Dee extends for seven miles downward from Balmoral Bridge on the south side of the river.

---

A number of newspapers have stated that the King and Queen intend to revive Queen Victoria's custom of staying at Balmoral every spring. This is a pure fiction. Their Majesties propose to spend about two months from the opening of the shooting season at Balmoral each year. A spring residence on Deeside would be out of the question. Queen Victoria's absence at Balmoral during the session of Parliament several times caused very great inconvenience to the Government of the day. Both in 1866 and in 1885 there was much trouble and delay owing to her late Majesty being at Balmoral when a Ministerial crisis took place.

---

No alterations of any kind have been carried out at Balmoral Castle since the spring of last year, either externally or internally. King George occupies the apartments which King Edward had appropriated to his own use, and the Queen has taken over the suite which was set apart for Queen Alexandra.

---

Queen Alexandra is expected to leave Sandringham to-morrow evening on a visit to the Princess Royal and the Duke of Fife at Mar Lodge, but it is quite possible that her Majesty's plans may again be changed. Queen Alexandra will go abroad when she leaves Deeside.

---

Princess Patricia of Connaught is on a visit to Lord and Lady Beauchamp at Madresfield Court. The Duchess of Connaught is on the Continent.

---

The Duke of Sparta, who has been staying at Harrogate, was on a visit last week to the Duchess of Rutland at Stanton Woodhouse, where he was joined by the Duchess of Sparta, coming from Eastbourne. The Duke of Sparta, Lord Granby, Lord Robert Manners, and Captain Lindsay shot over Beeley Woods on Friday and Saturday, and obtained fair sport. The Duke of Rutland's celebrated Longshaw moors, between Bakewell and Sheffield, are let for the season to Sir Thomas Birkin, of Nottingham, who will begin grouse shooting to-morrow. The Duke of Rutland, who has been ill from sciatica, is staying at Matlock Bath.

---

The King and Queen of the Belgians are staying at Possenhofen, near Munich, on a visit to her Majesty's relatives. On returning to Belgium they will spend a short time at Ostend, after which they are going on a visit to the Comtesse de Flandres at the Château d'Amerois, her estate in the Ardennes.

---

The Infante Alfonso d'Orléans-Bourbon and his wife Princess Beatrice of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha have been staying during the last fortnight at Branksea Island, on a visit to Mr. van Raalte. It is understood that a serious attempt has been made by certain Imperial and Royal personages to bring about an official reconciliation between the Infante Alfonso and the Court of Spain. There has been no interruption in the cordial private relations of King Alfonso and his cousin.

---

It is curious that two of the daughters of the Grand Duchess Marie and the late Duke Alfred have contracted irregular marriages, and in each case with unpleasant results to the husband. The Infante Alfonso violated the family statutes of the Royal Family of Spain by marrying a Protestant. The Grand Duke Cyril Vladimirovitch broke the laws of the Greek Orthodox Church by marrying his first cousin, and this offence was aggravated by the fact that the Princess's first marriage with another first cousin had ended in a divorce. There are only two lives (besides that of the Emperor Nicholas) between the Grand Duke Cyril and the Imperial Throne, and in the event of his succession serious difficulties would be inevitable, and grave results might follow.

---

Princess Victor of Hohenlohe-Langenburg and her daughter the Countess Gleichen have left St. James's Palace for Norton Manor, near Taunton, where they will reside until the end of October. Norton Manor, which is the old seat of the Welman family, stands on high ground surrounded by woods, and the house is a prominent object from the Great Western main line.

---

The Lord Chamberlain's officials will be occupied for some time in going through the inventories of the Crown property at Windsor Castle, Buckingham Palace, and St. James's Palace. These inventories are always carefully gone through and verified when a demise of the Crown takes place. Many valuable articles which were known to have been at Windsor Castle during the reign of George the Fourth had mysteriously disappeared when the collection was examined after the death of that Sovereign. Prince Albert introduced a strict system of supervision over the Crown property in the various palaces.

Captain Heath, who has just vacated the appointment of Military Attaché to the Embassy at Berlin, has been appointed to the command of the battleship Superb, which he joins this week.

---

Captain Weld Forester, Grenadier Guards, has been appointed aide-de-camp to Lord Hardinge, the new Viceroy of India; and Captain Earl Percy, of the same regiment, goes to Canada as A.D.C. to the Governor-General. Captain Lord Montagu Douglas-Scott will rejoin the regiment shortly. He has been employed in India as aide-de-camp to Lord Minto since November, 1905.

In Memoriam.

EARL SPENCER.

(Died August 13, 1910.)

Farewell, my Lord! A strenuous rôle
You've played upon the public stage,
From early youth to mellow age;
But always you were Honour's soul.

Farewell, my Lord! A sportsman rare
Your life was, like your riding, straight;
You shunned the quest of gap or gate;
You took your fences full and fair.

Farewell, my Lord! When times were ill,
You pinched yourself the poor to aid.
What sacrifice for them you made
In many a grateful heart lives still.

Farewell, my Lord! No title can
True lustre to its wearer add;
A noble earl may be a cad;
You lived and died a noble—man.

---

Lord Spencer was the most distinguished of the small band of Whig nobles who remained faithful to Liberalism when Home Rule finally divorced it from Whiggery. He was a Liberal, not by family tradition, but by conviction and sympathy, and had he been less modest and self-seeking he might have succeeded Mr. Gladstone as Premier without serious opposition, and with very great advantage to the party. He had nothing in him of the democratic politician—not even the gift of popular oratory. But he had many of the attributes of true statesmanship, sound judgment, aptitude for affairs, administrative ability, sympathy with the needs and aspirations of the people, and, above all, personal character beyond suspicion of double dealing or unworthy motive. His countrymen may well be proud of such a man, and regret that his kind are not more numerous.

---

The Times remarks that it has always been inexplicable to large numbers of his countrymen how, after his Irish experiences, Lord Spencer came to "find salvation" in Home Rule. That is only because such large numbers of his countrymen have less insight into the tendency of the times and a less cheerful confidence in the unknown future than he had himself. Lord Spencer explained at the time that he was converted by the return of eighty-six Nationalists to Parliament at the general election of 1885. In other words, he perceived that, having given Ireland a democratic franchise, and being confronted, as the result, with a unanimous demand on the part of the Irish people, outside Ulster, for the restoration of the right of self-government, reason and expediency alike required us to concede it.

There were other facts besides the return of the eighty-six Nationalists which could not fail to influence Lord Spencer as they did his chief. The "Irish experiences," which to superficial observers might make it difficult to understand how he could ever become a Home Ruler, were calculated to convince a man of his temperament and principles of the impossibility of permanently governing Ireland except with the approval and good-will of her people. During his Viceroyalty Lord Spencer governed in a state of siege, and did it thoroughly, as he did everything he undertook. But he knew—no one better—that governing in a state of siege, though anybody can do it, is not statesmanship and not permanently possible in a civilised country.

---

Nor was this all. While Lord Spencer was governing Ireland by coercion in its sternest shape, Mr. Chamberlain, one of his colleagues in the Cabinet, was hatching Home Rule schemes and suspected of coquetting with the Parnellites at Westminster. The Radical wing of the Party detested coercion and chafed against the administration of Lord Spencer. Not only this. No sooner was Mr. Gladstone succeeded by Lord Salisbury in 1885, and Lord Spencer by Lord Carnarvon, than the Conservatives—so soon to be transfigured into "Unionists"—opened surreptitious negotiations with Mr. Parnell and his colleagues. These were the facts that lent such significance to the return of the eighty-six Nationalists in 1885. With Mr. Parnell at the head of a party of eighty-six, with Mr. Chamberlain and his adherents favouring Home Rule, and with a section of the Conservatives ready to deal with Mr. Parnell, it was obvious to any statesman of ordinary sagacity that there could be no more governing Ireland by Coercion Acts, and that there was, as long as the existing political situation was maintained, a considerable danger that the attempted government of Ireland by England would result in the practical government of England by Ireland. That was why the return of the eighty-six Nationalists converted not only Lord Spencer, but Mr. Gladstone, and the great majority of Liberals. Mr. Chamberlain, be it never forgotten, and his immediate followers were converted already, and that eminent "Unionist" had consequently no difficulty in taking his seat in Mr. Gladstone's first Home Rule Cabinet.

---

In his first tenure of the Irish Viceroyalty Lord Spencer succeeded Lord Abercorn (not yet a Duke), whose "reign" was one of the most brilliant ever chronicled at Dublin Castle. Lord Spencer's was hardly behind it in brilliancy. He and Lady Spencer—then in the zenith of her beauty—were eminently suited to preside over a Court. Their stateliness had no pomposity and their pleasant manners no condescension. The entertaining at Dublin Castle and the Viceregal Lodge was in royal style. Both Lord and Lady Spencer enjoyed great popularity, Lord Spencer as a "perfect gentleman," and, what was even more in Irish eyes, a "real sportsman."

JEFFREY & CO.'S NEW ARTISTIC WALL PAPERS are on view at their Show Rooms, The Wallpaper Gallery, 21, Mortimer St., W. To be had of all Decorators. Factory: 64, Essex Rd., Islington, N.

Lord Spencer's second term of Viceregal office was overshadowed by the tragedy of the Phœnix Park murders on the day of his public entry into Dublin. To increase the tragic and cruel circumstances of the crime, Lord Spencer was himself, from the windows of the Viceregal Lodge, an unconscious witness of the murder of his cousin, Lord F. Cavendish, and his old friend, Mr. T. Burke. Lord Spencer showed a fine courage and strong determination in going through the difficulties of a difficult time in Ireland. The visit of the then Prince and Princess of Wales, some years after, was a brilliant interlude in the second Viceroyalty. It was a great success. A Royal Levee and a Drawing Room were held at Dublin Castle, and many important entertainments were given. If Lord Spencer was harassed by many enemies in Ireland, he left behind him many friends when he went out of office.

---

Lord Morley has told us that if Mr. Gladstone had been asked by Queen Victoria for advice as to his successor when he resigned in 1894 he would have named Lord Spencer. Of course, Sir William Harcourt ought to have become Prime Minister in succession to Mr. Gladstone, but the late Queen had quite decided to pass him over. It was Queen Victoria's original intention to send for Lord Spencer, and this was well known at Court. I have reason to believe that somebody quite unofficial with whom Queen Victoria discussed the situation expressed the opinion that Lord Spencer was so devoted a follower of Mr. Gladstone that if he became Prime Minister the ex-Minister would still be really at the helm. This prospect was distasteful to her late Majesty, and the result was that Lord Rosebery was sent for, to the great and lasting disappointment of Lady Spencer and her sister, Lady Biddulph. Lord Spencer himself was altogether above any feeling of disappointed ambition, and continued to do his duty in public life most admirably until his health failed him.

Althorp, Lord Spencer's family place near Northampton, is notable both for its very beautiful park and its pleasant gardens (which were warmly praised by Evelyn), and for its magnificent collection of pictures, which includes an immense number of portraits of great interest and value. The works by Lely, Van Dyck, Gainsborough, and Reynolds are particularly fine. There is some superb china and much exquisite old furniture. The famous library, which was formed by the second Earl Spencer, was sold in 1892 to Mr. Rylands, who presented it to the city of Manchester. The house is large, but not handsome; the interior is well arranged. It was considerably improved by the late Lord Spencer, and Lady Spencer (a woman of perfect taste) carried out much embellishment in both the house and gardens.

The Althorp estate was purchased early in the reign of Henry VIII. by Sir John Spencer, who was one of the greatest sheep owners in England. The parish church of Brington, on the verge of Althorp Park, is rich in Spencer monuments, and there are two to members of the Washington family, on both of which are the bars and mullets ("Stars and Stripes") of the Washington arms. The successive Earls Spencer have been judicious planters, and the extensive Althorp woods (principally oak, elm, and beech) have always been carefully managed.

Lord Amherst, who died on Sunday after a long illness, had a public career extending over fifty-one years, of which period twenty-six years were spent in the House of Commons, where, as Lord Holmesdale, he was one of the Tory members for Kent. He never took any prominent part in political life. He served in the Coldstream Guards for several years when a young man, and he was engaged in the Crimea, and was very severely wounded at Inkerman. He was fond of shooting and fishing, and very hospitable, and he was a general favourite in society, both in town and country. Lord Amherst's first wife was Lady Julia Cornwallis, daughter of the last Earl Cornwallis, who was a rich heiress, and brought him large estates. There were no children of the marriage, and when she died in 1883 her estates reverted to her own family, and it was said that the settlement of her property was so strict that Lord Amherst left Linton Place, her fine seat in Kent, with nothing from the house or estates but his own personal possessions. Lord Amherst was a grandson (through his mother) of Dr. Hugh Percy, Bishop of Carlisle, who was a younger brother of the fifth Duke of Northumberland.

The untimely death of Sir Joseph Walton will leave a big gap on the Bench and cause much real regret in legal circles. He was an excellent lawyer and a really good judge—one who never jumped to conclusions and always heard both sides out fully before expressing any opinion. No litigant ever left his court without feeling he had had fair play. At the Bar he had a splendid commercial practice, and he was also leading counsel to the Jockey Club all through the anti-gambling crusade. In private life he was the best of hosts, the kindest of men, and the staunchest of friends.

Florence Nightingale would be remembered among the great women of history if only for the heroic service which she rendered in the Crimea. But she rendered even greater service to humanity than that as the pioneer of modern scientific nursing. The last fifty years have seen great changes and progress in medicine and surgery, but none of them have been so revolutionary as the change that has come over the work and status of professional nurses during the same period; and it may be doubted whether the development of nursing has not done more in that time for the alleviation of human suffering than all the progress of medical science. For this the world at large, not England alone, is indebted to the genius—for it was nothing less—of Miss Nightingale, and it is to be hoped that the debt will never be forgotten.

In Memoriam.

FLORENCE NIGHTINGALE.

(Died August 14, 1910.)

'Tis fifty-six long years ago,
Sweet lady of the gentle deeds,
Since you went sailing Eastward ho!
To minister to soldiers' needs.

The clouds were black; the days were dark;
Our lads were in a piteous plight;
But mid the gloom there shone one spark,
One clear, redeeming ray of light—

Yourself, who faced Crimean snows,
When all was chaos, muddle, mess,
And still on angel pinions rose
Above confusion and distress.

Our boys put up some gallant fights,
Their grit on stricken fields displayed;
They pressed to storm the Alma's heights,
They charged with Cardigan's brigade.

Stark heroes these; who long shall live
As glories of the thin red line.
Aye, heroes! Yet the palm they give
To one unwarlike heroine.

Though many warrior names there are
Which still with pride the Briton reads,
You shone the first Crimean star,
Sweet lady of the gentle deeds!

Lord and Lady Dalhousie have left Brechin Castle for Invermark Lodge, where they will spend the shooting season. The deer forest and grouse moors of Invermark are on the borders of Aberdeenshire and Forfarshire, and comprise about 30,000 acres. The sport is usually excellent. There is a very good lodge, where a former Lord Dalhousie (the Lord Panmure of the Crimean War period) and his sister, Lady Christian Maule, were once visited (in 1860) by Queen Victoria and Prince Albert, who rode across the hills from Deeside.

---

The Duke and Duchess of Northumberland, who have been staying at Albury Park, are expected shortly at Alnwick Castle for a residence of several months. They will spend a few weeks early in the autumn at Keilder, their hunting lodge on the Tyne, near the Cheviots. The Dowager Duchess has returned to Stanwick Park, Yorkshire, after spending a couple of months in town. Her Grace is now ninety, and she has survived her husband, the well-known Duke Algernon, for more than forty-five years. She is the eldest sister of the late Duke of Westminster, and she was married in 1842 to Lord Prudhoe, who became Duke of Northumberland in February, 1847, on the death of his brother Duke Hugh, who had been Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland under the Duke of Wellington, and was sent by George IV. as Ambassador Extraordinary to Paris after the death of Louis XVIII.

Lord Erroll has let Slains Castle, his family place in Aberdeenshire, to Sir Alfred Mond, along with the Cruden shootings, which are all lowground. Slains occupies a most romantic position overhanging the sea cliffs. There is an entertaining account of Dr. Johnson's visit to this place in Boswell's "Tour to the Hebrides." The house was rebuilt on the castellated style about seventy years ago.

By far the heaviest bags of grouse on the opening days of the shooting season were obtained in Yorkshire, and the Scotch moors make a very poor show indeed comparatively. The Duke of Devonshire's party of nine guns at Bolton Abbey shot over the Hazlewood beats of the Upper Wharfedale moors on Friday, and 531 brace of birds were killed, although the weather was wet and misty until lunch time. On Saturday a party of seven guns (which again included Lord Crewe, Mr. Alfred Lyttelton, Mr. Henry Stonor, and Sir Charles Cust) were out on Embsay and Ramsgill moors, the drives beginning at the butts known as "the Duke's ground." Four hundred and nineteen brace were killed. Lord Ripon, Lord Pembroke, Lord Durham, Lord Herbert Vane-Tempest, and Mr. E. Charteris drove on Friday morning from Studley Royal to the Dallowgill moors on Nidderdale, and 470 brace were killed, although there was a strong wind. On Saturday the same party were out again, the first drive being at Harper Hill, and 619 brace of grouse were bagged during the day.

A RAINY TWELFTH.

'Tis an ill wind that blows no good,
What poisons some is others' food—
Just so with August rain;
For folk there are who'll welcome yet
And find a blessing in the wet
And dripping window pane.

Though sportsmen in the North may curse
And swear the weather ne'er was worse
As o'er the moor they roam,
'Tis compensation for the poor,
Who keep no guns and rent no moor,
To sit and grouse at home.

I am asked to mention that the date of the annual Suffolk County Ball has been fixed for Thursday, January 5, the place being as usual the Athenæum, Bury St. Edmunds. The date is announced thus far in advance to give ladies and gentlemen interested the opportunity of booking it, which it is to be hoped they will do.

A meeting of the Sutherlandshire County Council was held on Thursday, when a letter was read from the Duke of Sutherland refusing to reopen the Kildonan and Suisgill goldfields. A motion regretting the duke's action was unanimously passed. Mr. Innes, of Rogart, denounced the letter as "despotic, intolerable, and tyrannical." He declared that the duke favours a scheme for transporting many hundreds more of the people of the county "to frozen Alberta," rather than open up Sutherlandshire for the benefit of its inhabitants. The infamous Sutherland evictions, which created such a sensation nearly a century ago, are not yet forgotten in the north. They were most barbarously carried out by order of the "Duchess-Countess" of Sutherland, great-grandmother of the present duke.

A correspondent sends me some curious calculations respecting birth-rate and death-rate competitions, apropos of recent remarks on this subject. They will be found in another column. In my recent remarks it was assumed that there is a sufficient possibility of ensuring a correct prediction by sending in a large number of figures to encourage competitors to the necessary expenditure of money in purchasing coupons for this purpose. From what my correspondent says I conclude that this is a complete mistake, and I am bound to admit that I had not previously noticed the wide limits of the possible variations which a competitor going to work on this principle would have to cover.

It follows that the "record offer" of a prize of £5,000 for the correct prediction of all the eight figures is utterly delusive, and the competition is open to that much more objection. It also seems to me to follow, the chance of a correct prediction being so remote, that the whole "competition" resolves itself into a lottery pure and simple. No one can possibly be certain of winning the prize. A successful prediction can only be a matter of chance. On that view the thing calls for the attention of Scotland Yard, and there is no occasion to talk about the amendment of the law for the purpose of checking this form of gambling until the existing law has been tested and found wanting.

ERUPTIVE JOURNALISM.

("Chesterton flares like a huge volcano each Saturday in the Daily News."—T.P.'s Weekly.)

Why go to Italy to see
Vesuvius in action?
Or climb the peak
At Martinique
If lava's the attraction?
For such desires the Daily News
On Saturdays doth cater—
On page the fourth
Each week breaks forth
The Chestertonian crater.

This wild eruption that recurs
Is really quite amazing;
Alarming shocks
Of paradox
Leave startled leaders gazing.
But when the smoke no longer swirls,
The flame no longer flashes,
Dazed readers find
Is only dust and ashes!

The Bishop of St. Albans has presented the Rev. T. H. Curling, curate of St. Mary-at-the-Walls, Colchester, to the living of St. Osyth, Essex, which is of the net value of about £240 a year, with house, and vacant by the death of the late vicar.

---

Lord Cranbrook has presented the Rev. R. B. P. Wells, Vicar of Cartmel, Lancashire, to the living of Benenden, Kent, which became vacant by the death of the late vicar, and the net stipend is about £230 a year with house. The interesting church at Benenden was thoroughly restored by the late Lord Cranbrook about half a century ago, shortly after he had purchased the Hemsted Park estate.

---

The Bishop of Durham has presented the Rev. C. E. Adamson, Vicar of South Westoe, South Shields, to the valuable rectory of Houghton-le-Spring, which is of the net value of about £1,100 a year, with an excellent house, and vacant by the death of the late incumbent.

---

The Peache Trustees have presented the Rev. F. T. Snow, who has been vicar of Bordesley, Birmingham, during the last seven years, to the living of Broadway, Worcestershire. Mr. Snow has done much good work at Bordesley during his incumbency, and has succeeded in carrying out many improvements. The church was built in 1340, and restored twenty years ago. The old cruciform church, now disused, has an interesting interior and many monuments, besides a very ancient round font. But Broadway is best known, not for its churches, but for its famous inn, the "Lygon Arms."

---

The death of Canon Hervey has placed a stall in Norwich Cathedral at the disposal of the Lord Chancellor. The stipend is £800 a year, with an excellent prebendal house. No cathedral has ever undergone such rapid changes in the clerical staff as has Norwich during the last eighteen months. Bishop Sheepshanks has been replaced by Bishop Pollock, and Dean Lefroy by Dean Russell Wakefield, Archdeacon Westcott has succeeded Archdeacon Crosse in his residentiary stall, and Archdeacon Perowne in the Archdeaconry of Norwich. Dr. Johns (Master of St. Catherine's College, Cambridge), has replaced Dr. Robinson, who had held his stall for forty-eight years. Now a third canonry has been vacated by the death of Canon Hervey.

---

Canon Hervey's death also creates a vacancy among the King's Chaplains in Ordinary. He was originally appointed to the office by Queen Victoria in 1882, and he was domestic chaplain to King Edward for nearly thirty years.

---

Canon Hervey was a son of Lord Alfred Hervey, M.P., and a grandson of the first Marquis of Bristol. He commenced his clerical career in 1869 as Curate of Putney, and in 1876 he was presented by the late Lord Iddesleigh (Sir Stafford Northcote) to the rectory of Upton Pyne, near Exeter. Two years later the rectory of Sandringham became vacant by the death of Mr. Onslow, and for many reasons it was a very difficult benefice to fill up. More than one divine was "sounded" as to whether he would accept the living, and ultimately Mr. Hervey was appointed by the late King.

---

The Rector, who was a broad-minded High Churchman, became the unofficial representative of King Edward at Sandringham, and he exercised a salutary supervision over the cottagers and employees on the Royal estate, by whom he was greatly esteemed, while useful schemes and desirable improvements were suggested by him and carried out under his superintendence. He held the office of librarian at Sandringham Hall. Some years ago his health seriously failed, and in 1907 he resigned his living and took up his residence at Norwich. He had been appointed to a stall in the Cathedral by Lord Chancellor Halsbury in 1889. Canon Hervey was a good scholar, an accomplished musician, and an interesting and practical preacher. Genial in manner, and gifted with considerable conversational powers, he was a general favourite in the circles of society in which he mixed.

---

An evening paper announced last week that the death of Canon Benham "has vacated a canonry in Canterbury Cathedral," which is incorrect. Canon Benham merely held an unendowed prebendal stall. The six residentiary stalls at Canterbury were formerly worth £1,000 a year each (with excellent house and garden), but agricultural depression has reduced the income of the Chapter, and the stipend of a canon is now £800, while the dean is cut down from £2,000 to £1,600. Four of the stalls are in the gift of the Crown, and the Archbishop appoints to the others.

The Rev. Hay Sweet Escott, who died last week at the age of ninety-four, belonged to a family well known in Somersetshire, and his father held the rectory of Brompton Ralph, near Taunton, along with a prebendal stall in Wells Cathedral for many years. He became widely known as the very able headmaster of the Somersetshire College, Bath, a post which he held from 1858 until 1873, when he was presented to the Rectory of South Luffenham, Rutland, which he left in 1877 to become Rector of Kilve, Somersetshire. The living at South Luffenham is in the gift of Balliol College, and Mr. Escott was mainly indebted for his preferment to the influence of his friend Dr. Jowett.

A few weeks ago reference was made in TRUTH to some correspondence in a local paper arising out of the refusal of the rectors of Market Bosworth and Cadeby to fulfil engagements they had made to do temporary duty for their neighbour, the vicar of Sutton Cheney. The Daily Chronicle published on Saturday some highly edifying particulars of a little difference of opinion that has arisen between the last-mentioned vicar, the Rev. C. Hudson, and his diocesan, the Bishop of Peterborough. From this I should infer that the two neighbouring rectors had other reasons for their attitude towards Mr. Hudson than appeared in the correspondence to which I referred.

It would seem that Mr. Hudson, having been deserted by his wife for some five years, considers himself free to fill up her place, and that he has accordingly "married" another lady, "in the presence of three witnesses, after the Scottish manner." He justifies this course on various grounds—philosophical rather than canonical—and he even seems to be under the impression that he has legal authority for regarding his first marriage as null and void, in the shape of a suggestion made by Mr. Justice Bargrave Deane to the Divorce Commission. The Bishop of Peterborough, taking a narrower and more pedantic view of the situation, has inhibited the vicar from officiating further, pending a decision upon charges of immorality that have been preferred against him by his neighbour, the rector of Bosworth. In return, the vicar denies the bishop's right to do anything of the sort, and breathes defiance at his lordship, politely but firmly. I fear that the martyr's crown awaits Mr. Hudson, and it is to be hoped that the lady whom he has persuaded to share it with him understands the precise consequences of her marriage before three witnesses after the Scotch manner. The Scotch form of marriage may have its advantages, but, unfortunately, they do not extend to the case where the bridegroom has another wife living.

Some interesting particulars of the usefulness of the new Labour Exchanges have been published in the Sheffield Independent. At the Sheffield Exchange in June the official figures were:—Vacancies, notified, 1,050; vacancies filled, 925; total on register, 1,273. These figures prove that the Exchange is as much a boon to the employer as to the employee, and this fact is further vouched for by the popularity the Exchange has attained with the skilled trade unions. Another point of interest in this connection is the posting amongst the vacancies of a situation as bridge-inspector for abroad at a salary of £300 to £400 a year. It seems curious that a berth like this should be going begging, but the mere fact that an employer goes to the Labour Exchange to fill it is a significant tribute to the work which is being done by it in bringing master and man together.

An excellent movement has been got under way in Scotland to establish labour homes and workshops for destitute ex-sailors, ex-soldiers, and reservists. The institution will provide the men with the sort of unskilled work that is generally undertaken in labour homes, and will also give them opportunity of instruction in more skilled work, where they are suitable for it, besides endeavouring to assist and "elevate" them in other ways. The scheme has the approval of the Army Council and a great many well-known Scotsmen, and a handsome instalment of the £6,000 required to start the first workshop has already been subscribed. Those who sympathise with the undertaking should send their contributions to the Commercial Bank of Scotland, George Street, Edinburgh, or to Capt. C. L. Addison Smith, the hon. secretary and treasurer (Scottish Naval and Military Veterans' Residence and Labour Workshops), 19, Heriot Road, Edinburgh. There seems room for something of the same kind in London and other parts of England.

---

There are classes of circulars which call for the attention of the Legislature much more loudly than the moneylenders'—those, namely, where the business advertised is fraudulent, illegal, or immoral. It is a scandal that the agency of the General Post Office should be used for furthering any business of this character, and the scandal is now aggravated by the fact that a Joint Committee of the two Houses of Parliament has considered the subject, at considerable labour and expense, and that its recommendations have been cast aside and apparently lost sight of by the Government. There is the less excuse for this because the United States and other countries have shown us exactly how the evil can be remedied; and, moreover, a Bill dealing with the recommendations of the Joint Committee comes within the category of non-contentious legislation, which can always be passed without much difficulty.

I have received the following contributions to the Tress Barry Fund:—The Hon. and Rev. E. V. R. Powys, £5 5s.; Sir George Lewis, £3; J. R. A., £1 1s.; M. W., 5s.

I have also received the following amounts for Lady St. Helier's Children's Holiday Fund:—W. J. Baily, 10s.; M. T. H., 3s.; A. M. H., 10s.; T. P., £2; the Hon. and Rev. E. V. R. Powys, £5 5s.; Major-General Sir Alfred Turner, £1 1s.

SCRUBB & Co., Ltd., caution the public against the many injurious imitations of SCRUBB'S AMMONIA that are being offered, and draw attention to their having affixed the signature of SCRUBB & Co. to each bottle, without which none is genuine.

Colonel Wing, who has been employed at Aldershot during the last three years, goes in October to the War Office as one of the Assistant Adjutant-Generals, replacing Colonel H. F. Mercer, who is to be appointed to the command of a brigade.

The raising of the rates of officers' pay in the Indian Army is having an effect which might easily have been foreseen. Junior officers of British regiments are said to be tumbling over one another in their eagerness to transfer to the Indian service. It is true this tendency is not altogether new. An officer told me the other day that every subaltern who had joined his battalion during the last two or three years had registered for transfer to the Indian Army as soon as he had passed the prescribed qualifications. The reason for this is, of course, purely financial; but the new scale of pay has increased the attractive form of the Indian service, and the consequent withdrawal of officers from British regiments has become a serious difficulty. The only effectual remedy is to raise the British rates of pay. To have two military services side by side in the same country with different scales of pay was always an anomaly.

---

Why, by the way, should district officers of Artillery and coast battalion officers of the Engineers receive preferential treatment as regards retired pay over other officers who have risen from the ranks? At the age of fifty-five a district major R.A. or coast battalion major R.E. can retire under Article 526 of the Royal Warrant on £300 a year; while a riding or quartermaster of the same rank and age can never obtain more than £200 a year. I do not grudge retired Artillery and Engineer officers their £300 a year, but riding and quartermasters are just as much entitled to it as they are.

---

I continue to receive strong remarks about Colonel Babtie's appointment as Deputy-Director-General Army Medical Service. After the resentment of the R.A.M.C. at Sir Alfred Keogh's abnormal promotion, the Army Council were afraid to promote Colonel Babtie to be surgeon-general lest there should be an uproar among the colonels. So he was given temporary rank to qualify him for his appointment. But this subterfuge did not remove the injustice done to the superseded colonels, for the Treasury would not allow the Army Council to fill the vacancy for a substantive surgeon-general, and the corps has thus been deprived of a coveted step of promotion.

No one has any personal objection to Colonel Babtie, who is as good a man as any of his comrades; but there was no call to over-ride the Royal Warrant and dislocate promotion prospects in the R.A.M.C. by appointing a comparatively junior colonel to an office which could have been perfectly well filled by any of the surgeon-generals or colonels whom Colonel Babtie superseded. In the days of a commander-in-chief the temporary rank of general was very sparingly conferred on colonels under Article 39 of the Royal Warrant, and only in time of war or special emergency. These conditions were non-existent in Colonel Babtie's case, and it has been left to the Army Council to set the Royal Warrant at defiance and prostitute the high rank of general in order to cover a flagitious War Office job.

A correspondent has called my attention to the number of artillery warrant officers and staff sergeants who are qualified for higher promotion, but are unable to obtain it owing to their reaching the age limit of forty before they can be considered for commissioned rank. He proposes as a remedy the drastic step of compulsorily retiring all district officers, riding masters, and quartermasters as soon as they are pensionable, instead of allowing them to serve till they have reached the retiring age limit, which is fifty-five. My correspondent says his remedy is "simple," and so it is; but where conflicting interests are concerned simplicity and expediency do not always run smoothly in double harness. A "steady flow of promotion" is a good thing for those in the stream, but in fixing conditions of service regard must be had to efficiency, and the proposed remedy would get rid of many men at a time when their experience is of most value to the State. The age limit of fifty-five for "ranker" officers has been very carefully considered by many committees, and I doubt the expediency of altering it.

Lower down the ladder there is more to be said for my correspondent's further proposal to discharge all warrant officers after five years' service as such when they have qualified for pension, and all staff sergeants after twenty-one years' service without the option of continuance. This would give picked non-commissioned officers the chance of getting their warrant early enough to bring them on the list of candidates for commissions. Every warrant officer and staff sergeant who keeps his front seat in the coach after he is pensionable prevents another from leaving the back seat. Owing to the large use made by commanding officers of the permissive power which Section 85 of the Army Act gives to continue men in the service after completing their twenty-one years' engagement, many promising N.C. officers are annually lost to the Army just when their services are at their best.

---

The subject discussed in the two foregoing paragraphs is a knotty one, as my correspondent would find if he were called on to consider it in committee from the point of view of general policy and actuarial evidence. I can only assure him and others who write to me that I am in favour of as many non-coms. as possible passing through the commissioned ranks, which require to be more decidedly flavoured with democratic sauce.

---

The Territorial Army had an experience last week of the value of the favour of the cheap London press. Little more than a year ago the Territorial was boomed for all he was worth—and probably something more. Newspaper offices were turned into recruiting depots. Mr. Haldane and Lord Esher were even derided for condescending to use the press as an aid to the creation of an army. They might with more justice have been derided for leaning upon such a rotten reed. With the arrival of the next silly season, the same journals are off on the opposite tack and openly asking, "Is the Territorial Army a failure?" "Can the Territorials resist an invasion?" and such-like sagacious conundrums.

The luckless Territorial who found himself patted on the back as an hero when he rushed to enlist in the spring of 1909 may well ask why, after all his labours and sacrifices, he has become an object of suspicion and contempt to his quondam admirers in the summer of 1910? Did they seriously think that he would be turned into a master of the art of war by a few weeks' drills and a week or two in camp? Do they seriously think that any army, conscript or volunteer, can be fashioned into an efficient fighting machine, ready to face highly trained troops, in the course of twelve or fifteen months? Are they capable of seriously thinking anything at all? It is very doubtful.

The German Government may certainly be congratulated upon the wonderful bargain which the Admiralty authorities at Berlin have concluded with Turkey. Two battleships have been sold to the Turkish Government for £900,000, which vessels have been in service for seventeen years, and twelve months hence they would have been replaced, and sold out of the Navy for whatever they would fetch. It is a most mysterious transaction, unless one is to regard the Turkish authorities as being perfectly insane. Our own Admiralty recently "weeded" two battleships of later date than the German vessels for £53,000. Why were they not offered to Turkey?

The Repulse is noted for transfer to the non-effective list next year. She will be followed by all the "Royal Sovereigns," save the Revenge and the Hood, as ships of the "Majestic" class pay off from the Third Home Fleet. The Turkish Government might bear this in mind. Germany's action, if it does nothing else, should furnish our Admiralty with a reason for waiving the traditional restriction imposed at dockyard sales, that warships are to be broken up in the United Kingdom within a specified time.

---

The writer who in last week's TRUTH claimed for Sir William Luard the title of "Father of the Fleet" was at fault in forgetting that gallant officer's death a few weeks ago, and the editor who read and passed the paragraph deserves no mercy, and does not expect it. But as regards the original question of Sir William Dowell's seniority in the Navy List, I may point out to various critical correspondents that Sir John Dalrymple Hay's name still appears in the last edition of that publication, and I have not heard that this gallant officer is not still with us. Sir John entered the service in January, 1835—four years before Sir William Dowell.

---

Captain Heneage, who is commissioning the Naiad on the 23rd inst., was specially promoted for gallant service with the Naval Brigade at the defence of Ladysmith. Both Sir George White and Sir Hedworth Lambton mentioned him in despatches. Captain Heneage received the M.V.O. whilst in command of the cruiser Spartan, acting as escort to Queen Alexandra during her visit to Norway and Denmark six years ago.

In view of the serious shortage in the establishment of the naval medical branch, which has been frequently noticed in TRUTH of late, the suggestion that a reserve should be formed amongst doctors in the mercantile marine is opportune. The idea is so feasible that there is no necessity to discuss the lines on which it might materialise. If the Admiralty cannot see their way to maintain the regular branch at the strength which they themselves have laid down, they might at least make provision for supplying the deficiency in war time.

The coroner's jury which has been inquiring into the explosion on H.M.S. Sutlej have found that Engineer-Commander Lecky was "guilty of neglect, but not culpable." This verdict rests upon the evidence that corroded boiler tubes were concealed by oxide, which should have been discovered and removed. The Sutlej had just undergone her survey and refit, and was only completed in time for the manœuvres, early in which the disaster occurred. If the chief engineer of the ship is "guilty of neglect," what about the dockyard people? Why did not they discover these boiler defects? I am told that the Sutlej scraped through her refit trials with some difficulty. It is, of course, the traditional practice to hang somebody after a disaster of this character; but I have no doubt that Engineer-Commander Lecky hit the right nail on the head when he laid the whole blame on official parsimony. The truth is that under the present system of Admiralty administration dockyard estimates are revised and pared down until safety is apt to be lost sight of.

I am glad to learn that the condition of affairs revealed during the series of courts-martial held in the Leander is attracting official attention. An Admiralty inquiry is in progress "with reference to the system of keeping accounts in depot ships of torpedo-boat destroyer flotillas." The authorities admit the existence of "anomalies and difficulties." The chief of these, as revealed at the courts-martial, is the lack of anything like adequate supervision by accountant officers, and the wholly disproportionate responsibilities with which the writer class are saddled. I may add, however, that it is the system rather than the paymasters which seems at fault.

---

The new mechanician warrants on confirmation are to begin at the same scale of pay as a carpenter or boatswain reaches after some ten years' service in corresponding rank. This is by no means fair. The mechanician is a stoker who has undergone a comparatively elementary course in practical mechanics. On the other hand, the carpenter and the boatswain have to attain an altogether higher standard of technical qualification. Furthermore, the necessity for the mechanician, as I have pointed out before, is more than doubtful, having regard to the unquestionable efficiency and sufficiency of the artificer class. It is certainly unfortunate that the Admiralty cannot create the new class without giving such legitimate cause for discontent to the old

---

The agitation regarding the inefficiency of the coastguard service in watching the coast in times of storm has produced a definite result. The Board of Trade, in conjunction with the Admiralty, has decided to establish a chain of "rough-weather watch huts" on the headlands and danger spots of the southern, eastern, and north-eastern coasts of England. The huts are to be manned by the coastguard and connected by telephone with the nearest coastguard station and Board of Trade life-saving apparatus depots. This is an urgently needed reform, but as the agitation arose out of a wreck off the North Devon coast, it is not evident why that part of England is apparently excluded from the scheme.

With a view to putting an end to the sectarian disturbances which have proved so costly a luxury to Liverpool ratepayers, an effort has been made to secure the voluntary suspension of all religious processions for twelve months. The Roman Catholics have agreed to do so, and the Orange leader is anxious that his party shall do the same thing, but not so the wise Mr. Wise. He holds up his hands in amazement at the mere suggestion of such a thing. He is willing to do anything in his power in the interests of peace but stop the one thing which has led to all the trouble. Of course, one is able to appreciate the difficulties in Mr. Wise's way. It is a difficulty in which every professional agitator who has been faced with the necessity of abandoning his biggest means of advertising will feel the deepest sympathy with the Protestant champion. He has to lose his advertisement or to definitely take up the position of caring nothing for the welfare, moral and financial, of the city of his adoption.

An interesting point as to the responsibility for the education of children in charity establishments has been raised in the Kent County Council. Recently the governors of a home for boys at Horton Kirby, Kent, applied to the County Education Committee to provide for the education of the 270 children in the home. The Education Committee objected, as the children had come from all parts of the United Kingdom. The Board of Education informed the committee that they had no option but to accede to the request. The County Council decided, however, to resist the application, although their clerk was of opinion that legally they had not a leg to stand on. At present most homes and orphanages provide their own educational staff, but if it is decided that the responsibility for providing education rests upon the local authority, it is very certain that it will not be long before a good many charities take advantage of the decision. This will be manifestly unfair to the ratepayers of the counties which from climatic and other reasons are especially popular with the governors of charities for their institutions.

SPRETAE INURIA FORMAE.

(Picked up at Folkestone Beauty Show last week.)

They stood in beauty side by side,
All in the summer sun;
Each face in turn the judges eyed—
I'm glad I wasn't one.

For such a wealth of looks were there
That, ere they'd long begun,
The judges half-distracted were—
I'm glad I wasn't one.

They went, those judges, ten times round
The ring before they'd done,
And had the winning faces found.
I'm glad I wasn't one.

Anon a girl confronted me,
And smiles her face wore none.
"Pray, sir, were you a judge?" scowled she.
"No, ma'am; I wasn't one."

But girls have got a hasty way;
I deemed it wise to run;
Since, like as not, if I should stay,
The judges' score she'd make me pay,
Although I wasn't one.

A correspondent demurs to my remark that, "according to my experience, the motive of the bogus libel action in the majority of cases is neither blackmail nor a speculative hope of recovering a useful sum in damages without incurring any risk." His experience of such actions is that they are brought by unscrupulous solicitors or unscrupulous clients, or both, in the hope that some money payment will be offered to save the trouble and cost of defending an action. I did not mean to express any doubt that this is so in many cases, and one must not generalise too widely from individual experience. But I cannot help thinking, not only from the experience of Truth Office, but from what I see and hear of bogus actions against newspapers in general, that in the majority of cases the motive is to silence criticism for a few months—which often means twelve or more.

But, however numerous blackmailing actions may be, I would point out to those who complain of them that the fault must be to some extent on their own side. Every man who submits to pay blackmail rather than fight exposes himself to a repetition of the attempt. And if a man, or a firm, is in a position which obviously makes them a target for blackmailing actions at law, to refuse to fight because it is expensive must clearly be a disastrous, not to say suicidal, policy.

There is no difference between actions for libel and other classes of actions in this respect. If a railway company made it a rule to pay up without fighting whenever a claim for compensation for personal injury was made against it, that company would soon cease to pay dividends to its shareholders. What case would railway companies have under such circumstances if they asked for an amendment of the law in order to protect them against blackmailers? A railway company makes it a rule to contest every claim in which it has any good ground of defence, not because it loves litigation, but because it knows that this course is the cheapest in the long run—in fact, the only business-like course. I may say that Truth has always acted on the same principle, and I attribute it to that fact that I am able to say to-day that mere blackmailing actions are rare in my experience. When it is known that you cannot be blackmailed, blackmailers never trouble you. I have no sympathy with anybody who allows himself to be blackmailed merely because he considers this the cheapest course—and least of all if he is a newspaper proprietor, because he encourages blackmailers to practise not only on him but on others.

The campaign against Sunday traders undertaken by the Yarmouth Watch Committee has been brief and inglorious. The General Purposes Committee of the Yarmouth Corporation have requested the Watch Committee to discontinue the prosecutions, and the Watch Committee have decided to comply. Evidently the anomalous position in which the Corporation placed itself by instituting prosecutions for Sabbath breaking while carrying on its municipal enterprise for profit has been made clear to the earnest Sabbatarians on the Council, whose delicate sensibilities had been shocked by the sale of picture postcards and sweets to Sunday trippers.

An action was brought in the Manchester County Court last week by a man named Anderton against one Charles Stone, who carries on business under the name of the Manchester Legal Aid Society. Anderton had paid 3d. as a yearly subscription to the society, and being threatened with a county court summons for a debt, he went to the society for advice, having previously borrowed £100 from his father-in-law, whom he wished to secure from loss. The society advised him to give his father-in-law a bill of sale on his furniture, and a document was drawn up for which he was charged 5s. Later on the creditor who had threatened him obtained judgment and issued an execution. When the bailiffs arrived Anderton produced the reputed bill of sale, but it proved to be invalid, and in order to prevent his furniture being taken away he had to sell his business, which had cost him £200, for £29. Then he brought an action against the Legal Aid Society for damages. All that he was legally entitled to recover was 5s. 3d., and Judge Parry gave him that amount and costs, while ordering the documents to be impounded and sent to the Manchester Law Society. The case supplies yet another instance of the danger of entrusting legal business to the lay lawyers of legal aid societies. The 3d. subscription may prove to be far more expensive than at first sight it appears to be.

The disinclination of some country benches to convict in cases of cruelty to children was exemplified last week both at Truro and Rotherham. At Truro a man and a woman were charged with neglecting the illegitimate child of the latter. The man had deserted one woman for her sister. He left the first sister, to whom he was not married, without subsistence either for herself and her children, and took the second with her baby to an empty house, where the child was laid on an improvised bed of dirty clothing and not provided with proper food. The magistrates dismissed the charge, and from remarks made by the mayor I gather that their worships were so anxious to make it clear that the court was not a court of morality that they totally overlooked the fact that the defendants had pleaded guilty to the charge of neglect.

At Rotherham the wife of a labourer, an idle drunken woman, was charged with neglecting her four children. They were ill-nourished and dirty, and the house nearly empty of furniture. It appeared that the case had been under the observation of an officer of the N.S.P.C.C. since August 6, 1909, and that repeated warnings had been given to the woman without producing any result. Nevertheless the Bench determined to give her another chance, and adjourned the case for a month to see if there was any amendment. One would have thought that the twelve months' opportunity already afforded would have been ample, and such magisterial ignoring of the work of the N.S.P.C.C. does not tend to make the preventive work of the society any easier.

An atrocious case of cruelty to a dog came before the Kingston Bench last week. The animal was beaten to death with an ash stick, its back being a mass of clotted blood, while both the jaw and skull were fractured. The chairman of the magistrates said that but for the previous good character of the man guilty of the brutality the Bench would have considered whether they ought not to have sent him to prison without the option of a fine. As it was, they fined him £3 and costs. What previous good character has to do with an offence of this nature I fail to understand. The man was convicted of an act of the grossest brutality conceivable, and had well earned imprisonment.

A correspondent draws my attention to what he rightly calls a monstrous piece of injustice. The victim is a labourer, now in Cambridge gaol awaiting his trial at Quarter Sessions on a charge of attempted suicide. He had taken off his coat and waistcoat and laid himself down, with his face upwards, in a ditch in which there was about a foot of mud and water. The men who witnessed these proceedings pulled him out and fetched a policeman, who locked him up and brought him before the magistrates at St. Ives, who in due course committed him for trial. As a matter of fact, the man was an epileptic, and there can be little doubt that as he had been working hard at haymaking all day in a hot sun he had been the victim of an epileptic seizure. I do not suppose that the policeman who arrested him could be expected to know that the right course to have adopted would have been to put his prisoner to bed and call in a doctor, but the magistrates might have been expected to have had more sense.

My attention has been called to a recent issue of the North Devon Journal containing a letter from Mr. William Taverner on the subject of his egregious "National Old-Age Pension Trust." Among other things he characterises the statement of an opponent that "leading and financial newspapers" have entertained grave doubts about his scheme as "wholly untrue," adding:—

> Apart from the Daily News, I do not know a single leading newspaper either in London or the provinces that has either criticised the scheme or in any way opposed it.

This is a good example of the Taverner controversial method. His scheme has been ruthlessly criticised and opposed in TRUTH, the Financial News, and the Morning Leader, as well as in the Daily News. None of these may be in his opinion "leading" newspapers—the term is indefinable and pointless—but some of them are certainly "financial;" and as regards TRUTH, Taverner has found its criticism of sufficient importance to call for his notice on a great many occasions. On the other hand, he could not produce a newspaper of any standing that has ever said a good word for him. Yet he has the temerity to give the lie point blank to a critic who observes that "leading and financial papers" have their doubts about his scheme.

If people would take the trouble to study the history of Taverner's Trust and of his own adventures in connection with it during the last seven years, they would know what value to attach to anything that he says or writes. Again and again he has shown himself quite unfit for such a position as that which he has assumed, the witnesses against him being, not newspapers, but distinguished and respected Nonconformists, and one of his Majesty's Judges, who, after hearing Taverner's evidence on oath, pronounced him a person not worthy of credit. Perhaps the most amazing thing about his scheme is that it should still find supporters and subscribers after the Government Old-Age Pensions Act has removed its chief raison d'être.

In the People's Guardian, the monthly organ of the Guardian Bank, Limited (Ireland), for June last there appeared a quotation from TRUTH, which read apart from its context gives an altogether misleading impression of criticisms of this venture which had appeared in these columns. The Guardian Bank claims to be considered a "beneficent national enterprise" carried on by directors who are "actuated by the true nationalist spirit," and with the object of obtaining the deposits of Irish savings, points out that the £11,000,000 deposited in the Post Office Savings Bank is sent out of the country and is not available for investment in Irish industry. I remarked in regard to these claims that "the Guardian Bank offers very much more attractive terms than the Savings Bank, including higher interest," supplementing the statement with very good reasons why depositors could not expect equal security for their deposits. The People's Guardian published the passage quoted without any of the accompanying qualifications, which is to my mind misleading and unjustifiable.

Meanwhile what I have heard of the founders and promoters of this nationalistic enterprise does not in the least incline me to revise my opinion that thrifty Irishmen will be well advised to entrust their savings to the Post Office rather than to the Guardian Bank. To the composition of the directorate I have already referred. Mr. Sanderson, the founder, is described as an "insurance manager," and I should be interested to learn what insurance office he managed, since so far as I can ascertain he has not achieved that distinction in the insurance world which one might expect in the founder of a bank. His fellow-director, Mr. J. H. Cousins, described as "journalist," may lay some claim to the title no doubt by reason of his contributions to the People's Guardian, but he was until recently an assistant master at the High School, Dublin, where he taught shorthand, typing, book-keeping, and English composition. Knowledge of these very useful subjects is hardly, however, sufficient qualification for a bank directorship. The secretary, Mr. Edward Morgan, has undoubtedly had some banking experience, since he was for a period of fifteen years in the service of the Bank of Ireland, a position which he lost involuntarily. An ex-bank clerk, an assistant schoolmaster, and an unknown insurance manager, even with the capital of £2,500, which Mr. Sanderson informed me a month or two ago had been paid up, would not to my mind offer an ideal security. I should much prefer the Post Office.

Though my old friend Tanquerey of the Société Artistique de Portraits is long ago dead and buried, his spirit is still moving abroad on the face of the earth. His offers of free portraits, couched in mellifluous Spanish, are now being distributed to the inhabitants of Ecuador. It is no longer an enlargement which he offers, but a miniature absolutamente por nada, to those who take advantage of his special offer and return him their photograph, together with the coupon he sends, within ninety days to 25, Rue de Hambourg, Paris. Evidently his prevailing passion during life, to supply the whole world with picture frames, large or small, will not allow him to rest in his grave.

Printed postcards from a firm calling itself the Nasir Watch Company, Sudder Bazar, Meerut, are being widely distributed in army canteens in India. These postcards bear the statement that the Nasir Watch Company have "imported a big lot of the celebrated Acme lever watches from Mr. H. Samuel, of Manchester," and they offer them to purchasers, with a chain, for 12 rupees net cash. I trust no Tommy will be misled into believing that he can obtain one of Mr. Samuel's watches from the Nasir Watch Company at a lower price than he could get it direct from the firm. I have Mr. Samuel's authority for stating that he has on no occasion sold his "Acme" or any other watches to the Nasir people, and the statement that they have imported a big lot from him is evidently made with intent to deceive purchasers.

The latest addition to the ranks of the home-employment harpies is a German who occupies a little office at 2, Gray's Inn Road, London, E.C., and calls himself the Incandescent Supply Syndicate. The circular which he sends to persons who reply to his advertisements states that he is prepared to teach free of cost the making of incandescent gas mantles, a trade by which the employee, it is stated, can add from £1 to £3 a week to his income. The outfit required for the purpose costs, however, £2 0s. 6d., and when the mantles are delivered the "syndicate" finds fault with them until the employee gets tired of sending more money for further supplies of materials. At least, that is the experience of one of the syndicate's victims, for after the expenditure of £3 and a great deal of time and labour he finds that he has only received 8s. for his work.

"Zedex" is the latest nostrum in regard to which I have received an inquiry. I know nothing more of it than what is to be found about it in the circular devoted to extolling its virtues. From this I learn that it is manufactured by the Zedex Co., Hove, Sussex, and that Dr. Griffiths states it to be "the acme of medical science, the only natural food for the Brain, Nerves, Muscles, Tissues, Sinews, and Blood—not a dangerous stimulant, for it produces real, lasting benefit." This testimonial is quite sufficient to prevent me taking "Zedex" myself or advising any one else to do so. I know its value, and any one else may place himself in the same position by referring to Truth Cautionary List, paragraph 637.

---

By the post office regulations no person is allowed to have letters delivered to him in an assumed name, though I presume that this is a regulation which found its way a good many years ago to the dead-letter office. If it were unearthed, however, it could not be more usefully applied than to the turf tipster. There is Fred Daisie, for instance, who advertises so largely in the sporting press. He usually gives as an address for letters and wires the post office of some town where a race meeting is being held. Again, there is J. H. Tristan, who also makes use of the post restante for his correspondence. Now, I believe that the same hat covers the head of both Mr. Daisie and Mr. Tristan, and that in private life the wearer of the hat answers to the name of Thompson.

---

Some one has sent me a letter addressed by Mr. W. H. Collingwood, advertising agent, of 18, Hogarth-road, Earl's Court, to a contemporary, who had refused the advertisement of the National Home Employment Association, Hounslow. Mr. Collingwood states that his clients' business is thoroughly genuine, that they court every investigation, and that a leading newspaper representative recently visited their establishment, and was quite satisfied that all was square and above board, and he extends an invitation to my contemporary to send a representative to investigate. The offer is a pretty safe one, as the newspaper to which it was made is in Liverpool. I notice that Mr. Collingwood has not made any such offer to me, but I will forgive the omission if he will inform me who is the leading newspaper representative who was quite satisfied that the National Home Employment Association's business was all square and above board. An anonymous testimonial is really of very little use, and a leading newspaper representative surely cannot be shy.

Reference has already been made in Truth to a publication called the "International Who's Who," a Yankee production which has now for some time been touting for subscribers in this country. A recent circular issued from 93 and 94, Chancery Lane, is sent to people whose names are on "a revised list of eligibles" with a form for them to fill up giving particulars about themselves and their works. The most interesting point in the circular is the statement that "positively no charge is made for inserting the sketches, but all persons referred to are expected to subscribe in advance for one complete copy of the work." As the cost of a copy is £1 I should call this making a charge of £1 for insertion, and I shall be interested to see how many English eligibles think it worth their while to buy a pound's worth of International notoriety. I need hardly say that this international venture has no connection with Messrs. Black's well-known and useful volume, the names in which appear solely on the merits of those who own them.

The lady who wrote to me from Ireland at the beginning of July to complain of having been swindled through an advertisement which appeared in the Feathered World will be interested to learn that the swindler met with his deserts at Croydon Police Court at the end of last month. So I have no doubt will other poultry buyers, for he had been victimising a good many people through the advertisement columns of the Exchange and Mart and the poultry press. His name was H. H. Marriott, alias H. McQue, and his favourite method of extracting postal orders from his dupes was to offer non-existent turkey poults for sale at remarkably cheap rates. Really if people are so foolish as to send money to utter strangers they deserve to lose it.

The ingenuity and inventive power shown by the moneylending fraternity in calling attention to themselves by post are worthy of a better cause. "Rosslyn Stuart," of Croydon and Brixton, who was referred to in Truth last week as baiting his hook specially for the theatrical profession, has now got out what I believe is called a "tickler" for the general public—a document on blue paper, folded in a way that suggests something "On His Majesty's Service," and marked "Important" above the address. I happened to be one of the thousands favoured with this communication the other day, and as I opened and looked into it before throwing it into the W.P.B., I suppose all the other recipients did the same, which so far serves Mr. "Stuart's" purpose.

Another curiosity in this document is the author's ingenious use of his suburban addresses:—

> Having no expensive West End Office rent to pay, I am in a position to give you the benefit of offering far better terms than others who have not this advantage.

The West End tout, on the other hand, relies on his high office rent as evidence of substance and respectability. Any chaff is good enough to catch the birds on whom these hawks fatten.

A very different type of money-lending business recently brought under my notice is that of T. W. Bennett and Co., late F. Butcher and Co., of 44, Benhill Road, Brunswick Square, Camberwell, S.E., and with half-a-dozen branches in the South and East of London. Bennett and Co. deal with a working-class clientèle, to whom they offer advances of from £2 to £10. Interest at the rate of 4s. in the £1 is deducted at the time of lending, and repayments are at the rate of 1s. a week for each £1 borrowed. This is just a trifle below the normal 60 per cent. which your modern Shylock looks on as his due, and as in the majority of cases security is asked for the business ought to be an exceedingly profitable one. There is no one of the name of Bennett connected with the firm, which consists of Mr. Joseph Smith, of Gilbert House, Knatchbull Road, Camberwell; Mr. William Smith, 436, Queensgate, Burnley; and Arthur Hampden Smith, 20, Wyneham Road, Herne Hill. In this parasitic profession those parasites who attach themselves to the working man and his wife are quite the most contemptible and the most dangerous, and their real names and addresses deserve to be made widely known.

About once a week somebody writes to ask me whether there is no law to protect householders against the epistolary favours of these gentry, and if not, why not? I am tired of answering these conundrums. If a man is carrying on a lawful business how can you possibly forbid him to advertise it by post? All postal circulars are a nuisance, but those who feel aggrieved by it should comfort themselves with the reflection that this form of advertising puts a good many millions per annum into the Postmaster-General's till, and that we all share in the profits.

---

A distressed artist whom I have known under one name or another as a persistent beggar for a good many years has just cropped up again in a new place. This is H. Cottrell (No. 65, Truth Cautionary List). His latest alias is G. Barclay Rowland, and his new address Rue de Bellevue, Triel, Seine et Oise, France. In this name he sent to a lady in Australia some miniatures for which he asked £16. As they were of no interest to her she returned them. Thereupon Rowland sent her a follow-up letter explaining that he is writing on behalf of his father, who is very sick, that they had been in the floods in Paris, and nearly all his miniatures had been destroyed by the water. He represents himself to be with his mother and father stranded in a little French village without friends to appeal to, on the point of starvation, and he begs that £6 will be sent for the miniatures for which he originally asked £16. It is an ingenious letter, and the exploitation of the Paris floods is quite worthy of Cottrell's professional reputation.

---

I hear that one of the collectors of the Metropolitan and Provincial Association (No. 34 Truth Cautionary List) was busy at Cowes during the regatta week. I have not seen a recent balance-sheet of this concern, but it is evident that there has been no alteration in one of the objectionable features of the charity, the method by which the funds are obtained. The bulk of the money has always been obtained by means of collectors who haunt racecourses and seaside resorts, and receive a considerable percentage of the contributions of the public in the shape of commission. The difference between begging in this form and begging directly for personal relief is, to my mind, so slight that I wonder that the police tolerate the one any more than the other.

SCOTLAND FOR EVER!

Oh! come while I harp you a song of the heather,
And hark to me whether
You like it or not!
I sing of the land where I dwell in my fancies,
The home of romances,
According to Scott,
Where laddies get plump on a diet of porridge,
And lasses are fair as the sweet Rose of Torridge,
And every grown Hielandman acts like a canny
Bit mannie.

Go, gaze on the torrent that leaps from the mountains,
Its wild flowing fountains,
The loch that it churns;
What tongue can declare of its marvellous beauty,
In tones purely fluty,
Save Byron's or Bur-r-r-ns?
Go, dream of McTavish and callant McPhairshon,
And think of the times when that excellent pair shone,
Though both of them got chust a wee pit too frisky
With whisky.

Then sail o'er the seas to the grandeurs of Arran;
It's bleak and it's barren,
It's seldom just dry;
But, gods! what a view at the end of the crossing!
Or try, say, a tossing
On sea-foam to Skye.
Then home to your work with redoubtable vigour,
And quite a perceptible increase of figure,
But leaving your heart in the Hielands, my sonny,
And—money!

SCRUTATOR.

WESTERN MEN AND EASTERN MORALS.

THE unpleasant disclosures in last week's TRUTH respecting the manners and customs of our countrymen in the backwoods of Burma have created a painful impression in a good many English households, as was only to be expected. The following letters are merely examples of a great deal of correspondence that I have received on the subject:—

SIR,—I cannot tell you with what horror and alarm I have read this week's TRUTH (p. 150). I am one of those who, as you say, have rejoiced to see a son—in my case an only son—started on a career full of promise in the East, not, indeed, in the service of the company you name, but with another firm which held out highly attractive prospects. Consoled by this thought, I bore the bitter parting, and for three years I have been comforted to hear that he was getting on, and had good hope for the future. Had I known what you tell us now about English life in Burma, no power on earth would have forced me to send him to such a country. He is a good boy, I am sure, and I pray that he may have been delivered from temptation. But should he have fallen under the influence of the examples which he may see around him, how can I ever forgive myself for having sent him to such a life? My poor boy was only just nineteen when he left home.

How can Englishmen, brought up in good homes and in famous schools sink into such iniquity as soon as they find themselves released from the restraint of civilised surroundings! Above all, how can the heads of English firms or directors of companies countenance such licence! These gentlemen, I suppose, profess to be respectable husbands and fathers themselves. Have they no thought for the boys they are tempting to lives of shame in their service? I hope, sir, you will not let this subject drop until all fathers and mothers know what life in the East really means. Then perhaps these companies will find themselves forced to do their duty to their employees.

I shall be glad if you will publish this letter for others to see who must feel as I do. Yours obediently,

AN ENGLISHWOMAN.

A father writes:—

DEAR SIR,—Having one boy in India, and being on the point of sending a second to Burma, I cannot sufficiently thank you for your article on "Western Men and Eastern Morals." It opens my eyes to dangers of which I knew nothing, and which I have no intention of exposing any son of mine to, though it means the loss of a good appointment.

Allow me to say that I do not think any punishment could be too severe for English firms in the East which take young lads into their service knowing what the conditions of life are, and yet leave parents in the dark. I can only suppose that familiarity with Oriental customs has perverted their moral sense. In this view I have been confirmed by a gentleman to whom I was indebted for the offer of this place for my son, and who simply laughed when I referred him to your article and asked if this sort of thing really went on. That a father should expect to know the state of the case before sending a boy abroad to live in concubinage and breed Eurasian bastards before he is well out of his teens seemed to him ridiculously unreasonable.

I only trust that the state of things described in TRUTH does not extend to other neighbouring countries in which so many of us have a close interest. I enclose my card and beg to subscribe myself

A GRATEFUL READER.

I am sorry to say that I cannot encourage the hope expressed in the last paragraph. Almost as soon as the article appeared I was asked why Burma alone was pointed at, when much the same state of things prevailed in many parts of India. My interrogator had been in Assam. Since then I have received the following communication. The writer is a well-known London journalist, who speaks from personal observation of what he describes:—

"I have been waiting for a year to find an editor plucky enough to talk about these matters.

"May I say that the treatment of white men by their companies is identical all over India, and nowhere worse than in the tea planting districts? I know a nice young fellow who went out to Assam four years ago. A year after he arrived his native concubine had a child of which he was the father. The child died, and he put the body of the little thing into a tea chest and buried it in his garden. He used to jest openly at the club about the crops he got off the land afterwards. This boy was nineteen years old, and has a mother and sisters living at home. What would they think of him if they knew?"

"My personal opinion is that such brutality in morals and manners is, in a great measure, the outcome of the system under which young men are sent out to India. A contract is generally made for three years, but the employee never gets his leave before five years are up, and if he does then he is lucky. In fact, the oldest and largest companies usually dismiss their employees after four and a-half years or so, giving as a reason that their services are not suitable—a discovery only made after that time. Thus the company saves the nine months' half-pay due during leave, and the employee has to hang about India until he gets another billet, and signs on for another five years. Therefore, having left home under the impression that he may get back after three years, he actually only gets home after ten. He returns, and probably finds his brothers and sisters grown up and married. Friendly ties are broken; he loafs about through his leave among utter strangers, and goes back feeling lonely and sick at heart. But even then the solace of taking a white companion with him is forbidden. In some companies the assistants who get married, or even engaged, are immediately dismissed; in others, even managers are not allowed to marry.

"Every year advertisements for young men appear in engineering and other papers. These are loaded up with promises. Polo, tennis, sport of every kind is dangled before the youngster's eyes. If he only knew what he is going in for! His pay for the first two years is inadequate to keep him. The motherly company advances the money he wants, and thus has a grip over him for three years. As soon as he has repaid his advances he is liable to instant dismissal at his superiors' whim. I can give one instance of an assistant being dismissed in the height of the season when it would be almost impossible for him to find a billet. Too proud to ask for hospitality from his fellow-planters, he went to live for six months in a native bustee (village) which had been cleared out by cholera. Here an English missionary found him one day, and the superintendent of a big company took him to his bungalow, but after a few weeks the man was dead. The company, his employers, pay an annual dividend of 25 per cent., but could not even spare the £30 to send the poor fellow home. Poor old H—— died in a mud-hut in Calcutta a short while ago, another man who had been summarily dismissed and left stranded.

"In one of the companies on arrival the young planter is handed a formula signed by the superintendent. In this he is told that, whilst not wishing to interfere with his private mode of living, any young man who interferes with a woman employed on the estate makes himself liable to instant and summary dismissal. In plain English: 'You are quite at liberty to take a native woman as a concubine, but not from our labour force.' The man who signs this formula has a European wife and three children! The young man soon finds out from his older fellow-planters that he is not likely to see home again for five or six years. Add to this that he has to learn the language, that he leads a lonely life, as his financial position does not allow him much recreation, that his employers look with a benevolent eye at his domestic arrangements, and what wonder if he soon finds himself harbouring a native woman under his bungalow roof? In numerous cases it is his manager who selects a girl for him, or even sends him his own woman if he himself happens to want a change, or to get married, or to go on leave. It is not only the furniture that changes hands easily in an Assam bungalow. In a few years of this life, in a sweltering climate, surrounded by a people of lax morals, the young man soon completely loses sight of what he is actually doing. The standard of ordinary morality disappears.

"If parents would only insist on seeing that a clause is inserted in every contract entitling their sons to six months' leave after three years this sort of thing would be much less likely to happen. Again, if companies came to the conclusion that a married man is not a nuisance, but has more influence with the labour force than a bachelor, these yearly shipments of raw boys would not be necessary.

"I understand that during the last year dismissals have not been so frequent, but then tea was especially prosperous. One of the big companies is guarding itself against a bad year. It goes on sending out youngsters to its estates, so that the assistants have been almost trebled. The idea is not bad. As long as trade is good the company can avail themselves of the experience of their elder assistants. As soon as it falls off out go all the elder and better paid men, and the cheap youngsters remain. Thus the market in human flesh is kept at its low level.

"If parents only knew!"

I hope that after this a good many parents will know, and that the knowledge will spread. As I said last week, it is no news that European exiles in Oriental lands or on the frontiers of civilisation accommodate themselves with remarkable facility to the local standard of morals. This is, I fear, inevitable, and in the ordinary way I should not regard it as a matter worth calling public attention to. It is a subject which may profitably occupy the attention of the clergy, or of those laymen whose taste or religious zeal runs in the direction of purity crusades; but it is not a matter in which a London newspaper has any particular business to concern itself. The case is altogether different, however, when we come to the conditions of life prevailing in great commercial services which annually absorb large numbers of young Englishmen. Here is a matter which immediately concerns thousands of people at home, a matter of grave public interest, on which it is important that the public should be fully informed, on which it ought to form a very definite opinion, and to express it unequivocally. What would be thought if it were suddenly discovered that it was the custom for all ranks of the Army serving in India to keep their native mistresses in their quarters, and to have their half-caste progeny running about the barracks; if the Government connived at and encouraged this state of things; and if we heard such stories about subalterns and recruits as are told about lads going out to Burma and Assam? The India Government would be pretty quickly required to set its house in order. The same thing may be as justly and as strongly required of civilian corporations who for their own purposes are recruiting a constant succession of youngsters from England, and offering them every inducement to immorality and depravity a few weeks after they have left school. The whole business is a horrible scandal. It is only possible because the truth is quite unknown in England, for if it were known the supply of recruits would be quickly cut off until the conditions of life had been entirely reformed. One may hope, therefore, that the publication of the truth will do something towards abating this evil.

ROYAL WARRANTS AS WASTEPAPER.

"A Major Without Chance of Promotion" writes to me as follows apropos of the Archer-Shee case and the general question of promotion in the Army:—

> Would it not be possible to obtain a Parliamentary decision against the Regulations which empower the Army Council to alter, without an officer's consent, the terms of his contract of service? I was looking forward to retiring as a major at forty-eight on £300 a year, but now the Royal Warrant has been altered so that I must serve on till fifty before being entitled to that pension. The probability of my continuing to draw retired pay for a less number of years if I retire at fifty than if I retire at forty-eight has doubtless been considered by the War Office.

I do not quite understand what regulation my correspondent refers to. Probably he is merely supposing that the general power of the Crown to do what it likes with its own servants is embodied somewhere in black and white, instead of being, as it is, a mere survival of a mediæval constitutional doctrine which the Law Courts have never been able to escape from. The only effectual way of obtaining a "Parliamentary decision" on this power is to pass a Bill abolishing it, and giving servants of the Crown rights in regard to their contracts of service similar to those possessed by the rest of the community. This is what I have already endeavoured to impress upon them as the moral of the Archer-Shee case.

In a letter which will be found in another column a Civil Servant points out that there is no distinction in this respect between the Army or the Navy and the Civil Service. He is perfectly right, and here again he is only saying what has been repeatedly urged in TRUTH. We cultivate "continuity of policy" in this office, if we cannot always achieve ideal consistency. It must be quite fifteen years, possibly more, since it was first suggested in these columns that the procedure by way of petition of right should be abolished or remodelled, and that claims of civil, military, and naval servants of the Crown in respect of pay, wrongful dismissal, or other matters arising out of their contract of employment should either be dealt with in the Law Courts as ordinary civil actions or assigned to a special court with special rules of procedure. This suggestion was the outcome of long experience of the grievances of men of all ranks in every department of the public service, including many cases of most flagrant injustice. The reason why the institution of a tribunal ad hoc was suggested was that it is so frequently argued, as it was the other day by Mr. McKenna, that the maintenance of discipline in the Army and Navy is incompatible with the right of soldiers and sailors to resort to a civil court against their employers. Personally, I attach no weight to this argument, and it is certainly one to be regarded with suspicion. But as it is a sort of ad captandum plea which will influence superficial observers, I would meet it by creating a special court, the procedure of which would be so framed as to prevent any consequences prejudicial to discipline. The essential point is that servants of the Crown should be allowed to have some sort of contractual rights against their employers, and that some tribunal altogether independent of the employer should have jurisdiction over alleged breaches of contract. I don't expect that the court would have much to do. The mere existence of such a tribunal would work a revolution in the attitude of Government departments towards their employees.

To go back to the majors, I feel a special solicitude in regard to their grievance, because here again the suggestion that the age limit for retirement should be raised was first put forward in TRUTH. Some three years ago, when we first began to hear about the decreased entries for Sandhurst and the increasing shortage of officers, I pointed out that when boys are not coming in fast enough to keep the ranks full, one obvious remedy is to cease discharging senior men who have still many years of useful work in them. Whether this suggestion helped to inspire the subsequent alteration of the Royal Warrant I have no means of knowing, but the sequence of events makes me feel some sort of moral responsibility for the result. I would, therefore, observe that it never occurred to me that the Government, in order to obtain additional officers, should suddenly lay hands violently on all the majors in the Army, order them to serve for two years beyond the time previously appointed for them in the King's name, and deprive them of two years' enjoyment of retired pay promised to them on the same high authority. It is highly probable that a good many majors would have been very glad to put off the evil day when they are relegated to the ranks of the civilian unemployed on £300 a year. I speak from personal knowledge of many men who have found themselves in this unenviable position. But obviously, if they were to do this for the convenience of the Government, they were entitled to some sort of quid pro quo, and in no case ought they to have been forced to do it against their will. They have not only been forced, but forced without compensation.

Some years ago, owing to the depletion of the Indian drafts under the three years' system of recruiting, the Government found itself under the necessity of checking the exodus of time-expired men from India. It did so by offering a tempting bounty for re-engagement or extension of colour service. It did not suddenly decree that every soldier was to be kept in India for some years beyond the period of his engagement. If it could do this with the majors, why was it not tried with the privates? Because the terms of a private's engagement are fixed by the Army Act. The private has a statutory right to his discharge at a certain date. The officer's right to retire is dependent on a Royal Warrant. The War Office will take no liberties with an Act of Parliament, but it treats a Warrant signed by the King as so much wastepaper. You could hardly find a more convincing demonstration than this of the origin of all the more serious service grievances, and the remedy. I can only repeat that it rests with the members of the services themselves—naval, military, and civil—to obtain this remedy. They are strong enough and numerous enough to secure the statutory protection to which they are entitled by every moral right. All that they need is combination and an intelligent policy. If they are not disposed to act, and act together, it is no use "grousing." This is one of the cases where Providence will only help those who help themselves.

THE BOGUS EXECUTION TRICK.

An interesting exposition of one of the tricks by means of which bargain-hunters are victimised, described in TRUTH Cautionary List, has lately been brought to my notice. The place where it was put into operation was Brighouse, near Halifax, and the result has been that the operators have netted some £250 for a number of pictures of doubtful value. The first step was taken about two months ago, when a shop was taken at 56, Briggate, Brighouse, and stocked with pictures purporting to be by well-known artists, a man named Bell being put in as manager. Amongst the pictures were works bearing the signatures of David Cox, Birkett Foster, Herring, Constable, Cooper, and Frank Goodall, and they were exhibited with prices attached sufficient to instil a belief in their genuineness. Whether any sales were effected at the newly opened gallery I do not know. If so, the business was probably of a trifling description, for there would be obvious dangers in selling over the counter pictures purporting to be by well-known artists which were obvious "fakes." There is a much easier and safer method of unloading such goods on the public, and this the parties who had consigned the pictures to Brighouse proceeded to take.

The shop had been rented in the name of Thomas Johnson, and in June the officer for the Sheriff of Yorkshire received a writ of fi. fa. in an action of James Williams v. Thomas Johnson. The Sheriff's officer executed his writ. Bell, who posed as manager for Johnson, said that the money would not be forthcoming to pay out the execution, and arrangements were made to sell the goods seized on June 30. Before the sale took place, however, a number of representations were made to the Sheriff's officer with a view to inducing him to continue the sale and dispose of the whole of the goods seized if the amount necessary to satisfy the fi. fa. were exceeded. The Sheriff's officer, who appears to have had more than an inkling of the nature of the proceedings, explained to the execution creditor, James Lawrence, that if he did continue the sale he would have to retain the proceeds for three months in order to comply with the Bankruptcy Act, and at the expiration of that period, after deducting the amount requisite to satisfy the fi. fa., hand the balance to Johnson. The possibility of not being able to handle the proceeds of the sale for three months evidently filled the picture dealers with dismay, and at the last moment Bell produced the necessary cash and paid out the Sheriff's officer. Meanwhile, however, catalogues had been prepared and scattered broadcast all over the neighbourhood, while the sale had also been advertised by the Sheriff's officer on his own account. The payment was made only about an hour before the advertised time of sale, nevertheless at the appointed hour a Halifax auctioneer appeared on the scene and proceeded to sell the pictures. Before he commenced, however, the Sheriff's officer entered the sale room and informed the company that the sale was not made by him and that he would not be responsible for anything that any other auctioneer might do. He further called attention to the fact that the catalogues supplied had not been issued by him, and he expressly disclaimed responsibility for anything contained therein. This well-judged action of the Sheriff's officer should have been quite sufficient to put purchasers on their guard, and probably it had that effect upon those who were present at the commencement of the sale. But late arrivals, who did not hear the warning, were in a different position, and the pictures were ultimately disposed of for the sum already mentioned.

The matter did not end here, however. One gentleman who had arrived late at the sale purchased a number of the pictures. One of them was a water-colour signed Birkett Foster, another a seascape signed Clarkson Stansfield, a third a painting of cattle with the signature of T. Sidney Cooper, R.A. This latter picture had a card attached "150 guineas, for sale by private treaty," but when brought out for sale the card was torn up and thrown away. When the sale was over the purchaser had his suspicions aroused as to its genuineness by observing the friendly relationship which appeared to exist between the execution creditor and the debtor, and he accordingly submitted his purchases to an expert, who at once informed him that the pictures were not the work of the artists whose names they bore. He thereupon refused to pay for them, with the result that an action for the price was brought against him in the Halifax County Court. The case was to have been heard on the 12th instant, but a day or two before the hearing the plaintiff discontinued the action.

In order to fully understand the whole business it is necessary to look a little more closely into the relationship between the various parties who were concerned with the sale. These were four in number. Bell, Johnson, Lawrence, and a fourth named E. L. Phillips, who first made his appearance in the sale-room, where he sat at the right hand of the auctioneer and evidently acted as runner-up and buyer-in of the goods to be disposed of. To one of the purchasers of pictures who asked him for his address Mr. Phillips gave it as 6, Rochester House, Brixton Oval. This address had already been given by Bell to an inquirer as that of Thomas Johnson, the ostensible debtor and proprietor of the goods seized. The address of the execution creditor was given as 163A, Strand, London. Now 163A, Strand, bears over the door the name of E. L. Phillips and Co., and is one of those establishments where auctions of pictures are held for the benefit of country cousins who are holiday making in the metropolis. The fact that Phillips is to be found therefore at the addresses both of the debtor and creditor in the action in which the execution was levied, and that he carries on business in precisely the same class of goods as those seized under the execution, is pretty good evidence that the action, the writ of fi. fa., and the execution were purely bogus proceedings, the object being to procure a sale of shoddy goods purporting to be a forced sale or genuine stock-in-trade. Further evidence to the same effect is afforded by the fact that the action Williams v. Johnson had been commenced by Williams personally, and the warrant of execution had also been issued by him, for the parties engaged in a collusive action of the sort would naturally not waste money in paying unnecessary fees to solicitors. The case seems to be clenched by the abandonment of the action to recover payment for pictures purchased at the sale. The trick in this instance failed, to some extent, owing to the action of the Sheriff's officer, who did all in his power to prevent the public having foisted on them a lot of shoddy paintings. But the operators were evidently prepared for all eventualities, and when they discovered that the Sheriff's officer was not prepared to further their scheme they promptly dispensed with his services and obtained another auctioneer to complete the sale. Pictures are not the only goods which are palmed off on unsuspecting purchasers at auctions by means of this trick, and the public cannot be too strongly warned against all such sales of the stock-in-trade of newly established firms, even when they are held by a Sheriff's officer under process of law.

SINCERITY IN SKIRTS.

One of the most frequent charges levelled against women is that of insincerity. They are accused of so playing tricks with the truth that it becomes no better than a drawing-room lap-dog which is trained to die for its country for the base and trivial purpose of procuring in the long run a little piece of cake. There is a certain amount of truth in the charge so far as daily life is concerned. The great facts of existence seldom enter into our relations with more than one or two people. With the rest we have more or less artificial communications which corrupt the bad manners of the natural human and turn them into good.

In social life women are insincere. They would no more dream of telling an unwelcome visitor that they wish she had stayed at home than they would dream of sticking a hat-pin into her. On the contrary, the consciousness of secret inhospitality has before now driven many a hostess into detaining almost by force a visitor who is really anxious to go. This insincerity naturally spreads over the whole of that wide surface of a woman's life which is presented to society. It is, however, not so much a moral failing as the defect of a quality without which women would be far less useful and far less ornamental than they are. That quality is adaptability.

It is one of woman's most necessary qualities. A man who may laugh to see a young girl being brought up to look one thing when she feels another will be seriously annoyed if his wife fails to be in turn the type of woman most pleasing to his chief, his City friends, a Cabinet Minister, a dignitary of the Church, or any other bannister of the particular staircase he wishes to climb. And a man who has risen in the world but whose wife has remained where she was when he married her, failing to adapt herself to changed conditions, will count himself a much-injured being. To be all things to all men is the duty of any woman married to an ambitious man, or any girl who is the daughter of a mother anxious to marry her off. But even so, worldly advancement is not the root of this quality, although it is a very valuable asset in the affairs of the ambitious. It goes deeper than that.

The care of the emotions, no less than that of the kitchen, has always been the woman's business. There are, of course, male chefs of sentiment. All authors worth their salt are cordons bleus in this respect. But feeding and feeling in ordinary households are prepared and tended by women. Consequently it is women who have at once to suffer and to practise the intricate system of caring for the welfare of others, which includes tact, courtesy, and a certain amount of insincerity. When the average wife has trained herself to want no more than she gets, the average husband prides himself on having made her happy. It is comfortable for him, it preserves him from doubt and distress, but it is not done without insincerity. A woman's nature is usually more complex than a man's, and it is her business to see that he does not guess that she has any needs he could not satisfy. He is a simple and direct person himself, and puts down to hysteria or innate foolishness any symptoms in his wife of a dissatisfaction for which he can find no cause whatever. Most wives who love their husbands are insincere with them. They suppress and adapt the truth because they suppress and adapt those parts of themselves which they know it will irritate or pain their husbands to observe.

To take a typical instance of large matters mirrored in small. The other day a hostess asked a guest if she liked China tea, while in the act of pouring out that beverage for her. The guest, knowing that there was no other available, replied that she drank it every day, the truth being, that although she rather disliked it, the doctors had ordered it for her husband. He afterwards reminded her of this reply by way of proving that women were insincere. "That," said he, "is the way in which you manage not to tell the truth." "Not at all," said she, "it is the way in which I manage to tell it."

It is quite true that this is the way in which women manage not to tell the truth; it is equally true that that is the way in which they manage to tell it. It needs some management. If a woman is not to be a dire failure in all social ways, she will have to settle her account with truth privately, and if she is of ordinary integrity she can safely be left to do it herself. She can "to her own self be true" even if some of her external remarks are false, and equally it will follow that she "cannot then be false to any man."

Discretion is frequently the better part of valour in the nervous undertaking of telling the truth. To call a woman insincere because her social remarks occasionally veil an awkward fact is about as just as to accuse her of insincerity because she wears skirts instead of trousers, thereby adapting for general consumption the fact that she has legs. Moral skirts, decently opaque, are demanded of her as inevitably as material ones. If other people are so clumsy as to fall over them, it must be remembered that this catastrophe is quite as annoying to the wearer as to the other person concerned. Moreover, she has the mending to do. If we are to snarl like cats every time we feel snarly it will no doubt be truthful, but it will not make us popular, and it will make other people exceedingly uncomfortable. Women prefer to risk offending the Recording Angel rather than make others unhappy. They conclude that he is a person of more than average understanding, which it is not safe to postulate of our fellow-beings.

NOTES FROM PARIS.

THE BANNS OF BARONESS VAUGHAN.

THE publication of banns of marriage between Blanche Zélie Josephine Delacroix and Emmanuel Durieux, both rentiers, settles in the negative sense the question of her being the "widow" of the late King Leopold. Had he married her in extremis, without the aid of the Mayor of Lacken, she would, under a new Belgian law, be entitled to the honour of a dowager's situation and partake of the late King's nationality. Nor could she marry before mid-October. The name of "Caroline" by which she has been known was assumed when she first, acting on M. Durieux's advice, chose the Casino of Ostend as a fit stage for the display of such lyrical gifts as she possessed, enhanced by her remarkable beauty. She had had then creditors in whose books she figured as Mlle. Blanche Delacroix. Since Leopold's death she has had endless proposals of marriage, some from persons of high social standing, and one from a Greek officer, who called at her château to make his offer in a superb uniform. But her choice had been already made and indicated almost from the day after the King's death in his being appointed her "intendent." The papers then recorded a long visit of both to the pied à terre of Leopold in the Avenue de Victor Hugo, before the tardily acting Belgian Legation had caused seals to be placed on the doors of the law agents of the Princesse Louise to lay an embargo on the papers there.

M. Durieux is a well preserved person of fifty, or thereabouts. In the publication of banns he gives his domicile as being in "Neuilly," and declares both his parents to be dead. He resided and nominally does so still in the Castel St. James, a small pseudo-gothic villa in the Rue du Bois de Boulogne, Neuilly. He has been known as "a sportsman"—a rather vague and yet an expressive term—is fond of horses, motoring, boating, and is a first-rate whip who can drive like a professional, four-in-hand or tandem. The "Baroness" and he as her "intendent" and friend in evil are on kindly terms with the Abbé Morand, the aged parish priest of Balincourt. They attend mass, he taking his royal predecessor's place, as of old. The young Duc de Terureren and the Comte de Ravenstein accompany them, with a following of a footman, an English governess, and two nursery maids. Terueren, a fief of the House of Burgundy, had a palace until it was burned down about twenty years ago. The County of Ravenstein is in Saxe-Coburg, and gave the First and Second Leopold the title they each took when travelling.

Not' Baronne, as the peasants round Balincourt call Mme. de Vaughan, had the old church of Arrancourt furbished up and decorated at her own expense for the Feast of the Assumption. The whole neighbourhood has been expecting the religious wedding to come off before the flowers sent from her garden and greenhouses have time to fade. They took as a sure sign of a fast approaching marriage the transport from the château to the church of four armchairs in gilt frames and of six armless ones. They have been placed in the sacristy. The inference drawn is that two of the fauteuils will be set in front of the chancel for the happy pair, and two for the quasi-Royal boys. The chairs are for the four witnesses, the doctor and a cousin of M. Durieux. Her family will not be represented. I have no idea what became of all the thirteen brothers and sisters. The only remaining brother is a waiter in a café in the unfashionable Rue Parmentier. A widowed sister, who has a highly promising son studying on a City Scholarship at the Arts et Métiers, keeps a greengrocery near les Gobelins. A second one is the wife of a locksmith at Montmartre, and never sought to find a fortune in her beauty. A third one did. She sent the future Mme. Durieux for a few years to a genteel school, enabled her to study at the Conservatoire, and took her to Argentina, where they quarrelled, with the result that Blanche, as she was then called, was sent back to Europe. This sister lives in a villa of her own near Vincennes and is now elderly. Report at Aix les Bains gave her credit for a friendship that lasted through some seasons with a distinguished visitor who annually takes the waters there.

This marriage is thought "very Parisian," though I do not see why. Although it shifts from one to another pocket a fortune which the legal advisers of the Belgian Princesses estimate at over 160,000,000 frs., it gives out no whiff of snobbishness. It is thought "sympathique" as consecrating the principle of fidelity in affairs of the heart. Certainly, it is a lesson to those kings, so numerous in our time, who aim at amassing great private fortunes. M. Octave Mirbeaux is delighted with it. Does it not show, he asks, that in spite of his hard business head, his unscrupulousness as a speculator, his ferocious cruelty as a Rubber King to Free State negroes, that Leopold II. was the greatest fool that the nineteenth century produced?

In measuring time by the progress made in aviation, it seems, not three years, but almost as many centuries since Santos Dumont brought out his heavier than air aviator. He showed it off at Bagatelle. There it flew as does a grasshopper, or one of those so-called flying fishes that one sees jerking forward on the surface of the water in the Bay of Algeçiras. One of the aviator's hops extended to a distance of sixty metres. A two hundred metre one was thought prodigious, in the course of which the flyer attained a height of about six metres. Bagatelle had been chosen in the hope of fetching the late M. Chauchard, then on his last legs, from his villa across the road. He came in a carriage that would have been just the thing in which to figure in a court procession. But, too slow-witted to see that the principle had been established, he buttoned his pockets the closer, and went away without making the donation of funds which had been looked for. Captain Ferber had in vain pointed out that the machine did as well as an eagle debarred from taking a run sufficiently long to gain sufficient momentum to rise. Blériot saw a means to fame and fortune in lessons he drew from the Bagatelle experiment, as did also Farman, though he had not ironworks of his own to start from.

The astoundingly brilliant feats of the French aviators in le Circuit de l'Est seem to most of us the opening of a new era—and on the fortieth anniversary, too, of the first outpost defeat of France in 1870. We may expect to hear of all the youngish manhood of West End Paris and the Châteaux betaking themselves to smithies to acquire skill in practical mechanics, which is thought the first step in successful aviation. The best airmen are chauffeurs who passed some time in smithies. The practice of trimming sails in Mediterranean fishing crafts helped to make Niel, Cheuret, and de Rougier rank among the best airmen.

Military and naval men see that the tactics of their respective services must be reconsidered, to be safe from attacks from overhead, from reconnoitring corps of airmen, from corps for raining down explosives on fortresses and fleets. Applications crowd on the War Minister from officers wanting to be employed on aviation service. The Caen-Paris flight of the last week and the topographical notes made all along the way by the passenger show what work a corps of aviators might be expected to do.

The three airmen who came almost one on the top of the other from Paris by Troyes to Nancy had no easy time aloft. The air is as sea in its low and high tides, back-washes, ebbs, flows, races, malestroms (as off the Brittany coast), and ground waves. If hill and mountain climbing tax energy, the flying machine strains it far more severely. Wherever the aerial course between Troyes and Nancy lay over long valleys, the downward pull against the flier was something hugoesque in its might and persistent ill-will. Aubrun felt as though he had to contend with demons without number, all pulling against him to tear him down. To keep the better of the suctional power of the air towards the floors of these valleys, he gathered himself into a ball, threw all his strength into his arms, and tried to keep up courage in remembering that no great victory was to be won cheap. When the flier got above a tableland the air became helpful and "bon enfant." The ideas of the glory and the gold to be won were also stimulants to wary and plucky exertion. Yet more so was the oft-recurring notion of "the joy the dear ones left behind would feel on reading of the triumph."

A cross-current in the air, corresponding to the crossing of valleys, tested to the utmost the "seamanship" of the airmen. The psychology of the French ones, as it appears in their accounts of their outer conditions and their thoughts and feelings, is full of interest. Nothing that can touch it is to be found in the story of the Latin races since Columbus sailed for the first time over the Atlantic, or in that of the British since the sailors of the Ark Royal gave a shout of joy at their first sight of the Spanish Armada. Each of two aviators followed Paulhan in keeping off nervous breakdown in their high air solitudes. Aubrun spoke words of encouragement in a gay colloquy with himself. It was good, he reminded himself in his soliloquy, to have iron muscles and nerves, but better to have a fearless heart. "As well fall from a height of 1,000 metres as from one of ten metres." Snatches of lively songs were sung, so as to chase away a crushing sense of loneliness. A bar or two of the "Marseillaise" cheered in the mist-desert. Not that Aubrun could hear a note of what he sang, because of the only sound, a sound incessant and ear-piercing—the whirr of his propelling screws.

The Germans, we all know, have strong, square heads. But is their cerebral wealth readily "liquid?" Anatomically they, it appears, lack the quick, strong action of the heart of the decent sort of working class French—it may be of the "Apache" class, but in their case ill directed. Most of the highly successful French aviators I have seen were of the common round-cheeked type, with, however, good noses and nervous markings round the nostrils and the lips. With this there were bright eyes, a good-humoured expression, and very wide shoulders in proportion to their short statures. The whole body looked alive. A quick, strong heart makes a brain after its image, gives ready ingenuity, and imparts deft cleverness to the fingers. It preserves a hopeful disposition in adverse circumstances, so that when a fallen house must be rebuilt the owner goes to work the richer in experience.

Air navigation had its first great start in Paris forty years ago. Balloons took out letters to the provinces. Carrier pigeons took them there and conveyed back answers. But many of these birds, not being aware of the state of war then existing, flew low enough to be shot by Prussian marksmen, and so the missives entrusted to them miscarried. The airman now can replace the pigeon. It may be said that the air kingdom, in which France now glories, is the direct offspring of besieged Paris.

I rejoiced in the advent of the motor. But seeing its tyrannical reign over the French highway, and the indifference into which it has brought the taking away of human life, I repent having done so. Let us hope the flying machine will not be a fellow tyrant, and be as a sword of Damocles over the heads of all and each of us. I am not sure that the march of intellect, as shown in mechanical invention in a half-evolved humanity, is the blessing that optimists think. Was it not Renan who said, "The cracked and sluggish brains rule the world according to the will of a few selfish knaves?"

And now to ladies' hats. The Ouest State Railway directorate has recommended the Public Works Minister to alter tariffs for hat and bonnet boxes. These officials propose the tariff to be placed on dimensions instead of weight. A few dozen hat boxes are of inconsiderable weight, but they leave no room in a van for anything else. Their very fragility makes them a greater inconvenience. With the new mode of high-plumed trimming, the boxes have considerable height as well as length and breadth. This calls for charging by the square inch. The Minister objects to the variability of fashion. The vast hat-brims of to-day may disappear to-morrow, and railway tariffs have to last for at least a year. However, the matter is to be considered.

The chapeau Charlotte last June passed for being the ideal for country or seaside use. It is now out of date. Deep lace borders on hat-brims have come in. They may or may not be lifted in front. Sometimes the lace is deep enough to cover the whole brim and advance 3 inches or so beyond. This gives a resemblance in the hat to a flounced parasol. It casts almost a dim, religious light on a face that refuses to be elderly, and suits one that is in its fresh bloom. The prevailing rains have kept elegant millinery in its boxes and inflicted on us through the nearly ended season yachting hats and Pyrenean caps, red, blue, brown. The hoods of forty years ago, worn the last summer season of the Second Empire in the Parc Monceau, have been rejuvenated and brought out. They are in great favour at watering-places. According to the trimming they suit wearers of all ages, not excluding the school girl. A silk hood with a soft lace garniture in front and a bow with ends falling back at the summit of the hood goes well with any face. It embellishes the old lady and gives a note of suavity to her daughter or granddaughter. We fall in love with suavity when it is not purposely put on.

A hat of the flower-pot form launched by the Princess Emanuel de Broglie was thought quite chic at Villers-sur-Mer. It is an adaptation of the one in which Gainsborough painted the Princess Amelia of Great Britain, and was admired by the milliners at the Hundred Portraits Exhibition. The hat of the Princesse de Broglie had a thick brim of coarser straw than the rest, and for its front trimming a big chou made of goffered mousseline de soie of a silver grey hue. A veil of the same material made of a simple breadth of the stuff and showing the selvedges fastened on the crown and elegantly draped at the sides of the hat was tied loosely below the neck. If a shower caught the wearer the chou could be replaced by the femme de chambre with another like it, and the veil taken off and ironed to be set on as before. The hat of the Princess Amelia had no chou but a grey gauze veil. The portrait in which it is represented hangs at Windsor. Queen Victoria had it removed to be hung high, and make way for things done by her favourite Winterhalter. His ladies had flesh that resembled veal of the staggering age.

A SONG OF THE SEASON.

Air: "Bonnie Dundee."

To his staff in mid-August the Editor said,
"Real news there is none, therefore news must be made;
So let each who considers the paper and me
Set himself, for the nonce, a Munchausen to be.

"Come, fill up my columns as well as you can;
Come, rack you for copy your cerebral pan;
Come, let airy fancy disport herself free;
'Tis the season of holiday fiction," said he.

Thus spake the great man from his editor's seat
In an office adjoining the highway of Fleet;
And each of his staff cried, "Aye, so let it be.
Herodotus shall not be in it with me."

"Come, fill up," etc.

Then the staffs to their desks they precipitate fled,
While a towel, well moistened, encircled each head;
And they settled them down, full of cynical glee,
With their readers to take (as the Vulgate saith) tea.

"Come, fill up," etc.

Faked letters from "Mater" and "Fairplay" they wrote;
Fancy wires from "Our Own Correspondent" they quote;
Thev sent off the Kaiser, incog., on the spree,
And removed the appendix from old Lady B——.

"Come, fill up," etc.

They found out a mountain (location suppressed)
Six hundred feet higher than Mount Everest,
Smashed the necks of American aeronauts three,
And derailed an express of the C.P.R.C.

"Come, fill up," etc.

So they made up the paper all out of their head;
And the chief, on perusing it, wittily said:
"'Tis even as Æsop declared it to be—— Invention's own mother is Necessitee."

"Come, fill up my columns as well as you can;
Come, rack you for copy your cerebral pan;
Come, let airy fancy disport herself free;
'Tis the season of holiday fiction," said he.

LETTER FROM THE LINKMAN.

A BEAUTIFUL woman, dear Lady Betty, is Venus's millionaire. Some beautiful women are spendthrifts who waste the wealth; others are wise, and die in the odour of social sanctity.

A woman of the type of the late Miss Florence Nightingale is a universal inheritance. The whole civilised world is the richer for her having lived, and England benefits especially from having produced her. Emperors and kings are now but milestones in history; Florence Nightingale is a substantial part of history.

The Grand Old Woman of Great Britain—the Uncrowned Queen of the nurses—reformed a profession. Is it on record that, alone, any human being ever accomplished the feat before? In the Crimea the English, French, and Russians killed their thousands, and not a single creature is the better for the slaughter; one gentle woman attended the sick and dying upon the field, and civilisation has benefited enormously.

"Policies" are the playthings of the few; under an aristocratic system a country always prospers in spite of its "statesmen."

An American climbed a tree, pulled it up after him, and was never seen again; it is the invariable fate of all "policies" and their authors.

"Of the dead, nothing but good," is the old maxim; to it the English appear to have unconsciously added, "Of the living, little but evil." For close upon half a century the late Miss Florence Nightingale has lived in our midst almost forgotten and greatly ignored. To-day her name rings through the land. It is to the discredit of the entire nation that, had it not been for the persistent clamour of a few journalists, Florence Nightingale would probably never have been appointed to the Order of Merit in recognition of her services to the community and humanity.

Prejudice and vested interests claim their toll of victims in this country before any improvement can be effected. However necessary a reform may be, it is bad for the reformer. The worship of the "established" prevails in every direction here. The whole congregation of a village church abandoned its support of the Thirty-nine Articles because a hassock was removed from the left to the right. A deputation of Nonconformists waited upon the celebrated Minister Lord North to represent certain grievances which afflicted them severely. At an early stage of the proceedings Lord North interrupted the spokesman. "Gentlemen," he said, "I am against you. I am an upholder of the Established Church. Not that I care for the Established Church, but I uphold it because it is the Established Church. Get your d——d sect established in its place, and then I will uphold it. I wish you good-morning, gentlemen." It was in the face of such opposition that Florence Nightingale established the modern system of nursing, and it is earnestly to be hoped that her callous fellow-countrymen and women will erect a splendid monument to perpetuate the memory of their glorious benefactress.

* * * * * *

If man renders a signal service to the community it is customary to reward him with a title. Why should woman be treated differently? There have been women who had the honour conferred upon them for their irregularities, and the late Lady Burdett-Coutts was created a Baroness for her philanthropy; there can, therefore, be no insuperable bar to woman being ennobled. The reward is, however, but seldom accorded to her, merely because it has generally been withheld in the past—the worst possible reason.

* * * * * *

A criminal was executed some days ago, and, according to the accounts in the newspapers, the attendant clergyman read the Burial Service aloud as he accompanied the condemned man from the cell to the scaffold. It is the office of the clergy to soothe suffering; they are not to associate themselves with the law to aggravate its terrors. To read the Burial Service over a living fellow-creature is a barbarous proceeding, and any executive that continues so monstrous a practice in these enlightened times is deserving of the severest censure. England is yet in the throes of civilisation.

* * * * * *

Tragic journalism is one of the main features of the time in England. The following conversation was recently overheard:—

Miss A: "A good murder is deliciously exciting. The discovery, suspicions, arrest, trial, verdict, and sentence rivet the attention continuously for weeks. I do wish they would not have more than one murder at a time."

Miss B: "You horrid girl! I like a big war; the descriptions of the battles are so thrilling, and it is like betting—one always wishes a particular side to win . . ."

Lady B: "Ah, my dears, they no longer have the old-fashioned railway accidents there were in the past; those were frightful indeed!"

Miss C: "I hate horrors, but a great shipwreck is certainly fascinating, especially if there are any on board you know."

Mr. E. (A Financier): "I prefer a crisis in the City; millions may be made in a panic."

All agreed, however, that hurricanes, American colossal disasters, distant earthquakes, inundations, famines, plagues, and irruptions provided less attractive reading than do catastrophes which occur nearer home. —Believe me to be, very truly yours,

MARMADUKE.

CORRESPONDENCE.

SERVICE OUTLAWS.

Sir,—Your excellent article on the Archer Shee case might lead the casual reader to suppose that it is only in the Army and Navy that a prejudiced or stupid chief can ruin a subordinate's career by condemning him unheard or insufficiently heard on charges which are untrue. The fact is, however, that Civil Servants, far more than sailors and soldiers, are at the mercy of their superiors, for soldiers and sailors can claim to be court-martialled.

In the Civil Service, A, who dislikes, or is too stupid to appreciate, his subordinate, B, makes an unfavourable secret report upon him and sends it to the permanent chief. The permanent chief, too busy, too lazy, or not quite competent to get at the rights of the case, reports in similar terms to his political chief. The political chief, who it may be has his political career to make, leaves office details to the permanent chief; and as the outcome of it all B is censured, passed over, or superannuated merely on A's unverified assertion, but in the name of the political chief. Once committed, the political chief seldom goes back on the decision that has been fathered on him. It is a "chose jugée," and if the decision is attacked in Parliament the Government and the Party support the Minister, and he trusts confidently to his permanent officials to get him out of the mess somehow. The Home Office and Mr. Beck, the Post Office and Mr. Dick are instances in point, and France exemplified the same tendency in the case of Dreyfus.

Sir Rufus Isaacs put the whole case in a nutshell.

"You are Recorder of Oxford, are you not?"—"I am."

"When a case is brought before you you hear both sides, do you not?"—"I do."

"If a boy is brought before you and charged with stealing, you hear the evidence and counsel on both sides in open court?"—"I do."

"You call that a fair trial?"—"I do."

Now, the only people in the United Kingdom to whom a fair trial is denied are his Majesty's servants when other servants of his Majesty have used them unjustly. Many of them exercise judicial powers over the public. They have, for instance, to administer Acts of Parliament. But they are compelled to suffer injustice from their chiefs, and protected if they act unjustly to their subordinates.

And all this is allowed to continue, it is pretended, in the interests of discipline and in the name of the King. No wonder that Civil Servants are everywhere forming trade unions, and that these have combined to call on the Prime Minister to institute a court of appeal for Civil Servants. Yet Mr. Asquith, voicing the self-complacency of permanent officialdom, turns a deaf ear to the demand.—I am, yours faithfully,

A Civil Servant.

ENGLAND FOR THE ENGLISH HOLIDAY-MAKER.

Sir,—In your issue of the 3rd instant (page 277) you have a couple of paragraphs about sporting landowners who object to trespassers on the heather. At the foot of the same page you have another paragraph commenting on the fondness of English people for taking their holidays abroad. You do not appear to notice any connection between the two matters. I cannot say how the question is viewed by the general public, but in my own case the fact that in England I am a trespasser anywhere off the highways is a potent reason which sends me abroad for my holidays. And, the irony of it, we are asked to be patriotic in defence of the land in which we are trespassers.

"Queer Stories" from Truth. Now ready, Series XVI. Price 1s., at all booksellers, and from the Publisher, 10, Bolt Court, Fleet Street. "They are one of the wonders of the world, these stories, and people are never tired of asking who writes them." —Bystander.

It has always been a matter of surprise to me that well-meaning landscape lovers should collect and spend so much money on purchasing small areas for public enjoyment instead of attacking the root of the evil in the ridiculous law of trespass, which, I believe, does not exist in any other country in the world. No wonder so many foreigners fail to see wherein our pretensions to freedom lie.—Yours faithfully,

E. Callis.

BIRTH AND DEATH RATE COMPETITIONS.

Sir,—I have read with interest your remarks on a prize of £5,000 offered by Answers in a births and deaths competition.

In your issue of July 20 you write:—"In these birth-rate competitions the limits of variation in the birth-rate in any given place can be ascertained pretty accurately from the records, and it is simply a question whether the competitor will spend enough money in coupons to submit the number of predictions that is necessary in order to make him virtually safe in having one of them right."

With a view to ascertaining whether this particular competition offers a fair speculative chance, if tackled on the above lines, I have made a little calculation. As a working hypothesis I have assumed that the figures for this year will fall within the limits of variation in the four given towns for the last three years. (The figures for these three years are provided by Answers.) In order to make absolutely certain of winning the £5,000 on this hypothesis the following procedure would seem a suitable one:—

Let a syndicate be formed, consisting of every man, woman, and child on the face of the earth (with the exception, of course, of the Carmelite staff). Assuming that each coupon will take three minutes to negotiate, and granting that each member of the syndicate work night and day at filling in the coupons, without food or sleep, the task will occupy 1,000,000,000 (one thousand million) years. Further, each member of the syndicate will have to expend the sum of £500,000,000,000 (five hundred thousand million pounds) in the purchase of coupons. The time occupied by the Carmelites in adjudicating remains to be seen. As the figures of some, if not all, the towns are practically certain to be outside the limit of variation for the last three years, the chances are very strong that our syndicate will get "left" after all.

The above may help the imagination to realise what the chances are better than the bald statement that it is against any given coupon winning the £5,000.

200,000,000,000,000,000,000,000 to 1

The above applies to four towns with eight variables. I note that you state in error that in this competition there are eight towns with sixteen variables. It is well for our syndicate that this is not the case, as, long before the completion of their task, they would be frozen solid by the cold of space, owing to the sun having "gone out" (according to the calculations of eminent astronomers). It is possible they might, however, be somewhat too warm for effective work, as ample time would have elapsed for the solar system to have reached the constellation Lyra, to which it is hastening, and the whole bag of tricks (including Carmelite House and its contents) might have been converted into an incandescent gaseous nebula. Even in the simple case of the four towns physical difficulties arise, for there is neither gold enough on the earth to buy the coupons nor wood enough to make paper for them. Indeed, it is a question whether there is liquid enough to make ink to write them.

The tragedy of the thing, as you point out, is that the guileless country parson is tempted to impoverish himself and the "knowing" office-boy to take what isn't hisn in order to finance muddle-headed attempts to make "certs" of these prizes. Perhaps a perusal of the above might provide such with food for thought.

By the way, I wonder what premium Lloyd's would charge to insure against that £5,000 being won. In a recent Answers competition 1,000,000 coupons were said to have been sent in. Assuming that number to be again forthcoming, the chances are still 200,000,000,000,000,000 to 1 against!—Yours faithfully,

E. Bennett.

P.S.—I'm afraid it's no go. I have reluctantly abandoned my scheme for annexing that £5,000, as I find that the coupons, when ready for sending in, packed as tightly as they will go, will form a stack 1,500 ft. high and covering the whole of the land surface of the globe. I fear the Post Office might boggle at the delivery. When delivered they would swamp the whole of England to a height of 366 miles, and I fear the postman couldn't breathe up there.

P.P.S.—I have since amused myself with another calculation, the result of which I think brings home the magnitude of the task better than the other illustrations given. If the coupons necessary to make sure of the prize (on the hypothesis that the variations will fall within those of the last three years) were to be used for paperhanging purposes, they would be sufficient to give a fresh coat of paper every spring for the next two hundred (200) years to the entire surfaces of all the components of the solar system—i.e. of the sun and of the planets Mercury, Venus, the Earth, Mars, Jupiter, Saturn, Uranus, and Neptune, with the asteroids and various moons thrown in. As this may sound rather tall, I give calculations overleaf.

[The calculations have been deposited in the archives of Truth, but may be inspected by bonâ-fide Answers competitors.—Ed.]

MAMMON.

ROUND THE MARKETS.

A Change for the Better—Yankees Strong—The Pacific Companies' Big Earnings—Home Securities Still Unwanted—Manaos Improvements Troubles.

ALTHOUGH really active times can hardly be expected in the Stock Exchange during August, more life was infused into dealings last week than many people had looked for. The American market set a very good lead, prices jumping smartly upon the publication of some excellent railway earnings. The preliminary statements of the Union Pacific and Southern Pacific roads attracted chief attention; the former showed net earnings equal to nearly 20 per cent. upon the common stock, as against the 10 per cent. distributed, and the latter displayed profits representing 13 per cent., as compared with the present dividend rate of 6 per cent. These statements not only worried a good many "bears" into covering, but induced some investment buying as well, hence the rise. A fair degree of cheerfulness also continued to be manifested in the South African market, while rubber shares, after opening the week in gloomy fashion, influenced by lugubrious stories of speculators in trouble, made a spirited rally on the healthy condition of affairs disclosed at the carry-over and the non-fulfilment at the settlement of any of the talk about failures.

Home securities remain in a chronic state of neglect. Although monetary conditions are still comfortable enough—the Bank of England has a reserve of £29,173,000, as compared with £27,835,000 a year ago, and there is no reason to expect an abnormal gold drain this autumn—Consols keep moving on the down grade. On Monday the price touched $80\frac{11}{16}$, which, allowing for the fact that it includes about 10s. of accrued dividend, is a new low record. I do not propose to go into the reasons for the decline in the funds—they have been discussed ad nauseam—but I might just point out that there is such a thing as overdoing a fall as well as a rise, and now that Consols yield close on 3⅛ per cent. they seem almost worth picking up. In any case the scope for a further fall, given no breach of international peace, seems very small. On a 3 per cent. yield basis Goschens would stand at 83⅜, or nearly 3 points over the existing level, allowing for the accrued dividend now carried in the price. As regards Home Rails, the favourable views of the general position which I have expressed in recent notes were fully endorsed by the speeches at the half-yearly meetings. Better trade, the co-operation policy, and the stern retrenchments on capital outlays have played their part, and are still playing their part, in ameliorating the lot of the shareholder. Lord Stalbridge told the North-Western meeting that he "saw no disturbing element which need cause them the least anxiety." This wind-up to a generally optimistic speech is worth taking a note of; the remark, while it was made respecting affairs on the Brum, has wide significance; indeed, the other railway chairmen have nearly all spoken more confidently of the outlook for the lines they control than for at least a decade.

Amongst South American Rails a feature has been a sharp improvement in the preference stocks of the Cordoba and Rosario Railway. The cause is to be found in the settlement just arrived at with the provincial Government of Santa Fé over its claim for taxes upon the Rafaela Tramway Company, in which the Cordoba and Rosario is interested to the extent of £79,120. The original claim was for $80,000, say, £7,000, and while it was pending the tramway concern postponed the payment of dividends. Now the claim has been settled for a sum of $9,000, or a mere £786. Another South American concern which has been and remains seriously embroiled with the local governing authority is the Manaos Improvements Company. Last October the Brazilian State of Amazonas, which is pledged to a conditional guarantee of interest to the Improvements Company, passed an Act giving the Governor power to cancel at his discretion the company's concession, under which it has already expended over £400,000 on the works. This law was officially approved by the Governor of the State without in any way communicating with the company. The directors thereupon sent a representative to Manaos to negotiate with the authorities, and according to their story this representative, who remained there from December to May, was successful in obtaining a promise to have the confiscatory law cancelled when the State Congress met in July, the Governor of the State at the same time proposing certain modifications of the rates specified in the concession, which the directors accepted. Now it appears the Governor of the State has, like Pharaoh, hardened his heart, and has reported to Congress in terms which will not help to repeal the law that endangers the concession. Meanwhile, the State Government is not paying to the company the guaranteed interest. The company is sending out a second commissioner to Brazil with the object of getting the Federal Government to intervene on its behalf, and that is as far as matters have got. It is an unpleasant episode, though before passing judgment it is necessary to hear what are the reasons which have prompted such arbitrary action by the State of Amazonas. The fact is that contingent guarantees given by minor South American States to concessionaires not infrequently prove unsatisfactory. The terms of such concessions are generally very complex, and afford the guarantors plenty of excuses for wriggling out of their bargains if they wish. When dealing with minor States in South and Central America foreign capitalists would be best advised to negotiate only on the basis of a direct unconditional guarantee—even that is often a thing sufficiently hazardous.

RAILWAYS.

Canadian Pacifics on an 8 per Cent. Basis—The Company's Wonderful Prosperity—Grand Trunk Half-Year—The Outlook Considered.

Writing rather more than a week ago upon the record year enjoyed by the Canadian Pacific Railway, I stated that while earnings were sufficient to pay a greatly increased dividend, the board was unlikely to alter the distribution from motives of policy. Circumstances, however, appear to have been too strong even for so conservative a management as that of the C.P.R. The dividend for the half-year ended June 30 last is at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum from railway and steamship profits, as compared with 6 per cent. for the corresponding period, while the usual bonus at the rate of 1 per cent. is paid out of the interest upon the proceeds of sales of land. The total distribution for the six months is thus at the rate of 8 per cent., making with the dividend and bonus for the previous six months 7½ per cent. for the year 1909-10, against 7 per cent. for 1908-9. Now that the company has raised its dividend to an 8 per cent. basis it may be taken that it will be maintained there, at any rate unless and until conditions in the Dominion undergo a radical change for the worse. How the Canadian Pacific has fared may be seen at a glance from the following table:—

| — | 1909-10. | 1908-9. | Increase. |
|---|---|---|---|
| | $ | $ | $ |
| Gross earnings | 94,989,500 | 76,313,300 | 18,676 200 |
| Working expenses | 61,149,500 | 53,357,700 | 7,791,800 |
| Net revenue | 33,840,000 | 22,955,600 | 10,884,400 |
| Extra receipts | 3,335,700 | 2,306,500 | 1,029,200 |
| Total surplus | 37,175,700 | 25,262,100 | 11,913,600 |
| Deduct :— | | | |
| Fixed charges | 9,917,000 | 9,427,000 | 490,000 |
| Steamboat replacement fund | 900,000 | 800,000 | 100,000 |
| Pension fund | 80,000 | 80,000 | — |
| Distributable balance | 26,278,700 | 14,955,100 | 11,323,600 |
| Preference and Ordinary divs. | 12,382,100 | 11,107,900 | 1,274,200 |
| Carry forward | 13,896,600 | 3,847,200 | 10,049,400 |

It is a wonderful story of progress; gross earnings are up 24 per cent., and net earnings have forged ahead by 48 per cent., the ratio of working, which in 1908-9 was the exceptionally high one of 69.92, having dropped to 64.37, which is the lowest for the last seven years, with the exception of 1905-6, when it was 62.75 per cent. The upshot is that after paying away 490,000 dols. more in fixed charges, and putting aside an extra 100,000 dols. to steamboat replacement fund, the company shows a balance available upon its 180,000,000 dols. common stock (of which 30,000,000 dols. has only just been issued) equal to 14.3 per cent., out of which it is distributing 6.5 per cent. I am dealing now with the profits from the transport industry; those from the company's very important land department are, of course, kept separate. Having regard to the enormous strength of the company, it is impossible to speak of Canadas even now as over-valued. They have risen since the dividend from 192 to nearly 200, because the market was not expecting a higher rate. But now that they are on an 8 per cent. basis it would not be surprising if the shares went over 200 before we are much older.

The half-yearly figures of the Grand Trunk Railway Company indicate good progress in gross receipts, which on the main system went up £455,200, but working expenses kept the gain in gross close company, and the surplus available for the shareholders shows an advance of only £67,300. The results may be conveniently judged from the following table:—

| — | First half, 1910. | First half, 1909. | + Inc. or – dec. |
|---|---|---|---|
| | £ | £ | £ |
| Gross receipts | 3,321,600 | 2,866,400 | + 455,200 |
| Working expenses | 2,336,000 | 1,987,100 | + 348,900 |
| Net revenue | 985,600 | 879,300 | + 106,300 |
| Income from rentals, outside operations, and car mileage balance | 58,100 | 58,100 | — |
| Total net revenue | 1,043,700 | 937,400 | + 106,300 |
| Net revenue charges, less credits | 507,000 | 498,600 | + 8,400 |
| Available balance | 536,700 | 438,800 | + 97,900 |
| Deduct— | | | |
| Canada Atlan. deficiency | 34,900 | 41,100 | — 6,200 |
| Detroit, Grand Haven and Milwaukee deficiency | 34,600 | 25,700 | + 8,900 |
| Written off engine and car renewals suspense account | 120,000 | 92,100 | + 27,900 |
| Surplus | 347,200 | 279,900 | + 67,300 |
| Balance | 11,800 | 12,200 | — 400 |
| Total surplus | 359,000 | 292,100 | + 66,900 |
| Appropriation— | | | |
| Guaranteed dividend | 196,800 | 196,800 | — |
| First Pref. dividend | 85,400 | 85,400 | — |
| Second Pref. dividend | 63,200 | nil. | + 63,200 |
| Carry forward | 13,600 | 9,900 | + 3,700 |

As usual, the ratio of expenses in the month of June (for which no separate revenue statement is published) was quite out of keeping with that for the previous five months; whereas gross receipts in June rose £80,300, they were more than swamped by higher expenditure, seeing that a net gain to the end of May of £81,000 emerged at the end of June as a net gain of only £78,400—that is, after allowing in both cases for the sums written off suspense account.

The company starts the new half-year over £60,000 to the good by reason of the fact that it will have in respect of that period to find only a six months' instead of a twelve months' dividend upon the Second Preference stock. It will also derive relief in connection with the Car Renewals Suspense Account, for whereas in the December half of 1909 the sum written off that account out of revenue was £259,000, there now remains only £77,700 to get rid of the item altogether. Lest this fact should make the shareholders over-sanguine, I would remind them that Mr. Smithers, the chairman, was careful to explain last April that the elimination of the suspense account would not mean that the whole sum saved would be available for distribution, because the rapidly growing requirements of the company for repairs and additions to its equipment would involve the continued spending of heavy amounts from revenue for such a purpose. Still, a certain amount of benefit should accrue to the shareholders upon the extinguishing of the suspense account. The crop outlook both in Canada and the States is not very bright, but as an important set-off the Trunk will this year benefit from the carriage to the seaboard of the grain brought down to the Lakes by the new Pacific road. A year ago, it may be recalled, the Trunk missed this traffic, for, owing to the non-completion of the Government portion of the road from Winnipeg to Lake Superior Junction, traffic coming eastward over the Prairie section of the Pacific road from Edmonton had to complete its journey at Winnipeg over the metals of the Canadian Pacific. At this stage dividend forecasts are very much in the nature of guesswork, but while the possibilities favour the payment of something upon Trunk Third Preference for 1910, I should not be inclined just now to go for more than 2 per cent. Whether gross traffics in the coming fall be good or bad, it must not be forgotten that the earning capacity of the new Pacific road, upon which the Trunk has given heavy guarantees, remains to be tested, and until the board can gauge its position in this respect with some degree of accuracy it will naturally be inclined to husband its resources as much as possible.

RUBBER

Bears in Mincing Lane—The Motor Rubber Demand — Some Investment Shares — The Malacca Position.

In the concluding paragraph of my Rubber Notes last week I gave my readers early notice that jobbers were begging for time in which to deliver overdue shares, and the shortage in the market of popular rubber shares of all descriptions revealed by the settlement caused a sharp rebound in prices, which puzzled operators who disregard the realities of market conditions. The Stock Exchange "bears," emboldened by the success of their former raids, had carried their operations too far, and were compelled by the superior tactics of Mincing Lane operators to disgorge a large portion of the profits which they had previously made. The jealousy which exists between the Lane and the House is frequently a bar to the free interchange of views between the two markets, and as rubber manufacturers also habitually enshroud their market purchases in mystery, surprises are from time to time to be expected.

It now appears that a clique of speculators, seeing that they could get two or three months' credit in the raw rubber market as against a fortnightly settlement for shares on the Stock Exchange, made heavy purchases of the commodity for August delivery, which they were unable to take up. The closing of this deal brought down the price with a run, not, it is said, without inflicting serious loss on a certain Mincing Lane house. The Lane market is honeycombed with speculation to an unprecedented extent, but as operations of late have been chiefly on the "bear" side, repurchases are likely to restore the market to a firmer condition. A feature of the recent sales not without significance is the fact that, although hard pressed by the smallness of their stocks, manufacturers do not care to be seen openly bidding against each other for supplies, and no sooner were the auction sales concluded than brokers' telephones were kept busy with a stream of buying orders at an advance in price of 1s. and more per lb. The very individuals who had refused to buy openly in the room did not hesitate to become anxious buyers by private treaty, and their furtive purchases speedily raised the price of fine hard Para from 7s. to 9s. 6d. No one realises more fully than the manufacturer that the supply of rubber is unequal to trade demands. To the statistics which I gave recently dealing with the American output of motor cars I am now enabled to add the following figures relating to the British motor trade which have been courteously placed at my disposal by the editor of the Autocar, and represent the result of a census made last year by the Royal Automobile Club.

|---|---|---|
| Motor vehicles registered (including motor cycles) | 154,415 | 183,773 |
| Licences issued | 148,974 | 174,986 |

In this conservative country, where people cling to old-fashioned methods of locomotion, the industry, it will be seen, is making steady and encouraging progress, although the rate of growth is not so great as that of the United States. The best authorities look for an increased consumption of rubber in the motor industry at the rate of 20 per cent. per annum, and the present consumption in that trade alone of 35,000 tons is expected to increase to over 72,000 tons by 1914. Were it not for the prospect that the plantations in that year may be able to export some 37,000 tons of rubber there would be but little hope for the manufacturer, whose plight might well be worse in 1914 than it is to-day.

Readers who followed my persistent recommendation of rubber shares long before the boom commenced, and those who disregarded my warnings in April, when prices had been pushed to a dangerous level, may now look forward to an autumn session which promises, if I am able rightly to interpret market conditions, to provide some handsome profits; and I append a revised table of shares which seem likely to show some substantial appreciation:—

| | Present price. |
|---|---|
| Bandar Sumatra | 15/16 prem. |
| Batu Caves | 17 |
| Batu Tiga | 5¼ |
| Glen Bervie | 2 prem. |
| Johore Rubber Lands | 1½ prem. |
| Kepong | 6¼ |
| Linggi | 56/– |
| Malacca Preference | 8¾ |
| Malacca 6% Debentures | 113 |
| Merlimau | 7/– |
| Prye | 1⅝ prem. |
| Sapong | 1⅜ |
| Sempah | ¼ prem. |
| Siak | 3/16 prem. |

In point of security Malacca £100 debentures paying 6 per cent., and secured by a first charge on an estate valued by the market at over three millions sterling, stand easily first, and the option to convert into ordinary shares at 10 confers a valuable right which places the debentures far above the average industrial investment. Glen Bervie is a non-speculative share with fine possibilities. Johore Rubber Lands, upon which I advised my readers to take profits at 3 premium, may now safely be repurchased, as they and Siaks are likely to make large profits by subsidiary flotations. The strength of Batu Caves and Batu Tiga have been discussed in detail in this column recently. Some shrewd buying of Sempahs has lately taken place, and the announcement of a development advantageous to the company may be made before long.

The disappointing returns from the Malacca estate have evoked from shareholders and from the press some not unnatural criticism, and in an unduly sensitive market criticism serves unfortunately only to deepen a depression which has, perhaps, already been carried too far by the operation of the primary cause itself. No one, I think, will question the justice of the remarks made by so well-informed a rubber authority as the Straits Times that "Malaccas could not reasonably remain at 17 unless the management proved itself capable of tapping all the trees;" but my Malayan contemporary gives the company credit for possessing "nearly a million trees of bearing age," from which it states "two pounds of rubber per tree might reasonably have been expected." This more than doubles the directors' estimate of the 1910 output, and it is clear that either the Straits Times has been over-indulging in those theoretical calculations of yield which it affects to condemn, or the Malacca property is worth vastly more than its best friends have ever claimed. The company has no doubt been short of labour, and it is understood in the market that instead of tapping the property for all it is worth, the directors have preferred to utilise a large portion of the labour force in thoroughly cleaning the property and in removing dead and decaying timber, which in some estates forms a prolific source of disease. The explanation may not satisfy those who are unable to sacrifice present inclinations to ultimate good, and all must regret that in a year of high prices for the commodity Malacca has not yielded a more satisfactory return. My readers will, however, do well to ignore press criticisms and not to part with their shares, but to await the outcome of the meeting which is to be called this month. The directors will no doubt disavow all responsibility for the market quotation, as directors always do—after a fall in price. But if I remember rightly the chairman at the last meeting justly congratulated himself on the rise which had then taken place, and at the forthcoming meeting it is believed that he will have much to say of a reassuring character both as to the disappointing yields and as to the improved condition of the estates. It may safely be asserted that with the single exception of Linggi no rubber plantation company can vie with Malacca in financial strength, and the forthcoming balance-sheet is expected to disclose cash and liquid assets amounting to about £200,000. When the debentures have been converted the company will have a paid-up capital of £350,000, and if I may (merely for the purposes of illustration) anticipate the debenture conversion, the position of Malacca may be shown thus:—

|---|---|
| Cash and liquid assets, say | £200,000 |
| 15,000 acres of rubber at £10 per acre | 150,000 |
| | £350,000 |

The whole of the company's capital, it will be seen, is covered by valuing the 15,000 acres of rubber at present planted, at the ridiculously low figure of £10 per acre, and disregarding the 8,000 acres of unplanted land and the company's shipping, trading, and banking business. A considerable portion of the working capital will, no doubt, be used for upkeep and betterment purposes, and a portion will most probably be employed in due season in extending the planted area; but it is abundantly clear to all acquainted with the Malacca position that it must one day figure as the greatest producer, and as one of the most moderately capitalised of all the rubber plantation estates in the East.

The Kamna estate announces an output for July which shows a satisfactory increase, and the directors have taken the straightforward course of requesting an independent report on the property from Mr. Lillingston, late superintendent of the Government plantations in Uganda.

Bleeding the Balata?

On the last occasion when I referred to the Consolidated Rubber and Balata Estates, Limited, I called attention to the fact that the Governor of British Guiana had cancelled five of the licences granted to the company to collect balata. The British Guiana Daily Chronicle of July 16 just to hand contains another item of interest to those who have invested their money in the company. The Chronicle states that on July 15 there returned to Georgetown from Groete Creek eight balata-bleeders and a foreman, who on May 21 had registered with the company. On their arrival in Georgetown they went to the office of the Institute of Mines and Forests, where they stated to the secretary that they had returned owing to the fact that the lands at Groete Creek had no bullet trees which they could bleed. The Chronicle remarks that a searching inquiry will be made into the truth or otherwise of the men's story. Of course, too much importance need not be attributed to these two incidents, for it would be too much to suppose that as the Consolidated Estates acquired nearly 400 licences concerning the collection of balata over 30,000 square miles, in addition to large leasehold areas, as well as freehold properties, expectations should be fulfilled in every instance. A well-informed correspondent tells me that the company shipped last year over 700,000 lbs. of balata, and the shippings this year are so far nearly 400,000 lbs., with the heaviest shipping months, August, September, and October, yet to furnish their quota to the total, so that it is to be hoped that the company will be able to give a good account of itself, in spite of incidents which would suggest that in acquiring licences too little attention was paid to their value, and that the bleeding of shareholders, and not of balata trees, was the main object in view.

MINES.

Fairly General Improvement—Rhodesian Anticipations—Big Trust Projected—Surprise Affairs Again—Rand Results—Taquahs.

A fairly cheerful tone has been in evidence in the Mining markets during the past week. Business has not expanded much—which is not altogether surprising, seeing that the holiday season is still with us and that this is a nineteen-day account—but there is no doubt that the recent rise in prices in South Africans and "Jungles" has already attracted some of the public back to these markets, and, providing there is no untoward development, it is expected that interest will broaden out as the holiday period draws to a close. South Africans made the running, and about the middle of last week West Africans joined in, scoring an almost general advance. Broken Hills have also revived a little. At the end of the week there was professional profit-snatching, and at the time of writing prices generally are under their recent best, but probably it would not need much fresh demand to lift them still higher.

The MOST COMPLETE List of Rubber and Oil Share Quotations will be found in every Saturday's issue of "The Financial Times." 1d. daily. On sale everywhere.

Dealers in more than one of the mining sections are talking of good business in September, while some are expecting the activity to commence towards the end of the current month. There seems to be a fairly general impression in Stock Exchange circles that the Rhodesian group will be one of the first to enjoy an expansion of business. Progress certainly has been made in connection with Rhodesian mines during the last year or two, and it is a favourable factor, so far as it goes, that the labour supply is about to be properly organised, but it is not clear that there is any really solid reason for expecting an all-round appreciation in share values. If the public gets the speculative fever as it did in the early part of the year, of course, anything may happen, but it would be unwise to rush in on that chance. It is known that influential people propose to form a big Rhodesian trust company on the lines of the Consolidated Gold Fields, which will assist in the development and flotation of mining properties, but the mere promotion of a trust cannot affect the real value of Rhodesians in general. The new concern, it is said, will absorb several of the existing finance companies, and will have a powerful backing, but the public must not run away with the idea that this scheme is going to work miracles and make dear Rhodesians cheap. Not so many years ago there were great market expectations in connection with the formation of a very big Kaffir trust—and not a little disappointment afterwards. There is, however, one way at least in which the projected Rhodesian trust may prove of real service to the industry and the market; and that is if it uses its influence to wake up the managements of the various mines so that their shareholders are regularly and fully supplied with information as to developments, etc., in the future.

Mention of the publicity question reminds me that the directors of the Surprise Gold Mining Company have issued their annual report. On several occasions I have criticised the management of this concern because of its neglect of the shareholders in regard to the important matter of keeping them regularly and fully supplied with information, and I am sorry to see that it is necessary to do so again. The directors' report throws no fresh light upon the mining position, although it is very desirable that shareholders should be informed of the results that have attended the further sinking of the winze. It may be remembered that the disappointing cable from Mr. Ackermann published about a month ago contained the following phrase:—"We do not think there is cause for anxiety as long as values continue in winze." At the date of that message the winze was down 52 ft., and at the bottom the value had fallen off to 9 dwts. over only 10 ins. All the directors say in this connection in their report is that "this winze is now down 52 ft., with an average of 14.7 dwts. over a width of 30 ins." Has no further sinking been done since the date of the cable above referred to? If not, why not say so? If there has, what are the results? To-morrow (Thursday) the company holds its meeting, and shareholders are thus afforded an opportunity for bringing pressure to bear upon the directors in regard to the publication of information. The chance should not be neglected.

There has been some Continental as well as local support for Kaffirs during the past week, and it has not been confined to the more speculative issues. Several of the dividend-paying outcrops and deep-level descriptions have strengthened, and it is believed this buying represents the re-investment of part of the dividend money recently distributed by Rand mining companies. During the last Stock Exchange account alone more than a score of companies paid the dividends declared in respect of the first half of the current year, the sum involved being well over three millions sterling. The probability is that the dividend record for the current half of the year will be still larger. In the matter of gold production the Transvaal has started the second half of 1910 in a promising fashion. July's output of 638,714 ounces is the second highest monthly total to date, only having been exceeded by that of December, 1908, which was 660,643 ounces. As, however, the latter total included some 30,000 ounces withdrawn from the mines' reserves and not actually produced in that month, the latest return may be said to constitute a fresh record. As was expected, the labour figures show a further falling off. The decrease last month was 3,226, of which the gold mines lost 1,917. The decline, however, is smaller than at the same period last year, and it is pretty evident that Rand authorities are not alarmed at the labour outlook, or we should not hear of the Bantjes having started crushing.

The announcement by the Taquah Mining and Exploration Company that crushing, which was originally suspended on account of an accident to the main shaft, will not be resumed until further development work has been carried out, has given rise to a feeling of disappointment in some quarters, but there is little doubt that the policy adopted will be to the benefit of the shareholders in the long run. The idea is to so enlarge the ore reserves as to warrant an extension of the present milling plant, which should enable working costs to be reduced, and thereby permit of lower grade ore being profitably treated. In regard to the question of finance, it is announced that "arrangements are being made with the Oceana Consolidated Company, Limited, for the provision of the requisite funds for the time being, so that no immediate issue of shares will be necessary." Rather more than twelve months ago the policy now decided upon in regard to the mine was recommended to the company by Mr. Arthur Wilkinson, who made a special report on the property. Had the directors not been so long in making up their minds they would probably have been able to raise the necessary further capital on better terms. At the beginning of the present year, when Taquahs were quoted over £3 apiece, there was persistent talk of an impending new issue of shares, but the matter was postponed, and now the decision has been made the price is nearer £2.

Wit. Deep Prospects.

Among the Rand shares of the dividend-yielding class which have been bought by speculative investors during the past week are Witwatersrand Deep, an old favourite of mine, as some readers of Truth will doubtless remember. About six months ago, when there were adverse rumours current as to the position at this mine, and the price of the shares dropped to $4\frac{5}{8}$, I pointed out that when the labour supply improved, and the water difficulty was overcome, better returns might be expected. The price of the shares is now $4\frac{15}{16}$ ex the dividend of 5s. per share recently paid in respect of the first half of the current year. According to a cable from a usually reliable Johannesburg correspondent, the bottom levels of the Wit. Deep, which have now been unwatered, are among the richest in the mine. "Profits" (the cable adds) "are expected to improve, and will probably allow of an increase in the rate of dividends to 60 per cent. per annum. The company is negotiating for the acquisition of additional ground." At the meeting last March the chairman said that, given a larger number of unskilled labourers, there was no reason why the mine should not work up to the capacity of its reduction plant, namely 45,000 tons, but the monthly returns show that the 40,000 ton mark has not yet been reached this year:—

INDUSTRIALS.

Further Rise in Egyptians—Oils Steady—Some Good Home Industrial Reports — Calico Printers' Fine Showing.

One of the best features of the industrial market last week was the further improvement in the shares of Egyptian land and finance companies. This movement must be especially welcome to many people who bought during the boomlet of a year ago, which collapsed through the falsification at the last moment of the hopes held out of a fine cotton crop. Fortunately the present recovery has a sound basis. Effective measures have been devised by the Government to overcome the worm pest, and the stronger action taken to repress revolutionary agitators has given great satisfaction locally. The coming season's cotton crop to date promises very well, and what is also of great importance it will fetch high prices to the fellaheen and the land companies. Last year the price ruling at harvest time was also very high, but as is pointed out by Mr. H. M. Salmony, of 28, Throgmorton Street, E.C., in the new edition of his useful little handbook of Egyptian securities, the fellaheen, owing to the habit of selling their crops forward, were in 1909 unable to derive much benefit from the high prices to which cotton went in the last few months of the year. Some idea of the brighter position for the native farmer this year may be gathered from the fact that the price of cotton on March 1, 1910, was $23 9-16 per cantar, as against $14 11-16 on the same date last year, while the present quotation is no less than $21. This means that whether the fellaheen have sold forward or not, they are assured of very remunerative prices. One of the most prominent shares in the market during the last few days has been United Egyptian Lands, which were bought on a report that the company had disposed of a large portion of its Rodah Island property to an English syndicate on good terms.

Oil shares have been quiet, but showed a firm tendency. The news from Maikop all suggests that it is only a matter of a few months before the field will be in a position to start producing in earnest. Amongst home industrial concerns the reports and dividends published by several important undertakings in the Midlands and North indicate a healthy condition of affairs. The Calico Printers' Association publishes net profits for the year ended June 30 of £394,300. These compare with only £113,300 for 1908-9, and are the best during the company's ten-year existence with the single exception of 1906-7, when the total reached £399,000. In view of the fact that the company in each of the two previous years drew £50,000 from reserve to make up the preference dividend, it has wisely decided to be extra liberal with its appropriations this time. Accordingly £150,000 has been placed to reserve fund, and £50,000 to capital reserve account. The dividend on the ordinary shares is only 2½ per cent., but it compares against nil for two years, and may be taken as an earnest of better things to come.

Bolckow Vaughan's dividend statement indicates that the drop in revenue of the past two years has been stayed. The company is distributing 6 per cent. on its ordinary shares as compared with 5 per cent., and carrying forward £162,300, which represents an addition of £33,900. Richard Hill and Company (1889), the steel wire drawers of Middlesbrough, displays an advance in sales of £9,700, while the net profits have advanced by £6,900 to £12,200. The dividend is raised from 1¼ to 6 per cent., and the appropriations are on a larger scale. The company's books are stated to be well filled with orders.

MISCELLANEOUS NOTES.

The Essequebo Wild Cat.

Another item of interest I have culled from the British Guiana Daily Chronicle relates to the Essequebo Rubber and Tobacco Estates, Limited. The Chronicle announces that after two months' consideration the Government of the colony has agreed that the four grants owned by Mr. Ho-a-Hing should be transferred to the company. These grants, it is stated in the local Press, were originally acquired by Mr. Ho-a-Hing for $100, were sold to "The Industrial Selections, Limited," for $10,000, who in turn sold them to the Essequebo Rubber and Estates, Limited, for £60,000. These statements are at variance with those made in the prospectus, which put the purchase consideration to be paid to Mr. Ho-a-Hing as £50,000, to be paid as to £30,000 in cash and £20,000 in cash or shares. Under these circumstances it is difficult to understand the optimistic references to the future of the company made by the chairman at the recent statutory general meeting. The price paid by the Consolidated Estates for its 400 licences averaged in round figures £400 per licence, while the Demerara Company for 57 licences paid about £800 per licence. The Essequebo Company have only four licences, for which they have paid £60,000. It is generally considered that a collecting area of less than a thousand square miles is useless owing to the fact that under the law balata trees can only be bled once in five years. Surely the best course for the directors to adopt would be to see whether it is not possible to get out of their bargain rather than carry on a concern which cannot possibly pay. Meanwhile the decision of the Governor is important as a declaration of his policy in regard to such transactions. He has taken the view that it is no business of the Government to interfere where mere British shareholders have had palmed off on them at a ridiculously high figure licences which have been obtained for a mere song. Two months' consideration might have sufficed to convince his Excellency that the interests of the colony would have been much better served by a refusal to transfer the licences. The credit of the colony is bound to suffer when it becomes known that any needy speculator can acquire a Government licence for a few dollars and transfer his interest in it for several thousand pounds to a confiding British public without question.

Bucket-Shop Blarney.

Duncan, Forbes and Co.—it is really astonishing how the Scotchmen, all born Scots, of course, monopolise the bucket-shop business—are still on the rampage. Here are the headlines to one of their latest typewritten circulars, copies of which have been sent out broadcast:—

INCREASE YOUR INCOME.
(SMALLER OR LARGER AMOUNTS IN PROPORTION.)
PAYABLE BY FORTNIGHTLY OR MONTHLY REMITTANCES.
CAPITAL GUARANTEED AGAINST LOSS.
EVERY FORTNIGHT'S DELAY MEANS LOSS OF DIVIDENDS.
UNIQUE OPPORTUNITY OWING TO LOW PRICES RULING.
THE HEAVY FALL IN PRICE HAS NOT AFFECTED OUR CLIENTS. NO ONE HAS LOST.

This is the prelude to a pressing invitation to all and sundry to join what the firm is pleased to call one of its "Complex Stock Deals" in American Rails. "Deriving our information from the great financial centres in different parts of the world," proceeds one of the circulars, "we never make a mistake with regard to the movements of the markets." It has been said that the man who never made a mistake never made anything, but your bucket-shop keeper treats ordinary maxims of business as so many skittles. "It is an undeniable fact, and thousands of people, to their sorrow, have to confess it, that a man with limited means who is induced to speculate on the ordinary terms offered him is bound to lose in the end, but being entrusted with vast amounts of money from our different clients we occupy the same position as the great magnates in New York, who having the necessary means at their command to see the transaction through, can command success." This is enough to make a cat laugh. Duncan Forbes and Co. in the same position as the great magnates in New York! Duncan Forbes, a bucket shop that helps to control the financial world by collecting £15 cover from any greenhorn who is ready to swallow the promise that it will be turned into £155 or more; Duncan Forbes, whose knowledge of the stock markets is so profound that it does not even appear to know that Grand Trunk Railway stocks are of £100 denomination, but makes out contract notes upon the ignorant delusion that they are 100 dollar securities; Duncan Forbes, the Monte Cristo who had to be levered by a writ before he would return to a customer a sum of £10 due as cover deposited, and who forgot to pay the profit that had accrued on paper. The magnates in New York do some strange things, but I have yet to learn that they pose as philanthropists by guaranteeing strangers at large against loss. Before leaving Duncan Forbes there is a little puzzle I should like solved. If a firm runs stock against its "clients" and every client wins, then is not the firm eternally engaged in paying out? And if so, how long will that firm remain in the position of a solvent let alone a magnate? Duncan Forbes in promising to guarantee "clients" against loss is kind, but to know who is going to guarantee Duncan Forbes would be useful.

Something for Nothing.

The day of the old-fashioned stockbroker, who bought stock for clients on the uncomfortable condition that the client had to pay, is over. After all, why should you be pestered with rude demands for money when you are engaged in the little innocent amusement of speculation? If men can telegraph without wires and fly without wings, why can't they make fortunes without cash? Well, here is the man who has just come to show that the thing can be done. Read this:—

SOMETHING FOR NOTHING.—An unique offer. A Call Option on £100 Stock Brighton "A" Free. You pay nothing and may receive a cheque for a very large amount.

This is the wording of an advertisement of William Harrold and Co., Moorgate Chambers, 72, Finsbury Pavement, London, E.C. To my sorrow I never heard of them before. A coupon is attached to the advertisement to be signed, which reads:—"I buy the call options for thirty days on £100 stock Brighton A, on the distinct understanding that the cost, £2, is deducted from my profits; that I pay you no money whatever. If no profit is shown I have no liability in the matter." This is merely a little financial hors d'œuvre, for "Our booklet, Money in the Making, shows how to open speculative accounts with small capital and complete limitation of risk, and further explains how it is possible to operate for a regular weekly profit. This book will be forwarded post free to all who fill in the coupon below." Of course, reader, the science of Something for Nothing is as yet only in its infancy, so, like some of those who have taken up the science of aviation, you must be prepared for thrills if you wish to pursue it. Meanwhile all praise to William Harrold and Co., the bold pioneers. Be sure I shall not neglect to watch their career.

Another Hawthorne Letter.

No. 4 in the series of the Hawthorne Follow Up letters has just been addressed to those who had not been induced, by having the secret of Solomon confided to them, to take a few shares in Mr. Hawthorne's Canadian Ophir. It is in the shape of a letter to new shareholders from Mr. G. J. Seay, manager to the Julian Hawthorne Company, and this gentleman expresses his gratification at being able to report that about 400 shareholders have weighed in with their subscriptions. This does not seem a very large response to such an extensive advertising campaign as that carried out by the company, and may, I think, be justly regarded more as a testimonial to British commonsense than to the merits of the Yankee share-pushers' scheme. With Mr. Seay's letter is enclosed one from Mr. Hawthorne himself, from which it appears that the latter gentleman has not yet made his appearance in England, but that he is to be expected very shortly on this side of the Atlantic. He expresses sorrow if his American methods have not appealed to English critics, and amusement at the criticisms, though as a newspaper man he expresses the belief that those criticisms will not lose the company a single subscription. An interesting fact gathered from Mr. Seay's letter is the disclosure that a letter sent out with the prospectus and purporting to be an independent expression of opinion upon the Hawthorne Company's properties was really written by Mr. Seay himself. Mr. Seay rightly concludes that this needs a word of explanation. He accordingly explains that he wrote the letter before he was officially connected with the Hawthorne Company and had given permission to the company to make use of it. In other words, Mr. Seay, as manager of the company, thinks he is justified in making use of a letter puffing the company, written by himself in his private capacity, without disclosing the fact that since it was written he has entered into fiduciary relationship with the company. This is another American method of which, I fancy, Mr. Hawthorne will find his critics on this side of the water do not approve.

"VIGILANT'S" LETTER BOX.

1. Inquiries addressed to me, which must be accompanied by a Coupon, can only be replied to through my "Letter Box." A coupon will always be found at the foot of the third page of the cover of Truth.

2. Three different stocks or shares are the limit for an inquiry covered by one coupon. If it is desired to make an inquiry respecting a larger number of stocks or shares an additional coupon or coupons (one for every three stocks or shares) must be forwarded. Inquiries in regard to Rubber shares must not be included in letters relating to other classes of securities.

3. Name and address, which must accompany all inquiries, should be written on the communication.

4. A nom-de-plume or initials (the former preferably) should be given if it is desired that the real name shall not appear in the paper.

5. Inquiries should be put as briefly as possible, plainly written and numbered.

6. Communications received after Friday may not be replied to in the following issue.

Railways.

A. C. B.—I know of no reason why the company should not continue to do well. But in view of the rise you might be content with your present holding. Assouan.—It is the usual redeemable in 1957, and dividend payable January and July and quoted at about 97.

Brady.—No. 1 is fair. I do not care particularly for 2 or 3 at present prices. See recommendations to "J. B. L." under "Mixed."

Eureka.—1. The higher-priced stock is the debenture stock, the lower-priced is the first preference, which was referred to a week ago. 2 and 3. Chatham first preference and Brighton "A" are both fair speculative investments.

Hull.—Such a rise is not unlikely, but the market is in so neglected a state at present that it is a thankless task to predict.

L. F.—The company's issues are not dealt in on this side. It would be necessary to make inquiries locally.

Mena.—I would select the ordinary stock of the parent line and the shares of the Eastern Extension, both of which I recommended in an article a few months ago. The company has offices at River Plate House, Finsbury Circus, E.C.

Westbury.—The company is for the present finding its guarantee upon the Extension rather a burden, hence the fall; but, of course, the guarantee it has given only lasts until 1912. You had better not compare with Pacific ordinary, which is valued not upon present dividends but prospects; the company has spent enormous sums which have yet to become remunerative.

Mines.

Africa.—(a) Price now about 25s. (b) They should be held, but I am not prepared to fix a limit. (c) They may do so eventually.

Bedford.—A very speculative holding at this price.

Carlo.—1. A fair speculative holding. 2. Very much of a gamble, and I do not recommend a purchase. Cave.—"Mines of Africa," published by the Statist, 51, Cannon Street, E.C. Ccsmos.—The dividend stage is some way off, but both shares have hopeful prospects, and should, I think, be held. Copperas.—Prospects are hopeful, and I think you should retain your interest. Clericus.—1. It is always as well to take a good profit when the opportunity occurs, especially on speculative securities. 2. I should be inclined to accept a more moderate return on these. 3. Very speculative; safest to take a small profit.

E. S. R.—The underwriting offer should be ignored.

Harpur.—1. Talked appreciably higher, but you had better be content with a moderate profit. 2. Might be kept as a pure speculation on the chance of some further recovery. 3. Fair speculation for a small profit. Huntcliffe.—I think the money could be employed to better advantage elsewhere.

Interested.—1. I see no reason to expect much early advance. 2. It is impossible to say. 3. Hold.

Kamna.—There is not much of a market in them just now, but they may revive with other descriptions later on, and a further purchase to average would seem a fair speculation.

Lockup.—See reply above to "Huntcliffe."

Mahlo a Mane.—The shares named appear a hopeful speculative lock-up. You might divide the amount at your disposal between these and Brakpans.

Quept.—Randfontein Central, Northern Nigeria, (Bauchi) Tin, Zinc Corporation Ordinary. Quorn.—I have seen no details of the concerns, and so far as I am aware there is no market in the shares on this side.

Wilfred.—They appear fully valued, and I think you could employ the money with less risk elsewhere.

Zinco.—1. The concern has fair prospects, and a recovery in the shares may be anticipated, but I cannot say how long it will be before they show you a profit. 2. Yes, there are better mines. The shares are very much of a speculation just now, as it remains to be seen how shareholders will be treated under the contemplated amalgamation scheme. 3. You have correctly interpreted the saying.

Mixed Securities.

Atlas.—1. Stocks such as you mention look good investments at present prices. But the market is at present out of fashion, and when the fashion will change is a matter that cannot be predicted. 2. The previous answer applies. At current levels I should not be inclined to sell. 3. It is a strong concern and they should make an excellent investment. Anxious (Norfolk).—1. They look good value, but in view of the absence of public support for the market better not buy with the idea of snatching quick turns. 2. Both sound of their class and do not look dear.

Castle Gate.—You could get a rather higher rate in the two issues named, but the security would not be so good. If you are a man of moderate means leave the money where it is. Cissie.—Of the mining shares named Midas Deep are the least hopeful. These might be sold together with the oil shares. Hold the others

Glamorgan.—1. The Bondholders' Register, 6d. fortnightly, 2, Nicholas Passage, Nicholas Lane, E.C. 2. There is a certain amount of risk attaching to them. 3. Worth holding.

Evoh.—1. Not advised. 2. Rather speculative. Envelope.—1 and 2. Not a share I recommend. 3. I have not a high opinion of the mining shares Itmaad-ud-daulat.—1. Should be all right, but line still very much in the making and margin at present not large. 2. A new proposition; debentures necessarily speculative. 3. Capital small relative to loans; reserve also small. Debentures second rate. 4 and 5. Both well secured. 6. Last dividend in 1908, which speaks for itself. Still, latest reports about concern rather more encouraging. 7. No dividends. I should prefer the 5 per cent. bonds of the Chilian Government. 8. May be regarded as fair amongst high-yielding bonds. 9. Well secured. Sorry, but I cannot attempt to say what would happen in the event you mention. Ipswich.—The railway stock looks a fair purchase at the present price. Of the mining shares named I prefer b, which is a hopeful speculative lock-up.

J. B. L.—There are not many stocks to be had now that return a clear 5 per cent. with very good security, but the following might suit your purpose:—Anglo-Argentine Tramways 5 per cent. debenture stock (new), Metropolitan Electric Tramways 5 per cent. debenture stock, Royal Mail Steamship 5 per cent. debentures, Chilian Government 5 per cent. bonds, Mortgage Company of Egypt 5 per cent. preferred shares, Central Uruguay Railway 5½ per cent. preference shares, City of Osaka 5 per cent. bonds, Mackay Companies 4 per cent. preferred, Northern Pacific Railway Common, Grand Trunk Railway 5 per cent. second preference, Buenos Ayres Western Railway ordinary, Elder Dempster 5 per cent. debenture stock, Chicago, Milwaukee, and St. Paul Railway Common, Imperial Ottoman Bank shares, London Bank of Mexico shares, and National Bank of Australasia shares.

Melita.—Distinctly speculative. M. G. A.—1. Still very much of a gamble. 2. The shares named are good of their kind. 3. Better not part with so high class a security. Having regard to its high character it is cheap. M. K. E.—1. This company has some excellent business in hand and there is not the least doubt that the shares will prove to be a good investment. I have no information regarding future calls. The special settlement has not yet been appointed. 2. I would not sell now. Some recovery later on seems probable.

Not.—You must be prepared to face some risk, but the company appears to be making fair progress and the shares might be held. National.—See reply to "J. B. L."

Pembridge.—1. They seem a fair purchase. 2 and 3. I am not greatly attracted by either at present.

Oxonian.—1. A promising speculative holding for appreciation and eventual dividends. 2. East Rand Proprietary should suit you, although, of course, no mining share can be regarded as absolutely safe. Separate letter required for rubber inquiries.

Romola.—I would select No. 1 if you can get them; if not, Royal Mail Steamship new 5 per cent. debentures.

Southsea.—1. A purchase would involve considerable risk, but there is a fair prospect of a purchase on a fall turning out well. 2. I can only suggest that you watch my Notes from week to week. Signet.—1. Prospects doubtful. I should be inclined to cut the loss. 2. Not a bond I care for. 3. Worth holding. Stanwell.—1-3. These might be retained for the present. 2-4. A more speculative lot, and it might be as well to exchange as suggested. A separate letter is required for rubber inquiries; see Rule 2. Stair.—I know of no reason for selling either.

Thurles.—Your investments have been carefully selected. You might add National Railways of Mexico 4½ per cent. prior lien bonds and Metropolitan Electric Trams 5 per cent. debenture stock.

Rubber.

Agra.—1. Keep these for the guaranteed dividend. 2. Retain these also for the present, but later on when markets improve you might with advantage exchange them. 3. Keep these for a good profit eventually, and buy more if the price declines still further. Albion.—Do not sell now. No doubt you will see a higher price than the present within the next six months; I do not advise you to hold these permanently. Aberdeen.—1. Yes, average. 2. Do not sell your Rubber Investment Trust Shares now. Alpha.—You will be sorry if you sell now, after such a severe fall there must be a reaction shortly, and both companies will prove satisfactory concerns in the end. Anxious (Herne Hill).—I have no wish to speak disrespectfully of the Equator or any ancient institution, but the statements in the article in the Encyclopædia Britannica to which you call my attention would not be made by any one with a practical knowledge of the rubber industry of to-day. Ace (Leeds).—You may safely average 1 and 2, but I cannot advise you to buy more of 3. 4. I fear that this is likely to prove a very unsatisfactory business for you, but I can give you no further information just now. Sell whenever you get the chance. Author.—You have three very good shares, all of which should stand higher within the next year. 1. It is not easy to answer this question, as you bought at a rather high price. 2. If you wish to sell you had better part with that which first shows you a profit. 3. All good, but you will get the largest dividend from 2. Anglo.—Some companies do their best to cope with the difficulty of arrears of clerical work, but the extraordinary delays you mention should have been prevented either by an increase of the staff or of the number of board meetings. Write direct to the secretary in each case, and ask when the certificate will be ready, and if you do not get a satisfactory reply call his attention to the requirements of the Companies (Consolidation) Act of 1908, section 92, sub-section 2, by which he will then be liable to a "fine of five pounds for every day during which the default continues." Asaram.—1. This is not a company that I favour, and I do not care to suggest a selling limit. If what you say comes to pass you will be able to take a profit. Do not wait too long. 2. The price given was too high. The price of the shares in the new concern has hardly come up to expectations, and therefore it was a good deal for the seller of the Southern Ceylons.

Brighton Novice.—1. No. 2. Yes. 3. Hold for recovery. You will see an improvement in these within the next two months. Bexhill.—1. A speculative share which may have a jump at any time. 2. In two years time or less will be a first-rate producer. 3. Not a bad concern, but at the same time I should take a profit. Bedford.—1. A fair concern. If you have the shares keep them for the first dividend, which should be paid early next year. 2. I am not impressed with the prospects of this company. Retain for the present, but sell before the end of the year. 3. There is very little market for this share, which I do not recommend. You will have to wait a long time for a dividend, but the present is not the time to try to sell. Bahru.—1. This is an excellently managed company, and the price of the shares will no doubt advance before the end of the year. 2. Probably by the time the first balance-sheet is issued. 3. September or October. Boltonius.—This company is in excellent hands, and will probably do well in time, but you will have to wait a long time before you get a good dividend. Bareilly.—1. Reaction after over-speculation. 2. Yes. The big producers. 3. See Rubber Notes. 4. I hope so. Bell.—1, 3, and 4. These are likely to become remunerative investments. 2. I do not care for this concern, and I think that you would be well advised to sell on a market recovery and reinvest in an Eastern company. Beetle.—1-3. Buy some more at the present low price.

Circumstance.—1. These will probably show a considerable advance during the next two months. 2. No dividend possible for about two and a-half years. If you see your price again you had better sell. 3. This is an unsatisfactory concern. Wait for a better market, then sell. Carmelite.—A dividend is expected next year. Clifford.—1. Although I do not expect to see much movement in the shares until the end of the year, I should certainly average at present price. 2. Hold these at all events for a profit. 3. Keep them for a few months, but not permanently. Colm.—1. You may safely retain these as a permanent investment. 2. You had better wait for improvement here, which is sure to come sooner or later. Charles.—As the capital letter in your pseudonym is so badly formed I can only hope that I have correctly guessed it while fearing that I have not. 1. A company with fair prospects. Hold for better times. 2. The friends of this company are quite sanguine as to the future. I have never recommended the share, but the outlook has undoubtedly improved, and if you hold the shares I should advise you to keep them for dividends. 3. This company has plenty of remunerative business in hand, and the results for the current year should be good. Celestial.—Hold on for about another two months, and then write again. Crude (Cork).—You would do well to average now in the case of 1 and 3. 2. Is cheap at the reduced price. C. R.—This is not a share that I recommend, but I advise you to wait for some months before attempting to sell. You will then see how the estates develop. Clovelly.—Keep all the shares named for recovery. This is not the time to think about selling any rubber shares. Write again later in the year regarding selling limits. Chin.—Regarding all your shares, see first part of reply to "C. R." Chaman.—See Rubber Notes. Clarence.—A good list of speculative investments, very much on a level at present prices. Chub.—1. I should certainly hold these for recovery. I will make inquiries as to prospects for remaining months of the year. Chageford.—1. Thanks for your interesting table, which is useful so far as it goes, but one year's dividend is too limited a basis. I prefer six or seven years'. 2. See article. 3. Actual dealing price. Supplies in small quantities continue to arrive out of season, and dealers hold stocks all the year round.

Dunlop Junior.—Wait until the meeting, which will soon be announced, and if there is any point then upon which I can give you further information I shall be happy to do so. Dahlia.—I should average all of them. Dartmoor.—It was a mistake to send the post-dated cheque to the bankers, as they were bound to return it to you. The best course to adopt is again to write to the secretary asking for an extension of time, and offering to pay interest on the amount of the overdue call. This will, of course, amount to only a few shillings. Dorco.—1. I should not buy them. 2. At present price they must prove a highly remunerative investment. The prospects will be fully discussed at the meeting. 3. Yes, as a speculative investment. Duffer.—I believe that you "will get out on the right side" by waiting. The decline in some of these is overdone. Diamo.—I have nothing to add to what I have already said about these shares. I should exchange them at the first opportunity. Devonshire.—1 and 2. Batu Caves and Malacca Ordinary and Preference are all £1 shares fully paid. 3. There are no Preference shares in Batu Caves. 4 and 5. Three questions only are permissible with one coupon, but your fifth query will be answered fully at the meeting. Draper.—A purchase of any of them at present price should turn out well.

Earley.—These may be all that you state, but they are not shares that I could recommend. Eastbourne.—I have still faith in the future of the company, but we must now wait for the meeting.

Fee.—I consider that these shares are a very good lock-up 6 per cent. investment with a prospect of increase in capital value in the future. Fad.—1. I should certainly encourage you to make this exchange. 2. Probably the company will become a good producer, but on dividend estimates the present price seems high enough.—Farmer.—1. The special settlement will probably take place next month. 2. The first year. 3. Both are sound companies. 4. Year ends in December, but the report is not issued until April, so that although a dividend will probably be earned for the current year it may not be paid before next April. 5. There appears to be no doubt about the success of this company. Fountain (Belfast).—1. Do not sell now, but when markets harden do not fail to sell if you can get a small profit. 2. Keep these for a dividend. Fanny.—1. I do not like the situation of the property, and should advise you to sell at the first favourable opportunity. 2. Retain for recovery. They ought to see your price again during the next six months. 3. See third reply to "Brighton Novice." Field.—1 and 2. Both in 1912. 3. I should not hold them. Frisco.—1 and 3. This company will possibly begin to tap next year, but the shares are not an investment that I can recommend even at the present low price. Fishergate.—I take it that you purchased all the shares mentioned at considerably higher prices than the present, and therefore think that you would do well to average those you have underlined. I am glad to reply to your queries, but I do not care to suggest selling limits until markets become more active.

Gap.—Yes. Batu Tiga and Northumberland Rubber and Tea. Grin.—1. Hold for recovery. 2 and 3. See first reply to "C. R." Gollywog.—You are perfectly safe if, as I suppose, you hold the guaranteed shares. Grena.—1. I do not agree with you that all stockbrokers are pessimistic regarding the outlook for all rubber shares. Some of them have acquired knowledge of this section of the market which they did not possess during the boom, and their clients are likely to benefit considerably thereby. 2. Before the end of the year. 3. This is a question that should have been addressed to the secretary. Grouse. If you care to buy them and lock them up I should not dissuade you from purchasing, but I do not think that they are "likely to appreciate considerably in the near future." Gloriana.—I should certainly keep these for at least another six months.

H. H.—You need not be anxious about the depreciation in the price of this. Keep your shares and try to work out the yield again. You will find that at the price you gave you get more dividend than you did on the old investment, and the price will recover. Hope.—Do not sell now. Ultimately the shares will be a profitable investment, although the price has fallen recently. When you can do so you had better average. Holdfast.—1 and 2. These may eventually give you a good return on your money. 3-6. See first part of reply to "C. R." H. F. C.—(1) Hold your Kamna shares at all events until the publication of the report on the property which is going to be made by Mr. Lillingston. 2. These are worth holding for the guaranteed dividend. Hayrick.—1. I should not buy these. 2. You might take your profit and buy Madagascar Ordinary. Homer.—Average those which show the greatest decline. Hopeful.—You had better buy Merlimaus or Beverleys. Haverclip.—1. The shares are, of course, 10s. paid. The newspaper in question would no doubt be grateful if you pointed out their mistake. 2. See third reply to "Brighton Novice." Harpur.—1. I have consistently advised sales of these. Wait, however, now for a month or so; perhaps the price may be pushed up when the quotations for good shares advance. Buy the shares of 2, but not of 3.

Iona.—1-3. You should retain these for a time, but do not look upon them as permanent investments. Ikona.—Keep these for another year or two. Iron.—As you bought more than you could pay for I cannot help you. Irresistible.—1. Good to hold as an investment, but will improve in value. 2. In excellent hands, not dear at present price.

Juch.—1. Buy the shares. If you buy the "Options" you simply purchase the right to subscribe for shares at par at a future time. 2. The price, at the time of writing, is 15s. to 17s. 6d. premium, but, of course, may have changed before you see this. You might take your profit at 1 premium. 3. The estate is doing better, but other shares are more attractive. Jerry M.—I should wait for the meeting. J. V. M.—Probably they will both be at a higher price then, but I do not care to venture on an exact prediction. Jim.—You had better await developments, but you will be fortunate if you ever get your money back. J. A. G.—Hold for a time, but get rid of them when markets improve. Joey.—Buy either some more Linggis to average or some Madagascar Preference. Have nothing to do with outside brokers. There is a firm of this name on the Stock Exchange, but their address is not the one you give.

Killiney.—1. Wait for the meeting, which will probably be held in about ten days' time. 2. Hold these for a much higher price or for dividends. Kubu.—1-3. You ought to have said whether you hold the shares, and if so the price you gave. They are not desirable purchases. Kim.—This is a good property excellently managed, but as planting commenced only in 1907 no dividend will be forthcoming for about another three years.

La Verdad.—Hold for the meeting which is to take place shortly. Leigh.—I do not recommend them, but if you have them do not sell just now. 2 and 3 will probably develop into fair speculative investments. London.—The report will perhaps be published before this reaches your eye, so that there is no point in my endeavouring to estimate the dividend. Lieut.—1. Hold for investment. 2. Crude Rubber or Madagascar Ordinary.

Margate.—A and C. I think that it is quite likely you will see your price in both during the next twelve months. B. These are talked much better, but should the price rise to that which you gave you would do well to sell. Milton.—You had now better wait for the meeting. Malacca.—1. See reply to "Milton." 2. They are obviously a speculative investment, but the statement to which you refer is absurd. Mortlake.—You may buy any of the shares you name with every prospect of making a profit before the end of the year, or if you prefer it they are worth holding for dividends. M. G. A.—Buy Kuala Lumpur.

Nat.—1. Average the Crudes. 2. Thanks very much. Norway.—Of the shares you name I should buy Linggi, Selangor, and Batu Caves, and hold for a good profit, or for investment. Nowgong.—Madagascar Preference, Beverley Tea and Rubber, and Batu Tiga. Nero.—1. I advise you to retain all your shares until there is a market revival. 2. I do not think so. Neptune.—Average now and hold for a dividend. National.—1. You have an excellent list of rubber shares, all of which you should retain. 2. Average your Highlands and Anglo-Malays. Noswal.—No. Keep them, they should advance again with more active markets. North Sea.—A recovery in the price is expected, but it is too early to talk about a dividend with certainty.

Oily Rubber.—Sell when you get the opportunity. Old China.—The market think well of this company. It is said that the estates are in excellent condition. You had better hold for recovery. Osbourne.—1. See reply to "Eastbourne." 2. This is a good company, and should pay an excellent dividend for the current year. Do not sell. 3. Hold what you have for recovery. Ouse.—1. See reply to 'Eastbourne." 2. Should earn a good dividend for the current year. The accounts are made up to December 31, but are not issued until April, so that you may not hear about the dividend for some months. 3. See last part of the reply to "Fishergate." Ousel.—1. Labour and other conditions in Brazil prevent "vastly increased output." 2. Prices in London, New York, Antwerp, and Para are carefully watched, and they rise and fall together.

Puzzled (Hamburg).—As you are a foreigner I should like to congratulate you on your perfect command of the English language, but if you really desire to have my opinion on your holding you must avoid the use of sarcasm. The present is not the time to sell any rubber shares nor to fix selling limits. There will probably be greater activity in the market next month, when you may write again. Pomona.—See first reply to "H. F. C." Have nothing to do with the firm in question.

Puzzled (Clifton).—If you do not hold the shares do not buy any. If you have already bought I shall be pleased to answer any definite questions you may like to put. It is a rather "tall order" to ask me to state anything that I can find out about it. Prometheus.—Hold what you have and average if there is a further decline. Plum.—You could not do better than average 2, 4, or 5. See last part of the reply to "Fishergate." Parrot.—Of the three you mention I should buy only No. 3. Pemk.—I should not sell any of these. They should all stand higher before the end of the year. Perak.—1. This is one of the best. 2 and 3. These companies are well managed, but I should not look upon the shares as a good permanent investment. If you get the opportunity of taking a profit, as you may in the next few months, I advise you to do so.

Rudolph.—You should hold all the shares named for a market recovery. See last part of the reply to "Fishergate." The Malacca meeting will be held shortly. Red Hugh.—1. These matters will all be discussed at the meeting. 2. If a certificate is not issued within two months of the date of registration of the transfer the secretary and every director is liable to a fine of "not exceeding £5 for every day during which the default continues," according to the Companies Act, Section 92. Rags.—Retain all for the present, but when markets improve so that you can sell without loss exchange 1 and 2 for more promising shares. R. S. T.—1. You might average. 2. The meeting will not be held until the end of the year. 3. Before the end of the year. 4. "Rubber Facts and Figures," 1s. 1d. Mathieson and Sons, 16, Copthall Avenue, London, E.C. Rhubarb.—It would be quite unreliable if one tried to estimate the amounts of the first dividends on the shares mentioned, with the exception of 3, which will probably get 10 per cent. during the year. A dividend is expected on Kinta Kellas during the next few months and on the other shares next year.

Success.—1 and 3. Both good to hold for dividends, and will probably advance in price when markets improve. 2. Worth holding for the guaranteed dividend, but no advance in the quotation may be expected. See last part of the reply to "Fishergate." Stupid.—If you sell now you will gladden the hearts of the "bears," whose game you will be playing. Hang on to them for another few months at least. S. (Mrs.).—Of the shares you name Linggis are the best. S. G.—I advise you not to buy these shares. Saffrons.—You have a good list, but it is a great pity you did not take your profit two months ago on half your holdings in 1 and 2. Do this when prices advance again, and retain the remainder of 1 and 2 as well as 4 as permanent investments. 3. Wait for better markets, then sell these. 5. Kamunings. Stella.—Do not pay any attention to such tales. These are the "buns that 'bears' feed on." Sainte Beuve.—1. Yes. 2. I think it is quite likely that these shares may have a good rise before the end of the year. 3. If you hold them at a higher price average now. Sepia.—a and b. Will probably go better, but cannot fix selling limit. 3. The estimate was 55,000 lbs. d and e. There will be a renewal of activity. f. No special reason. g. It will take another four years for the estate to produce fully. h. Paid-up £143,750. Saxon.—Do not sell either just now. 1. Will prove a very good investment. 2. Is in good hands, and should ultimately do well, but you will have to wait for dividends. S. H.—See reply to "Anglo" and second reply to "Red Hugh." The delay is exceedingly annoying, and to a layman seems preventable, but it is the company's fault, not that of the broker's. Snowball.—It would be advisable not to buy them.

The Girl.—As you acquired the shares in such an interesting way you certainly ought to keep them for a time apart from their merits. I am, however, pleased to say that they are more likely to improve than depreciate. Tulloch.—I assume that you do not already hold 1 and 3, and advise you not to buy just now. 2. Keep these. Testy.—I do not think you need worry about these two shares. They should turn out good rubber investments. T. J. M.—I advise you to retain all these as promising rubber investments. T. H. S.—I think that all the shares in your list are likely to recover eventually to the prices you have paid. Do not think of selling any of them just now. No. 7 is the only one about which I am doubtful, but that is spoken well of in some quarters. Tyro.—Thanks for your letter and interesting enclosure. You will have to pay the calls. Even if you forfeit your shares the company could bring an action for the recovery of the unpaid instalments. T. H. C. W.—Hold for recovery. A dividend is expected this year. Tiswas.—1. Sell on a rise. 2. Hold for at least a 6s. profit. 3. Yes. Linggis are the better investment.

Uneasy (Sussex).—I should average now.

Vancouverite.—1 and 2. Both of these ought to go better by the end of the year, but in any case they are good enough to hold for dividends. I do not suppose, however, that 1 will get much of a dividend before 1912. 3. I regret that I have no knowledge of the prospects of this company. There is no market, or information obtainable, on this side. Viridian.—1-3. See reply to "Eastbourne." Venezia.—I should advise you to buy 3 and leave 1 and 2 alone.

Whitstable.—1. Kinta Kellas. 2. Merlimau. 3. May recover the whole amount of the decline within the time mentioned. Whitley Bay.—1. Possibly not before Christmas, but they will eventually. 2. Yes. Walmer.—I think it will be well to sell any allotment you get if you can do so without much loss. Do not adopt the suggestion contained in the latter part of your letter; as you imagine, the offer is not made from philanthropic motives. Walmer (second letter).—1. An unsatisfactory company. 3. Very similar. 2. Good to hold for the guaranteed dividend. Do not sell 1 and 3 until markets recover somewhat.

Zero.—I have no hesitation in telling you not to buy them.

Miscellaneous.

Banana.—It is a rather disquieting development. Perhaps it would be best to get out now. Bee.—The reduction affects the shareholders, not the debenture holders. The stock you have had better be held. Blazes.—The company has the advantage of practical management, and its shares may be regarded as a promising speculation.

Cold.—All three highly speculative, and at present I have no favourable news concerning either. Cerebos.—At the existing price they should be worth holding. If any reliance can be placed upon the chairman's dividend forecast the shares are cheap. Castell.—Leave the firm alone. It has been frequently condemned in Truth. Better get into touch with a Stock Exchange firm through your banker or solicitor. Casiletonian.—1 and 3. I am afraid you have no ground for claiming a return of the money. As regards the reference, I cannot recall it offhand, but if you can give me the date I will look up the name. 2. Please repeat this question for an answer under "Insurance." Clarence.—They are liable to fluctuate according to the state of trade; but the shares are a high-class investment. C. G.—Many criticisms lately; they will be eligible for the next Cautionary List.

Delta.—What do I think of it? Merely another indication that there are a few greenhorns still left in the world. Dalmon.—Prospects good but goodwill very large, and until it is either written down heavily or big reserves accumulated the shares must be regarded as very speculative.

E. P.—No; nor with any other "outsiders."

Fountane (Belfast).—Company is understood to have done fairly well, but it will be possible to appraise the shares better when the report comes to hand.

Geranium.—Hold all three. Grimsby.—1. Such a yield involves some risk. You will find a list of desirable 5 per cent. investments given to "J. B. L." under "Mixed Securities." 2. A solid concern, but recent results have been disappointing. Green Ginger.—1. It is an issuing house of standing. 2. See Rule 2. 3. I do not recommend them.

Hard Up.—I prefer No. 2.

Innocent.—I believe it went badly. The issue was not in my opinion at all attractive.

J. J. B.—Pay no attention to the offer.

Lave.—Hold 1 and 3. A further purchase of 1 might turn out well later. I do not care for 2.

Marengo.—Not a concern I recommend, for the reasons given in frequent articles during the past year.

Retlaw.—I do not care for the concern and advise you to sell your shares.

Sylyarx.—Worth holding as a speculation. Sepwell.—1. Sorry, but the concern is unfamiliar. 2. Sell them if your broker can find a purchaser. S. G. C.—1. It has so far had a very poor career, and I am afraid the shares are not worth much. 2. I do not recall having heard of the company before.

T. F. and others.—Thanks for the Duncan Forbes circulars, which are having attention.

Wide Awake.—Sorry; it is not a concern with which I am familiar. Walmer.—I do not recommend them.

Estate Duty Policies—How £200 a Year for Life Saves £400 a Year for Ever—Origin and Operation of Bonuses.

THE use of life assurance as a method for providing estate duties brings out very clearly one aspect of life assurance in general. It is quite clear that if the owner of an estate does not take a policy for the amount of the duty the capital value of his estate will be decreased, and consequently the income of his descendants will be diminished by the amount of the interest which would have been earned on the capital paid away in duties.

Money saved is money earned, and just as the small amount of income required for the annual premium on an estate duty policy prevents loss of income to heirs, so, quite apart from estate duties, a policy which provides an income for a man's descendants earns it in perpetuity at the cost of a diminution of his own income for a few years. If we take the simple case of a man aged thirty who effects a non-profit whole life policy for £10,000 at an annual premium of £200, payable so long as he lives, it is clear that the payment of £200 a year during one lifetime secures an income in perpetuity of £400 a year if we reckon that the capital yields interest at the rate of 4 per cent.

It is surely a very striking fact that £200 a year for thirty or forty years will provide £400 a year for ever. Of course, the exact figures vary with the age at which the policy is taken, and the kind of policy it is; it may even be that a single payment of £200 will secure £400 a year for ever, since if the assured died within twelve months of taking a policy a result of this character would follow. It is, of course, simple in the extreme for anyone to see for himself what result he can obtain on any basis he chooses, and under any sort of policy he selects. The prospectuses of life assurance companies quote the rates of premium for each £100 assured. Turning to the rate for his own age, and for the kind of policy he wants, he can see the rate per cent. of the sum assured that he will have to pay as premium. Under a non-profit policy he compares this rate with the interest that he thinks the capital will yield, and at once finds that for £2, or £3, or £5 a year for life, or for a limited number of years, his descendants will receive in perpetuity £3, or £3 10s., or £4 a year.

The calculation cannot be made quite so easily or definitely when with-profit assurance is selected, since in such a case it is necessary to know not only the rate of bonus that will be received on the policy, but also the length of time after the effecting of the assurance before the policy becomes a claim. Since, however, well-chosen with-profit assurance is, as a rule, more advantageous than non-participating policies, it may be reckoned with confidence that the results will be even better than those I have quoted above.

It may well be asked how it is possible for a single payment of £20 to yield £40 in perpetuity; or how it is possible that £20 a year for thirty-five years will yield the same result. To some extent a different answer has to be given to the two questions, or, rather, there are two answers to the first question, and one to the second.

It is possible for £20 a year from age thirty until death to produce £1,000, which if invested at 4 per cent. interest will yield £40 a year; this result is due to the accumulation of money at compound interest. Plenty of people are willing to pay £40 for the use of £1,000 for one year, and it is the accumulation, or compounding, of the interest that makes a small sum grow to a large one in the course of time. Hence the surprising, almost unbelievable, fact that £20 a year for thirty-five years will produce thereafter £40 a year for ever is due to the earning of interest upon interest, a process which is for practical purposes possible in connection with life assurance, and not possible in any other way.

This is one of the answers to the question How a single payment of £20 can produce a perpetual annual income of £40, but it is not the only answer to that question. Life assurance not merely accumulates money at compound interest, but it also tends to equalise or average the duration of life from a financial point of view. Under a non-profit policy two men of the same age at commencement undertake to pay the same premium for the same amount of assurance. One man may die in the first year, and the other one may live for a great many years. When we are concerned, as a life office is, not with only two, but with a great many policy-holders, average results are experienced, and consequently some people will die unusually soon and some will live exceptionally long. There will be comparatively few very early deaths and comparatively few people living to extreme old age. The deaths will cluster most thickly about a mean, or average, point, and it is only by association with others that average results are obtained.

These considerations suggest a reconciliation between two diverse points of view, each of which has much in its favour. It is fairly well known that the system of bonuses, which now play so large a part in life assurance, originated in the ignorance which formerly prevailed in regard to mortality. The founders of the Old Equitable Society wanted to make sure that the premiums they were charging were sufficient to provide the benefits promised. After some years they had more money than could possibly be required to meet their liabilities; and since there were no shareholders to take the surplus funds, the only thing to be done was to distribute the balance as fairly as might be among the policy-holders. Hence the origin of the bonus system, which in all probability nobody would have invented for its own sake. In fact, there are some high authorities who have maintained that life assurance will never be at its best until the actual cost of it is so definitely known that non-profit policies can be issued at—for all practical purposes—their exact cost. In contrast with this view it is easy to argue strongly in favour of bonus systems which give increasing benefits to those who live and pay premiums for a great many years. It is a fundamental principle of life assurance that it equalises the financial consequences resulting from the uncertainty of the time of death; therefore the man who lives long and pays much is not entitled to receive any more than the man who dies soon and pays little. This notion of average results is not readily appreciated to its full extent by the majority of people; and if the constituents of life assurance are analysed it is easy to see the appropriateness of those who live long and pay much receiving more than those who die soon and pay little.

I have repeatedly explained that the premiums on a life policy are used for two purposes, one being protection and the other savings. So far as protection is concerned, equality of results is perfectly fair and right. If many people of the same age pay £1 a year under a term policy, which secures £100 if death occurs within the year, the arrangement is perfectly fair which returns no part of the premium to those who survive; they have had protection, and nothing but protection. Whether they live long or die soon the general body of policy-holders experience average results, which after all is the special purpose for which they combine. Part of each premium paid, however, is applied for savings bank purposes. In regard to this part of the premium it is entirely fitting that the accumulated savings should vary with the contributions of each individual. It cannot be foretold exactly what rate of interest will be earned in future years, and consequently a system which distributes on a fair basis such surplus or profit as arises between the contributors would be difficult to beat. So far as policy-holders combine for protection purposes uniform results in the shape of the protection provided constitute an ideal arrangement. So far as they combine for investing or savings purposes increased return for those who contribute much is equally ideal, and I for one fail to see how this latter object can be accomplished more completely and effectively than by a fair system of bonus distribution. In ways that I have many times explained, co-operation for investment purposes is carried out with singular felicity and success by means of life assurance. Perhaps the advantages of co-operation for protection are more frequently thought of in connection with assurance, but both purposes are accomplished with unique success under well-chosen policies of life assurance.

Answers to Correspondents.

[Inquiries on the subject of insurance are answered in this column every week. Every letter containing an inquiry must be accompanied by a coupon cut from the third page of the coloured cover of Truth.]

J. W. W. G., Watford.—I think the results you have obtained under your policies are extremely bad; they happen to be all you are entitled to, and you have no remedy. Even the new policy which you quote is unattractive, and it seems to me not improbable that these definite guarantees will be given at the expense of the participating policyholders in the company. Daw.—You do not tell me the amount payable at death under the original policy, which, however, I judge to be £20. If I am right in supposing this, the sum of £30 in cash is a liberal commutation of the sickness benefit. I think you would do well to accept the terms offered. Fodla, Dublin.—(1) As you say, the company is first class and the policy is fairly good, though not the best you could obtain. You would do better with the United Kingdom Temperance Institution. (2) The scheme you mention is the best for your purpose. Zouave.—(1) You are certainly liable to pay compensation; the age does not relieve you of liability. (2) I doubt if any company would insure the risk in connection with this one employee by himself. It is always dangerous and foolish to suppress facts. (3) The best plan seems to be to pay the premium which you have been quoted; I do not think it excessive. H. Lewis, Belmont.—You should tell your man to discontinue his policy, and pay no more. Tun Wells.—The Institution is one of the best there is; its bonus prospects are excellent. G. C. C.— (1) and (2) Mutual Life Insurance Company of New York. See my article last week. (3) The results are good, but I do not think it would be difficult to name other companies which would give bonuses of greater value than the one you quote. You must remember it was a tontine bonus, and nothing would have been paid in the way of bonus had death occurred within the twenty years. Scarboro'.—There are no expenses worth mentioning in connection with the transaction. I cannot tell you the loss on realising your stock without knowing how much you paid for it. Tilney.—The plan you mention is a very good one indeed, and the Scottish Temperance is the best for your purpose. Blenheim.—You have chosen a very good policy in a very good office. Not only can you not do better, but you cannot do so well elsewhere. Victory.—The society is extremely good, and its bonus prospects are excellent. I should advise you to take the policy. J. J. C., Rathmines.—I gather that you wish to buy an annuity to be paid for in ten years by annual premiums, but I am not sure whether you want the annuity to commence ten years hence or only at your death if your wife survives you. For so young an age an annuity to begin ten years hence is rather unattractive. If you have no one else to provide for I should think your best plan is to pay by annual premiums for ten years, or for life if you like, for the assurance of an income commencing at your death and continuing so long as your wife survives you. In the event of her prior death the premiums paid would be returned to you. Obtain quotations from the Commercial Union and the Norwich Union Life Offices.

COMPANY MEETINGS.

PEKIN SYNDICATE.

Improved Prospects.

The ordinary general meeting of the Pekin Syndicate, Limited, was held on the 11th inst. at the Cannon Street Hotel, Cannon Street, E.C., Sir Richard Davis Awdry, K.C.B., presiding.

The Chairman said: Gentlemen,—Since I last had the pleasure of addressing you, the scheme of arrangement which the present board had formulated for reconciling the rights of the company's different classes of shares, and which you then agreed to, has received the sanction of the High Court of Justice. This scheme, as you are aware, has removed all difficulties in respect of the rights attached to the various classes of shares, and we are now for the first time in a position to present to you one profit and loss account, made up in accordance with the articles of association. I think we have every reason to congratulate ourselves on this reconciliation scheme having been successfully carried through. The directors' report, and the satisfactory communication from the consulting engineer issued with that report, put you in possession of all existing matters of importance, but with your permission I will make a few observations. First, in regard to our financial position, the profit and loss account shows the sum of £245,051 14s. 2d. standing to the credit of that account. There is, besides, a reserve of £106,022 19s. 9d., derived from the premium obtained on the issue of ordinary shares, whilst, under a suspense account, there appears a credit of £37,851 0s. 6d. This latter sum is held in suspense pending settlement of a dispute between ourselves and a firm of railway contractors. The dispute in question has been referred to arbitration, which (the question being therefore, so to say, sub judice) prevents further comment at the present moment. After anxious consideration and the fullest discussion, the new board, which only assumed office six months ago, mindful of your interests, have unanimously decided, notwithstanding the large amount standing to the credit of profit and loss, to carry forward these credits, and not to recommend the declaration of a dividend at the present period of the company's development, but rather to accumulate funds and thus strengthen and consolidate its financial position. Our capital, gentlemen, is practically intact, and being represented by securities and money in the banks, and in the hands of the Government, is absolutely liquid. We have no debenture debt, and no interest to pay on loans. The principal reason why we do not recommend the payment of a dividend at this stage is that we found the Pekin Syndicate, after thirteen years of existence, sound and healthy in body, but a veritable dwarf, considering its potentialities, which will require large resources for their development. As a matter of fact, there are other sources of profit which have the board's active attention, but it would be premature to speak of them at this moment. The board therefore feel that you will endorse their decision that it is absolutely in the interests of the Syndicate that no dividend should be paid. Passing from finance to the commercial and industrial situation, the board found themselves face to face with many difficulties which required the closest attention, and as it was imperative to put them on a very much more satisfactory basis, they decided, as their first initial step, to send out a special representative to China. They chose as their representative Mr. George Brown, formerly H.B.M. Consul at Kewkiang, who was accompanied by Mr. F. W. North, one of the company's consulting engineers. These two gentlemen left England in April last, and have been actively engaged in your interests since their arrival in China. Mr. North, in his preliminary communication, confirms in every particular all that you already knew regarding the company's coalfield, and has proved that the coal is excellent and the supply practically unlimited. We are also told that, pending the unwatering of Nos. 1 and 2 shafts, it is possible to increase the output from shafts Nos. 4 and 6 to 2,000 tons per day. The board have given the necessary instructions that this should be done. The board is hoping to place the sales of coal on a much more satisfactory basis than has hitherto obtained, and I am able to tell you that last week we received a cable from Mr. Brown stating that he had secured a reduction in the railway rates to Tientsin, and we have purchased skows (boats) so as to enable us to convey coal by water more economically. Up to December 31 last some 99,000 tons of the various grades of coal were sold, the proceeds of which, after deducting cost of producing, freight, etc., have been credited to working expenses account. It would be no criterion whatsoever to use the figures in connection with these sales as a basis for future calculations as to profits; hence the reason for not setting them out in the accounts, because, as you will readily understand, these charges were necessarily heavy in connection with the initial output, which was small during the greater part of the period ending December 31. As these initial expenses have now practically ceased, full particulars in regard to sales and returns from the beginning of the present year will be given in our next accounts, and considering the reduction in the railway rates, which I just now mentioned, we have every reason to believe that the results will be highly satisfactory. We have instructed Mr. Brown to apply to the Chinese Government for the permit to start working the iron ore under our concession. Mr. North, who is now on his way home, is bringing with him copious notes taken on the spot in consultation with our local engineers, and as soon as we have his technical knowledge to advise us we shall actively take in hand the question of erecting the necessary blast furnaces and all the other paraphernalia of an up-to-date iron manufacturing industry. In the meantime experiments have already been carried out on the spot as to the best method of dealing with the particular class of ore which outcrops at various points of our Honan Concession. The directors take this opportunity of stating that it will always be their most earnest endeavour to work in harmony with the Chinese Government and the provincial authorities in all transactions they may have together, which they feel sure will be reciprocated by the Chinese authorities.

The report was unanimously adopted.

Mr. de Beaufort congratulated the board on their very business-like report and the satisfactory information which had been given by the chairman.

LIVERPOOL VICTORIA INSURANCE CORPORATION, LIMITED.

Large Amount of New Business.

The second annual general meeting of the shareholders in the Liverpool Victoria Insurance Corporation, Limited, was held on the 11th inst. at the Holborn Restaurant, London, Mr. James M. Littleboy (the chairman) presiding.

The Chairman stated that the year had been one of singularly keen competition, but when he pointed out that the premium income for the period showed an increase of £37,736, he thought the shareholders would agree that the Corporation had done its share of new business. This premium income had been obtained at very low cost considering the smallness of the individual contracts and the amount of work involved in their acceptance. After making complete reserves, the total cost of the large increase was no more than £7,248. This satisfactory increase was especially creditable when it was remembered that they did not transact employers' liability business or other business of a risky character. Some of their clients complained that they were too strict in their selections, but that was a good fault, if it was a fault at all. During the year they had turned away some thousands of pounds in business which they had felt was too risky to undertake. It was stated last year that with the growth of the premium income the expenses might be expected to be of a normal character. That had become quite true; the ratio was very much reduced as compared with the first year. They estimated that they had on the books a premium income of £110,000 at least, and, as was stated in the report, they were taking new business at the rate of £1,000 per week. Last week, in fact, they had a record week for new business, the total being no less than £1,950. They might therefore rely upon it that with such a rapidly growing income the expenses would show a ratio in the future which would give no anxiety whatever. In conclusion, the Chairman moved the adoption of the report and accounts.

Mr. Arthur Henri seconded the motion.

Mr. T. R. Barry (managing director) remarked that in the life department there were £265,940 sums assured. He had made a close investigation of the conditions, and they had in hand some arrangements which would certainly result in the life returns in future proving equal to the great expectations universally shared when the corporation was formed. As regards the fire department, the business was satisfactory. He would be disappointed if the fire income showed anything less than £40,000 in the next accounts. There was a considerable development in the accident department, partly, of course, due to the new forces which had come to them from the International Company. He thought the claims at 31 per cent. showed pretty favourably. He had every confidence that they would soon reach the dividend stage, and when they got there were not likely to go back, but rather to go steadily forward.

The resolution was unanimously adopted.

QUEER STORY.

THE WOMAN WHO WOULD NOT SEE.

A Tale of the Bedawin.

IN the delectable storehouse where God the Bountiful hides gifts for nations and the men of nations, each is remembered according to his necessity. Nor are the people of the desert forgotten, though they be subject to no upstart governor nor to laws framed by the newly weaned. But because of their exceeding strange occasions, arising out of extreme droughts and solitudes and enemies unaware, they are dowered with singular treasures. On one is bestowed a faculty to read in the sand the footprints of strayed camels, and to recite therefrom the age and size and nature—yes, and the very wasm of the beast, to the end that cattle thieves may be brought to bitter confusion and the progress of the faithful may be unhindered

Upon another (as upon Zaynet, the wife of Abadeh of this story) falls the bounty of double sight, and that is even a more rare thing than camel-telling, and precious above all price.

Twice, as her tribe wandered, had Zaynet, putting her gift to good account, saved it and acquired merit. Once, in the distant column of sand, she had spied robbers, who thought to take her kinsfolk unprepared; and once had she beheld wells when, after weary wandering, believing themselves lost, the tribe lay down to die.

Now, of a truth, gifts are good, but a gift abused is worse than emptiness; and God is just in least as in greatest.

Zaynet, surnamed because of her services to the tribe the "Four-Eyed," held in her heart (as all women hold it) the desire to bear a son. And this desire, cherished with proper meekness, is without offence and even commendable; but Zaynet, forgetting that God gives or withholds as it pleases Him, waxed over-anxious, and became the servant of her wish to her own undoing.

"I am shamed," whined Zaynet daily to Abadeh, her husband, "with three daughters. God mocks me! I have lived in vain!"

And she sorrowed for the unborn as they sorrow who have painfully borne and more painfully lost the fully grown.

"If Zaynet would but rest," grumbled old Kaukab, who kneaded geleeh and had not many teeth, "the son might have his chance; but it is here to-day and there to-morrow—a charm from this one, a potion from that! Female children are ever the reward of the restless. I speak who know. Have not I, a stay-at-home, brought my lord six men?"

But Zaynet heeded not old Kaukab. Of a truth, she heeded nothing, save the desire which, growing each day more importunate, brought her into a very servile subjection.

Secretly (advised of a town-woman making pilgrimage to a shrine) she journeyed to Cairo, and at the yard of execution (this was before the rule of puny stomachs) she performed rites which the English, who love battle but abhor blood, would swoon only to think on. Yet the son still tarried; only another daughter was born, making in all four.

It was a strange hakim from God knows where, vending draughts for the summer fevers, who, hearing as all the world heard (for Zaynet had a clacking tongue) of her extreme necessity, laughed.

"Take a fresh husband," said he, making jest of it. "Custom is the fifth element in the universe, but Allah, being greater than the universe, sometimes decrees change."

Now, these words, though spoken lightly, refused to forsake the head of Zaynet. They beat there like the tabl at a marriage feast. They ground themselves with her corn and became entangled in the goats' hair which she spun. The hoopees cried them, the camels grunted them, the very dogs barked them at night. "A fresh husband! A fresh husband!"

At first Zaynet the Four-Eyed wept for shame, because, apart from the desire, she was a virtuous woman, and Abadeh had been a just husband as a man reads the words.

"Patience is from God," said Abadeh continually; "pray to Him, and a son will reward thy prayers."

Now, when a man falls under a domination he is a fool, but when a woman falls she is worse than a city of fools—there are no words which will describe her folly. In time Zaynet lost sight of honour itself in the light of the desire. She began to whisper to her heart at night, when none might watch her face, that, being a likely woman, she would not tarry long for another mate, if——

And beyond this "if" she was at first loth to go, having still some decency left.

Then, after four moons, during which she peeped a little—on very dark nights—beyond the "if," and trembled now as they who fear for what she saw, a strange thing befell.

She went, as was her evening custom, to fill her kulla from the river. She went heavily, because all the world was empty save for four jeering words and the shadow of a child who had never been; and, having filled, she stood at the water's edge, the kulla on her head, talking without any heart in her talk to the women who love to assemble at sunset and clack over such little matters as seem to them great.

A kite queeked its way home. "Take a fresh husband," it said, and the bercine was stirred by a breeze which always grows big as the sun becomes little. "Take a fresh husband," whispered the breeze as it danced past.

The content of evening lay everywhere, saving only where Zaynet moved. She walked into the water, and it came lap-lapping against her legs, which were slender and shapely. "Take a fresh husband," gurgled the water, and Zaynet struck it with her hand for its counsel, so that it splashed into her eyes.

Then in a moment a fateful speech came from the mouth of a little wading child, who, pulling at Zaynet's wet robe with his own wet hand, pointed to a speck out on the river's breast.

"Look!" he cried. "Woman, look how that goat swims!"

Zaynet, to satisfy the child, looked, hand to forehead; then she blinked her eyes to clear them of the water which was still there, and in looking she saw, because of her gift, that this indeed was no goat, but Abadeh, her husband, in extreme peril, beating at the Nile with his arms for succour. To save him would have been no great matter, for a boat stood ready to hand, and in the boat Hassan, the son of old Nabout, the ferryman, was lazily cleansing fish.

The cry to launch was already in her throat, but another cry came stifling it before it could be uttered. It was the cry, and it rose twice in the hakim's voice. More distinct than the city mueddin's call to prayer it rose. "Take a fresh husband! Take a fresh husband!"

So Zaynet stood in silence, the kulla on her head, her feet in the very water which was filling the throat and nostrils of Abadeh, her husband. She stood and looked, but the taunt of the cry was in her blood, and she would not see.

Whilst the desert, unheeding the follies of men, swallowed half the red bulk of the sun, she stood. Then she spoke: "Thy goat swims bravely," she said, "but now he has—sunk;" and pulling her robe from the child's grasp so roughly that he cried out and sought his mother, she went very quickly away—the water dripping from her kulla on to her shoulders because of the stumbling haste of her steps.

* * * * * *

All things in their order, but the will of Allah first.

In due season the jest of the strange hakim became a reality. The Nile kept her secret; she is no prating woman with few to guard; and the tribe believed that Abadeh, who had gone to the town to trade, had been bewitched by city jinns (more fearsome than the spirits of the open), or done to death by bazaar thieves. They made a small search and a very great lamentation, and Aboosh, the younger brother of Abadeh, took the widow for his wife.

And at length Zaynet the Four-Eyed, being with child, was in her heart exceedingly uplifted, because she was well convinced that desire and realisation at last stood hand in hand.

But for an evil dream which sometimes troubled her—a dream of brown water and tossing arms which beat at it—there would have been no happier woman between Kufra and Khartum.

"He is to be a Sultan, nothing less," cackled old Kaukab, gossiping with the women as they came home from their washing with clean garments and an appetite for news; "but this sitting always at the tent door weaving is a madness, I say. She should fill her own kulla, were she my daughter, and bless me for it in light pains by-and-by."

But no argument would drive Zaynet to the river, not even an occasional curse, which old Kaukab, changing her tune, threw at her laziness.

"Pah! pah! that child will be a hunchback without brain, if his mother takes root in the ground. It all comes of two husbands. . . . There is no luck in such numbers, I say; as for me, one was enough and to spare."

But in spite of her revilings she limped into the tent of Aboosh on the great day, and crouched watching the progress of things, and giving occasional assistance. Kaukab was a network of wrinkles, and her teeth were fewer than ever, but for all that she was skilled.

"By Allah! a king indeed!" she murmured, peering (for her eyes were rheumy, and she was obliged to peer) when the boy was born.

"Masallah," she added, because it is ill-omened to praise a child, and then she bent to watch his face. She bent lower, by reason of her age and the darkness of the tent, and as she bent a shriek hissed out from between the scattered teeth.

"Oh! Thou compassionate One!" she moaned, and fell into the ugly high-pitched lament of old age. So ugly it was that the chickens outside scattered cluck-clucking with fear.

Now hearken to the reason of Kaukab's lament and profit, for Allah is very just. He rewards always according to deserving.

From the delectable storehouse where He hides His treasures, He had chosen for Zaynet an extraordinary gift, and in exchange she had used it for a weapon to wound Him. So from the newly born He withheld an ordinary gift (for He is never mocked). Sockets He gave the babe, but sockets only, whereof the half-closed lids but ill-concealed their emptiness.

Seest thou?—it is a simple matter. To the woman who would not see He sent a son who could not see—a son very perfect in all particulars, save that he lacked eyes.

BOOKS.

IN reading "Intimate Society Letters of the Eighteenth Century" (1), edited by the Duke of Argyll, you realise at once what "intimate" meant and what "society" meant in that ceremonial century. No imaginable intimacy could be nearer, I suppose, than that of mother and son, yet in a series of letters in these volumes a son addresses his mother as "Dearest Duchess," while in one of them he ventures to hope that he may be allowed to wait upon her and upon his father at a certain date, if "it will be convenient to your Grace to receive me at that time." As for Society, every letter of the word should be a capital to express adequately the reverence paid to it in those days. Mrs. Moore, the mother of the hero of Corunna, pleads humbly in excuse for not acknowledging immediately a letter from the Duchess of Argyll that her child died on the day she received it! Indeed, the reverence of this century for rank seems to have infected even the editor of the volumes, since we have page upon page of letters only of importance as having been written by or to a duke or duchess. Surely, e.g., a ducal order sent to Edinburgh in 1782 for two pairs of plated candlesticks and one dozen of breakfast knives could be of interest even in that snobbish century only to the shopkeeper who was to supply them. You resent the volumes being waterlogged by such small-beer chronicles all the more because they contain so many other letters of real and deep intrinsic interest, and give besides glimpses of personages who were more than merely titularly great. Here, e.g., is Lord John Campbell's descriptions of Talleyrand and of Napoleon as they appeared in 1803:—

> Talleyrand resembles nothing so much as a dead man. His feet are distorted in a shocking manner, and I think he deserves well of his country for having by unremitting perse erance learned to walk upon them. . . . I stood close to Bonaparte and had a good opportunity of examining his countenance. He has hair straight and rather darker than yours; the shape of his head very like mine; his eyes light grey, not much eyebrow; the brow projecting a good deal, but not so much as is represented in the casts at London. His nose is large and prominent, but has not that sudden rise in the middle which mine has and his busts have, but resembles William Campbell's more; his complexion is uncommonly sallow, his beard very dark, but not thickset, and apparently not newly shaved. His teeth are very fi e, and when he laughs or smiles the expression of his face is quite charming. His height, I should think, is as nearly mine as possible; he is certainly no taller. His limbs are small but straight-kneed and neatly made.

It is gratifying to the admirers of Napoleon's genius to learn that in some particulars his personal appearance approached the Campbell pattern. Yet more interesting and characteristic is the self-revelation of Mme. de Staël in her letters to this Lord John Campbell, who was the original of the Lord Nelville of "Corinne." Every one knows that Mme. de Staël's capacity for love and for talk was equally illimitable, but it is amazing to find that even Mme. de Staël could express illimitably in letters her despairing passion for two men to one of the two! Here the image used by the distracted lover in "Bombastes Furioso" is even inadequate:—

> As when two feasts whereat there's nought to pay,
> Fall unpropitious on the self-same day,
> The anxious cit each invitation views
> And ponders which to take and which refuse;
> From this or that to keep away is loth,
> And sighs to think he cannot taste of both.

For Madame could taste of neither. She expresses in a letter to Lord John Campbell at once her despairing passion for his travelling companion, Dr. Robertson, and for his lordship himself! "Happily a vague suspicion that Robertson was fickle and over-estimated his sentiments for me restrained my heart, which was about to give itself to him for ever, and I kept free of an irrevocable engagement; but enough remains to make me sad and suffering to the end of the days of my youth, which pain so quickly shortens." Yet in the same letters she expresses a passion no less consuming and desperate for Lord John. Lord John unfortunately did not, as he was adjured to do by the infatuated lady, destroy her passionate effusions; but he at least would have justified her confidence:—

> I count on you that not even the Marquis of Lorne will ever see one of my letters to you, and will never know through you how much grief I felt at being separated from a man whom circumstances removed from me.

Yet now the whole world can read them! Among the letters from personages who were born "great" are some from Augusta Duchess of Brunswick, sister of George III., whose daughter Caroline "made her the happiest creature in the world" by her marriage to George IV.! Writing to the Duchess of Argyll about this very Caroline, she says of the duchess's son, the Duke of Hamilton:—

> I pity the young womens that will fix his attention for his manner is delightly; my girl was in love with him without knowing it, for at that age there is no art, nor do they know why they like. If her father had suspected it he would have made such a noise and done more harm than good.

Probably the ill-spelling and grotesque English of the duchess's letters help the impression of child-like simplicity and candour which they gave you, but anyway, they are delightful reading. Then there are the letters of this Duke of Hamilton's bear-leader, Dr. Moore, the father of the hero of Corunna, giving his mother, the duchess, an account of the dance his bear led him, which are often amusing but not always edifying in their sprightliness. Witness his sportive letter about the duke's fascination with the Countess of Albany, the wife of the Pretender, and its possible result in "the reanimation of the cruel, tyrannical, bloody, papistical race of Stewart when it seemed to be expiring!" This to the duchess and the mother of the youth was an "intimate letter" with a vengeance! In taking leave of these extraordinarily interesting letters I should like to remind their editor that Dr. Johnson dismissed a Scotch amanuensis for indexing Milton "Mr. John." Burke is here indexed "Mr. Edmund!"

No doubt Mr. Douglas Sladen ran through Egypt with the usual British globe-trotter's eye, to which everything not English seems funny or foolish; but, on the other hand, he has a most amusing way of describing what amused him, which makes his "Queer Things About Egypt" (2) extremely entertaining. For my own part, however, I like Mr. Douglas Sladen best when he is profoundly moved (and not to mere laughter), as he is in his descriptions of places unvulgarised as yet by the globe-trotter—of Fayum, e.g., or of Rosetta, or of Damietta. Mr. Douglas Sladen no more believes in a self-governed Egypt than Mr. Roosevelt, and, if the tale he tells of Ismail Pasha's Parliament is true, perhaps there is something to be said for this political illiberality. Ismail, according to Mr. Sladen, having made up his mind to have an Egyptian House of Parliament, himself appointed and instructed its members, dividing them arbitrarily into two parties, saying to one, "Now, you are the Government," and to the other, "And you are the Opposition." When, however, the increase of his salary was presented to them as the first measure for their consideration, nothing that he could say would prevent the wise and wary Opposition from voting as enthusiastically for the advance as the Government! The Parliaments of Spain and Portugal, according to some books which I read recently upon those countries, seem to be similarly constituted.

Apropos of Spain, it did not need such an expert as Mr. Bogue Luffmann in his "Quiet Days in Spain" (3) to persuade you that George Borrow's account of that country was imaginative. Of course it was as much, so to say, of a soap bubble as a Scott historical novel or a Shakespeare historical play. But you certainly have the real Spain in Mr. Bogue Luffmann's delightful volume. What a people! Not mediæval merely, but primitive, childlike, even childish. Peasants, after listening to Mr. Bogue Luffmann's description of Australia, ask "Is there a God there?" But, if the Spaniards are childish in their ignorance and in their superstition, they are childlike in their attractiveness, and you are made to share the author's sympathy with the grinding poverty of their lot. If, however, as he insists, it is "ignorance, absolute widespread and ineradicable ignorance, which keeps the civilised world going and in a state of balance," and if, as he also insists, "every reform only increases human misery," Spain ought to be the Utopia Mr. Bogue Luffmann hardly found it.

Sir Bamfylde Fuller's "Studies of Indian Life and Sentiment" (4) is a most opportune book. It is the work at once of an historian and of a statesman, giving a clear, concise, interesting and instructive account of Indian history and character, and suggesting the cause and the cure for the present unrest of the country. The closing chapters are especially instructive and convincing. Mr. Archer, in his "Through Afro-America," notes that the horror of the negro in the States is always proportioned to their numbers; and Sir Bamfylde says of racial feeling in India that "it is born rather of apprehension than of dislike. It is a protest against the consciousness of being outnumbered, and does not arise when there is no question of this." Miss Sidgwick's "Promise" (5) is an extraordinarily clever, interesting and sympathetic story of a genius springing up as root out of a dry ground—an ugly duckling environed by creatures that bewilder it by their misunderstanding of it. Not only the genius himself, but all the characters which affect him or seek to affect him are described by Miss Sidgwick sympathetically and convincingly with an impartiality more effective for its purpose than prejudiced caricature. I could not feel the faintest interest in "The Career of Freda" (6), for the young lady herself is silly, and her improbable adventures are uninteresting.

DESMOND B. O'BRIEN.

One of the strongest candidates for the honour of being considered the "book of the season" during the coming autumn will undoubtedly be Colonel Roosevelt's account of his world's tour which Mr. Murray will publish over here. Altogether apart from the sporting interest in the big game shooting which resulted in a record bag, the ex-President's reassertion in its pages of his position as candid friend to the British nation which he assumed so gracefully at the Mansion House will most certainly arouse discussion. Colonel Roosevelt has, it is understood, dealt faithfully with his hosts. He is going to tell us what is and what is not a white man's land, what are the difficulties to be overcome and how we are to overcome them. In fact, he has written a practical treatise on the art of colonisation for the guidance of the effete Britisher.

Yet another fifty new volumes are to be added early in September to Everyman's Library by Messrs. Dent. The section devoted to philosophy will be particularly strong. Bishop Berkeley, noted both for his purity of prose and his philosophy, will be represented in one volume containing the "Principles of Human Knowledge," the "Three Dialogues of Hylas and Philonous," and "The New Theory of Vision." The introduction to this volume is by a Balliol man, Mr. A. D. Lindsay, and he has also written a preface to a John Stuart Mill volume, containing the three works "Utilitarianism," "Liberty," and "Representative Government." Another volume of interest is Sir Walter Scott's "Lives of the Novelists" originally written as prefaces to Ballantyne's Novelists' Library. The introduction in this case is by Professor Saintsbury.

Apropos of philosophy the little volume "Maxims of Life and Government," by Marshall Bruce-Williams (Chapman and Hall) has a really modern interest. In the minds of many philosophy and verbosity are almost synonymous terms, but this reproach certainly cannot be levelled at Mr. Williams' exposition of his theories; indeed, he is so epigrammatic in his utterances that one sometimes loses sight of the fact that each maxim is relative to the others. Briefly Mr. Williams is concerned with what he considers the undue emphasis laid on the principle of democracy to-day, his ideal condition being that in which the ploughman by nature should be the ploughman in fact, and the natural aristocrat in any of Nature's gifts accorded due meed of recognition. There is much food for thought in the Maxims.

Another interesting travel book promised for the early autumn by Messrs. Constable is Lieutenant P. T. Etherton's story of his wanderings in Asia. Leaving Lansdowne in the Himalayas, he proceeded through Kashmir, Gilgit, Hunza, and over the Pamirs, then on through Chinese Turkestan, Mongolia, and Siberia until he struck the Trans-Siberian Railway. He covered roughly about 3,500 miles in his journey, taking just about a year to do it, and has brought back a rich store of information on anthropological and natural history matters in addition to geographical and sporting information. The modern explorer carries a camera as well as a gun, and a feature of Lieutenant Etherton's book will be the photographs taken by himself.

Now novels by Mr. Maarten Martens and Mr. Pett Ridge which Messrs. Methuen are to issue shortly may now be placed on the library list. "Harmen Pols" depicts a crisis in the life of a young Dutch peasant, while Mr. Pett Ridge's story "Nine to Six-Thirty" has a twentieth-century Cinderella as its heroine. She is the drudge of a Stoke Newington family until the spirit of revolt seizes her, and she embarks on a business career which leads her to success. Another volume promised immediately by Messrs. Methuen which is particularly welcome just at this season of the year is a book on "The Dolomites," by Mr. Hamer. This part of South Tyrol still does not receive from the tourist the recognition to which its beauties entitle it, and Mr. Hamer hopes to do something to remove this reproach.

THE GIFT HORSE.

THE man or woman who invented the injunction against looking gift horses in the mouth was, I should imagine, a special purveyor of wedding presents. There seems otherwise no reason why gifts, which after all bring the giver a good deal of incidental kudos, should be exempt from criticism merely because they are gifts. The man who honours me with a gift is at least as much honoured by my acceptance of it, and, moreover, on the principle that it is more blessed to give than to receive, he is credited with the generosity as well.

In the case of public gifts it becomes a positive duty to look at the gift horse's teeth. For whereas privately you may undertake the burthen of a Crystal Palace, merely because it has been given to you, you cannot expect the public to undertake anything less than the very best or to award recognition to the donor for a gift whatsoever. The fact that the new Turner wing is spacious, excellently lighted, and badly wanted, invites our real gratitude towards the late Sir Joseph Duveen, whose open purse made such a building possible; the floridness of much of its decoration, on the other hand, invites equally the criticism of the nation which has honoured Sir Joseph Duveen in its acceptance of such a gift.

For had the new Turner wing been the outcome of a Government grant critics would not have been wanting to declare it in thoroughly bad taste. It is true that the "regardless-of-expense" suggestion of the gallery—the relation of which to the rest of the Tate building somewhat resembles the tail that wagged the dog—applies to the decoration rather than to the structure, which is plain and well-suited to the subject. The verde-antique finishings of the gallery, the ormolu decorations, the venetian-red silk brocade which covers the walls, together give an impression of floridness curiously out of keeping with present-day notions of art-fittings. The delicacy of much of Turner's work indeed will perforce be constrained to wait for its highest effect until such time as shall be needed by London grime and smoke to tone down an effect suggestive both of a restaurant and a new piece of Gobelins tapestry. The beautiful parquet floor, on the other hand, and the Italian walnut seats leave nothing to be desired, nor indeed do the water-colour rooms, hung with the gold canvas used with so good effect at the Grafton Galleries this last winter. Also these galleries are on a scale well suited to the smaller size and greater intimacy of water-colour; they allow of a large display of Turner's works excellently arranged by Mr. D. S. McColl, and with the rest of the new wing show how great is the advantage to a painter to show his works practically in their entirety.

The new Turner wing raises once again a question that has often occurred to me in connection with the Tate Gallery. Theoretically it is an excellent thing for British art to possess a fine new house with plenty of elbow room. At the same time most of us—at least from a public point of view—would prefer a corner in Mayfair to a mansion at Notting Hill. And the fact stares us in the face that while foreign art receives a full meed of honour and admiration at the central point—the National Gallery—British art bids fair to be relegated to a splendid isolation—with exception, perhaps, of copyists and American trippers—in a part of the world which, if not really difficult of access, is sufficiently off the main route to be inaccessible to the average visitor.

That there are certain advantages in such isolation cannot be denied. While it may shelter the solitary passer-by during half an hour's rain, the Tate Gallery will never serve as general rendezvous or first-class waiting-room to Charing Cross Station, as is the case with the National Gallery. At the same time the object of a gallery is to be inviting rather than prohibitive, and, except for the man of leisure, the position of the Tate Gallery leaves much to be desired from a practical point of view.

With regard to Turner himself, it is, of course, right that if British art is to be segregated at Millbank, the greatest of her representatives should go there, too. Otherwise a slight is conferred upon other great painters who hang there. Inundated as it is by the Victorians, the Tate Gallery has unfortunately already acquired with a number of people a reputation of the second-best, which is most unfair to the number of really great paintings it contains. But if Turner is to go to Millbank, why not Constable or Crome, or, for that matter, Reynolds and Gainsborough? If the Tate Gallery is really to be the national gallery of British art—and the addition of the Turner wing brings it nearer that objective—it should not merely be what the pension is to the hotel. If, on the other hand, the division between the two galleries is to be as arbitrary as is at present the case, the National Gallery at Trafalgar Square is certainly unrepresentative without its best Turners. Finally, if all the British School were to be relegated to Millbank, there is little doubt that such banishment—for there is no other word—would be doing it a great injustice.

In spite of the various conditions imposed upon the various galleries—conditions which, by the way, future arbitrators of the nation's art will do well to make clear they can by no means entertain—the real position of the Tate Gallery should resemble that of the Luxembourg. It should form a half-way house wherein modern pictures of every nationality can wait until such time as they may be considered finally worthy to be included in the National Gallery collection. It is impossible, even for the greatest connoisseur, to do more than guess at the status of the present-day painter in posterity, and time alone can show whether the fashion or tendency of to-day may to-morrow hold its own. A much more fluid state of affairs would, of course, be necessary to make a good working system—possibly, indeed, a Fine Arts Minister might be essential. But the advantages would be undoubted. Pictures of real merit, but not quite touching the high-water mark of the National Gallery, would circulate among the various provincial galleries; it would be possible for the authorities to risk buying pictures while there was some chance of getting them at a reasonable price; the Tate Gallery would, in short, serve the National Gallery as a sieve for modern paintings, wherein it could see with some chance of correct judgment what was worthy or less worthy; finally it would obviate the stigma which at present bids fair, with the best possible intentions, to be laid upon British art.

* * * * * *

The publication of Mr. Finberg's book on "Turner's Sketches and Drawings" (Methuen, 12s. 6d. net) coincides most fortuitously with the opening of the new Turner wing at Millbank, and aims at providing the casual visitor with some clue to a fuller pleasure in the opportunities that now are his. I do not know that the highest artistic enjoyment is to be obtained from art disquisitions, however lucid; the pleasure conveyed to the mind by a work of art indeed should depend less upon a complete analysis of the means than upon the spontaneous impression produced by the end. Certainly Mr. Finberg's definition of pictorial art as being "an arrangement of spacial symbols embodying an individualised psychical content present to the mind of the artist and intended to call up always the same ideas and emotions in the minds of others" does not seem to me particularly enlightening. At the same time his view of Impressionism, and in particular so-called Turner Impressionism, is both illuminating and suggestive. "To transfix a fleeting moment of immediate living experience," says Mr. Finberg, "is a very different thing from the deliberate analysis of the process of perception and the wilful extraction of one of its elements." It was in this wilful extraction that Turner differed from the Impressionists. In his last stages some of the intellectualism and science of the Impressionist seem to have affected him. As Mr. Finberg puts it, "The man was dead before the incomparable master of tone and colour was exhausted." The real delight of Mr. Finberg's book, however, lies in its beautifully reproduced illustrations of Turner's various phases. Here are nearly a hundred sketches and drawings in various degrees of completeness, and you may see side by side with the first sketch—often stenographic in its slightness—the fully developed drawing with the various alterations that Turner almost invariably introduced into it. For a general study of Turner's drawings I know of no more fascinating book.

MUSIC.

SOME VIOLIN QUESTIONS.

A QUESTION which is continually cropping up is that of the right treatment of old and historic violins. The latest suggestion is that they should be loaned to the great virtuosi of the day for their recitals.

It would lend a certain amount of glamour to the programme if it could be announced that Kriesler or Kubelik or Mischa Elman, for instance, would play upon the "Emperor" Stradivarius, and it would certainly do the violin no harm. It seems a pity that these splendid products of an ancient art should be for ever dumb beneath their glass cases.

The proposal is, I am afraid, more viewy than practical. Before an eminent violinist would consent to play in public on an unfamiliar instrument he would require to have it in his possession a long time in order to practise on it and get to know it. No player of standing would dream of playing on a strange instrument, however famous, otherwise. Perfect understanding between a player and his instrument is only arrived at after long association. The relationship has been likened to that of a rider and his horse, and the analogy is quite a good one. Even if the player were allowed to keep the instrument long enough to get to know it it might not suit him. He would probably want it altered to meet his own particular requirements. In addition there would be the risk entailed of loss or damage. The sense of responsibility would be lessened in the case of a violin lent out in this fashion. The eminent player might or might not look after it with proper care, but there would be no guarantee. There would even be the risk of the wrong instrument being returned eventually to the trustees. Strange mistakes have happened, and might do so again. A more practical way of arriving at the same end is for the leading players of the day to acquire fine instruments for themselves, and this is what in point of fact usually happens. Nearly all the fine fiddlers of the day are playing on instruments of note, and the public is getting the benefit.

As to those instruments of exceptional fame figuring in collections and not in the hands of virtuosi, it has always been a debatable matter as to how they should be dealt with. On the one hand, it may be argued, as does the writer above quoted, that to lock them up in a glass case is to frustrate the purpose for which they were created. As well, it has been urged, keep classical pictures with their faces turned to the wall. But it must not be overlooked that violins which are continually in use wear out in course of time; also they are liable to be lost or damaged; and once destroyed they cannot be replaced. Moreover, there is not only the artist and the public to be considered in the matter, but also the craftsman. If the greatest existing models are not carefully preserved, how is the violin maker of the future to learn his business? The question was raised, it may be remembered, a few years ago in striking form in connection with the bequest of the late Mr. C. J. Oldham of a quartet of famous Stradivari instruments to the British Museum on the condition that they were there to be "preserved for ever enclosed in a suitable glass case." Though there was no question as to the value of the instruments and the public spirited character of the bequest, the Museum authorities decided after due consideration, and on the advice of some of the most distinguished musicians of the day, to decline the bequest, on the ground that the principle was a wrong one to put instruments away in this fashion, and the quartet in question passed accordingly to the residuary estate of Mr. Oldham, and were very speedily disposed of to a well-known connoisseur.

More recently the somewhat absurd suggestion has been made that the nation should acquire for preservation another famous Strad at present in the market—namely, that sometimes alluded to as the "Emperor" Strad, which formerly formed part of the G. Haddock collection. This proposal was absurd for more than one reason. In the first place, if the nation through the British Museum had actually refused to accept a whole quartet of Strads when these had been offered as a free gift, they were hardly likely to wish to acquire a single instrument by purchase two years later. In the second place, the statements made about the so-called "Emperor" instrument were ridiculously exaggerated. The name itself is one which has been quite gratuitously bestowed on the instrument during recent years. Its recognised name is the Gillott Strad, derived from the fact that it was the finest instrument of the well-known Gillott collection, and as such it is always known among connoisseurs. Neither is it true to say that it is "unique," that it "stands apart," and so on. It is certainly a fine example, but merely one of many others—the truth being that there is no one violin which is the finest of all or "unique." But in any case, the suggestion of the nation purchasing the instrument was quite uncalled for.

Mr. Manners writes:—

Let me thank you most sincerely for your very kind notice of my United Empire Grand Opera scheme. Goodness knows what I should do without the Press. Even now, although it is only a few days since I sent out my circular, I have received applications for about a thousand shares. Your critic has, however, misunderstood me a little. If he will kindly look at my circulars again he will see I particularly mention that I wish to give opera in a way that has never been done before in the provinces (provinces only for the first year, so as to get ready for London), and I have taken into consideration this item even when mentioning that we shall then be able to have some £25,000 to £30,000 in hand at the end of the three years. In other words, I believe that for the first two or three years you educate the public just as fast by giving them a good show as much as if you gave them a very good show, and at the end of the three years I hope for such a rush of help that we shall be able to make our climax for another company all the better still.

I am glad that I misunderstood Mr. Manners, and that he has not overlooked the point to which I called attention.

Admirers of Elgar will learn with satisfaction that he has now finished a second symphony. It is full time that we had another work of real importance from Sir Edward's pen, and with that of the violin concerto, also promised for the immediate future, the production of the new symphony will be an event of the highest interest. There should be keen competition for the honour of first performing the new symphony, and perhaps this time London, which proved itself so vastly more appreciative of the composer's first symphony than Manchester, may get the preference. Many years ago Elgar was reported to have in contemplation a Gordon symphony, and a privileged few were permitted to see some of his preliminary sketches. The symphony in A was not this work. Is it perchance the one now to be produced?

The prospectus of the London Symphony Orchestra concerts for next season foreshadows nothing very exciting, but it is interesting to note that particular attention is to be given to British works, and that it is proposed to include a new composition in each programme. Dr. Richter will conduct, as before, most of the concerts, three of the others being directed by Herr Nikisch, while the remaining one will serve to introduce a new-comer, Professor Müller-Reuter, director of the Crefeld orchestra. It is pleasant to learn that Dr. Richter is now quite well again. The only drawback to his conducting is his disinclination to tackle works outside a repertory which modern musicians for some years past now have ceased to find completely satisfying.

THE THEATRES.

IMPORTANT INTERVIEW WITH MR. AVON SWAN.

AS theatrical interest at the present time centres rather in coming events than in actual productions, I took the opportunity the other day of interviewing that famous dramatist Mr. Avon Swan on the six new plays which I had been given to understand he would shortly put before an expectant world. It was with the utmost difficulty that I could persuade Mr. Swan to say anything at all, as he seemed to be afraid that any remarks of his at this juncture would sound like advertising his wares in advance. At last, however, I so far overcame his scruples that he consented to talk, on the strict understanding that three columns was to be the extreme limit of length to which the interview should run. "I have known people," said the dramatist, with great dignity, "permit four or even six column interviews. To me such displays only seem windy and bombastic. In two columns you can be reticent and avoid anything in the nature of a puff." Here, smiling wearily and crossing his slim knickerbockered legs, he said, "Proceed."

"In the first place, then, Mr. Swan, is it true that you have persuaded Canon Horsley to take the leading part in your new version of 'The Tipster'?"

"It is too early yet to make any definite pronouncement. Canon Horsley is undoubtedly the ideal man for the part, and his strong views on the subject of betting first imbued me with the idea of the play. I felt, too, how much more effectually he could preach against the evil in my powerful drama than in the lecture hall, but —well you must wait and see."

"This is, I think, the fifth dramatised version of the book?"

"The sixth. My dear old friend Smith dramatised 'The Tipster' once, but he did not so much dramatise it as make a play out of it. You perceive the difference? Other people have attempted versions, but they have missed the great underlying morality in the book. It is this which I have now dug out. The picture of 'The Tipster' himself expiating his wrong tips in a lonely Isle of Man fastness will, I think, produce quite a moral upheaval in audiences."

"And what about the second play, 'The Infernal Marriage'?"

"Many years ago," said Mr. Swan, "I was present at a wedding, and it flashed across me that marriage was a very important question. I gave the subject my most careful consideration, and drafted out a play in which I tried to show what a man marrying a woman and a woman marrying a man really meant. Then I put the whole thing by for ten years, and in order to study the question first hand I got married myself. The play now embodies my most elevated thoughts on the question. The three acts are called Analysis, Synthesis, and Apotheosis. I am afraid I cannot tell you why, but it has an impressive sound."

"The third play, I think, has a religious tendency?"

"All my plays have a religious tendency," said Mr. Swan, correcting me tenderly. They are vehicles charged with sublimated thought — the clarified essence of a brain of exceptional calibre. In 'The Curate's Sermon,' though—for that is the name of this play—the great scene is when the curate, who has murdered his father and mother, is preaching an impassioned sermon pleading for kindness to orphans. He is feeling his own position acutely, and is carried away by his own fervour, when the idea suddenly comes to him that he is not worthy to hold his office, and must confess the truth. Picture the scene: a tense multitude hanging weeping on his words, and the man who is thus morally uplifting one and all saying to himself, 'I dare not confess, not for my own sake, but for theirs. I will save my skin!' I was so unstrung after writing this scene that I was prostrate for a month."

"You will show on the stage an actual church interior, I suppose?"

"Of course. Indeed, we shall have in the third act the entire evening service, including the sermon, and copies of the sermon will be on sale, and will be sent free to all clergymen who apply for them."

"I think you are also writing a drama called 'Black is White'?"

"Yes, in a way it is the most important of the whole series. It deals with the great unwritten law that extremes meet. You follow me? Black being the extreme of darkness meets white, the extreme of lightness. The hero is one of those great pure-souled blackguards we all know, and the heroine, though she has committed every crime in the decalogue, is a pure woman at heart. It is the clash of black and white in the souls of these two noble victims of our social system that brings about their apotheosis. I am trying to arrange with the Home Office that at one special performance all the criminals in his Majesty's prisons shall be present. Think what an impressive sight it would be: the street lined with Black Marias waiting to take away this unique audience, and inside the house spellbound criminals dropping silent tears as they realise with a flood of emotion that all their crimes are only subtle appeals to the sympathies of the great public. You see the idea?"

"Will you tell me the names of the other plays you have completed?"

"Firstly comes 'The Modest Violet.' In this I had some idea of playing the hero's part myself. Indeed, I have already played it once at a special performance in my island home, and with entirely gratifying results to myself. I was astonished, when I came to suggest to the Press what they should say about the performance, how conscientiously I could speak in its favour. I can honestly say that I now realise how true it is that to be a really fine actor it is necessary to know how to act. It is the overlooking of these simple truths that is so detrimental to our stage. In London the part of the Violet, who is known as Ring-ma-Ree (the Manx for Nature's gentleman), will be played by my son."

"And to which of all these do you attach the most importance?"

"To none of those already mentioned, but to my great epic, 'Woman.' In this I have tried to show the folly of human laws and the beauty of Nature's laws. It deals primarily with a woman and a man, but you will find there is another man also, who is married. So the position is complicated by there being another woman also. The great scene comes when certain of these opposing forces meet. You have heard of the duel of sex? Yes, that is it. The idea came to me when musing in my castle grounds. I saw a butterfly alight on a flower. Then there came another butterfly. Instantly I saw that those butterflies were bound by no laws as to which flower they should alight on, and in a flash I saw my play. More than this I would rather not tell you for the moment. I am strongly against the modern system of giving away the interest of a play in advance."

"One final question, Mr. Swan. Is it true that you are thinking of dramatising the report of the Divorce Commission?"

"I have talked it over with Sir Charles Wyndham, Mr. George Alexander, Sir Herbert Tree, and Mr. James Welch," said the dramatist, gravely, "but so far nothing is definitely settled."

SPORT.

ONE of the most remarkable incidents of the present season is the large entry for the Cesarewitch, ninety-eight horses having been engaged, as compared with eighty-one last year. I believe it is the first time that a larger entry has been obtained for the Cesarewitch than for the Cambridgeshire, in which race only seventy-five horses have been engaged, as against 101 last year. The vagaries of owners are inexplicable, for the Cesarewitch was last year very much the poorest of all the autumn handicaps, the value of the race to the owner being only £905, whereas the Cambridgeshire brought in £1,370. There are only thirty-four entries for the Prince Edward Handicap, of £2,000, at Manchester (value to the winner last year, £1,670), and forty-three for the Duke of York Handicap, of £2,000, at Kempton Park, which brought in £1,665 to the winner last year. The liberal patronage which the Cesarewitch has received is the more unaccountable, inasmuch as a severe two miles and a-quarter is a most unpopular course when compared with the distance over which the other handicaps which I have mentioned are run. Even the Panglosses of the sporting press cannot raise the customary bray about the evidently increased number of stayers which the large entry for the Cesarewitch appears to indicate, for it is a flagrant fact that not one-third of the horses engaged have the very smallest pretensions to stay the course. There is a tremendous lot of absolute rubbish in the entry. It is curious that not one of the St. Leger favourites has been engaged. Bachelor's Double will, of course, be the top weight. Cargill, who had been a tip for the Cesarewitch, has not been entered, but he has been engaged at Manchester and Kempton Park, and he is in the Peveril of the Peak Plate at Derby. This horse will win a good handicap during the autumn if he keeps all right.

The Cambridgeshire entry is a better one in class, as is usually the case. Bachelor's Double or Sir Martin will no doubt be top weight. The American horse beat the Royal Hunt Cup winner very easily indeed at Epsom, and he is a really good horse over his own course. Many horses which are engaged in the Newmarket handicaps are in the £2,000 races at Manchester and at Kempton Park, so the prospect will not be clear when the weights are published on September 1. It is impossible to comprehend why the weights for the Cesarewitch and Cambridgeshire should still be brought out so early now that both handicaps are practically post-betting races. The weights appear on September 1, although the long race is not run until October 12, and the short race on October 26. The added money to the Cesarewitch, which is advertised to be £500, is really £10! The owners contribute the remainder through the entrances. I expect that there will be a very small acceptance for this handicap, as it is most doubtful whether thirty of the horses engaged could stay the course if there be a tolerable pace from start to finish. The entrances in the Cambridgeshire amount to £375, leaving £225 to be drawn from the fund, which cannot be described as an adequate contribution to the most popular handicap of the whole year.

Valens would have appeared to have recovered from the accident which was supposed to have ended his racing career, as he has been entered also for the Select Stakes, a race run on the Cesarewitch day, the course being the R.M. The list includes Winkipop, Sir Martin, Whisk Broom, Spanish Prince, Dean Swift, Swynford, and Tressady. Some very speedy horses have been entered for the Challenge Stakes run two days later over the B.S.C., the list including Sunder, The Tower, Slieve Roe, Glasgerion, Jack Snipe, Wedding Bells II., Whisk Broom, Spanish Prince, Witchwork, and Yellow Slave.

It is perhaps as well that Procope was not reserved for one of the autumn handicaps, as his performance at Goodwood appeared to indicate that he is at last coming back to his excellent early form. As a three-year-old he was considered to be about the same horse as Eider, who ran a dead-heat for the Ascot Cup with The White Knight. Mr. S. Joel has no entry for the Cesarewitch, and he is represented in the shorter race only by Arranmore, whose weight will be anxiously looked for when the handicap appears. Electra is in all four of the autumn handicaps, and she is also entered for the Great Yorkshire Plate of £1,300 at Doncaster, and for this race there are only forty-three entries.

At Doncaster there are sixty-two entries for the Glasgow Nursery of £250, but only fifty-four for the Prince of Wales's Nursery of £1,000! The fact is that owners do not care to race their two-year-olds over a mile, but much prefer five furlongs, and they are very wise. The Portland Plate of £800 has obtained only thirty-two entries. At one time this race was an autumn Stewards' Cup, for which horses were patiently kept, and the betting over it was very heavy. The Marine Plate at Brighton and the De Warrenne Handicap at Lewes were formerly among the great "sprint" races of the summer, but both have gone altogether to the dogs, and now excite no interest whatever.

Bayardo has been extolled by gushing reporters (who are always in ecstacies about something or somebody) as "the best horse we have seen for years," the justification for this fanfaronade being that he had won fifteen races in succession before his defeat at Goodwood. When seriously considering a horse's merits as a racer it is not so much what he has won as what he has beaten which has to be taken into account, and Bayardo has defeated an exceedingly moderate lot of animals both last year and during the present season. There is no earthly reason for regarding Bayardo as "a real smasher," but it seems to me that he has been over-raced. He must have done an enormous amount of work at home besides his public races, and he has enjoyed very little rest since he came out at Ascot in 1908. If Bayardo's owner is well advised he will start his horse for only two more races this season—the Champion Stakes and the Jockey Club Cup—as in both of them there are neither penalties nor allowances. There would have been much larger entries for both the Doncaster Cup and the Jockey Club Cup if those races had closed after Bayardo's defeat at Goodwood. There does not appear to be any object in closing them until the first Tuesday in August. It will do Bayardo no good to start him for the Doncaster Cup or for the Limekiln Stakes at Newmarket, as he has earned the extreme penalty for each race. It was a curious blunder to strike Bayardo out of the Jockey Club Stakes in March, 1908, as his 12 lbs. penalty would have been reduced to 6 lbs. by a breeding allowance.

St. Nat won the two-year-old race at Nottingham, a result which I had predicted. Mr. Joel's colt is evidently very smart, as he cantered away from Oliver Goldsmith, who has shown excellent form. It is much to be regretted that St. Nat has no other engagement this season, except the Houghton Stakes on the closing day at Newmarket, but next year he is in the Derby and in the Grand Prix. This colt has no engagements at Newmarket during the spring, and if all goes well with him he is sure to be backed for the Derby during the winter, but many people are convinced that he will become a roarer, as he is believed to be already touched in his wind.

One of the sporting papers, commenting on St. Nat's race at Nottingham, anticipates an exciting contest when he meets Seaforth and Manwolf. No such meeting is likely to take place. St. Nat and Seaforth might meet next year in the Grand Prix, but if the field is to include Manwolf these colts will have to wait for the Jockey Club Cup, or the Coronation Cup, or the Ascot Cup of 1912.

There were eighty-two entries for the Redcar Stakes, but only four horses started, and odds of 5 to 1 were betted on Meleager, as the race was a certainty for Mr. Neumann's colt, considering that he had a breeding allowance of 13 lbs. Lord Durham won both the three-year-old races—the one with Charlemont (who is evidently a good stayer) and the other with Calluna, whose next engagement is the Park Hill Stakes at Doncaster, where she will have the best of the weights with the Kingsclere fillies.

The Netheravon stable had intended to bring off a coup at Redcar with Venturer, but he had no chance with Calluna. It was said that Captain Forester's gelding had been backed all over the country at starting price, and there was evidently a lot of covering money, as he finished at 6 to 4, and "the sharps" went for him to a man.

Seaforth did not run at Kempton Park, and, in the absence of Mr. McCalmont's colt, Sunstar was a great favourite, but a lot of money went on Mary Carmichael. Mr. J. B. Joel's colt won with extreme ease, and the Manton filly again disappointed her friends. It is quite clear that the tale of how she "ought to have won" the Windsor Castle Stakes at Ascot was all moonshine. Canvas Back was a great Newmarket tip for the race, but Major Loder's filly did not appear on the scene.

Considering Prince Palatine's numerous engagements, it was odd to see him brought out for such a trumpery race as the Bedfont Plate. He won in a common canter, and there were no doubt good reasons for expecting him to win the £5,000 stake at Sandown Park last month. Prince Palatine might as well have been reserved for the £1,250 race at Derby on the 31st, as his win at Kempton Park has deprived him of the 5 lb. maiden allowance. He is left in for the Champagne Stakes at Doncaster, where he may again meet Cellini, who lost him at Sandown Park, but I believe there was a good excuse for his poor exhibition on that occasion.

I gave a plumper for Sunder for the St. James's Stakes, and he won very cleverly from Willonyx. If ever there was a good thing this was one, considering Sunder's great advantage in the weights, but there was a general idea that Mr. Joel's colt would fail to stay the course, and the bookmakers were ready to take 7 to 4 so long as the layers were disposed to go on. Sunder's superior class was quite enough to pull him through under the circumstances, as he was certain to beat his opponents for speed, and how could any rational being suppose that Willonyx could give him 18 lb.?

It is amazing that the daily papers can continue to publish the nonsensical St. Leger betting, the odds recorded being outrageous enough to make a blackbeetle sneeze. There are all kinds of unfavourable reports about Lemberg and Rosedrop, while Greenback was coughing recently. Neil Gow and Swynford are both doing well at Newmarket, and Lord Rosebery's colt gave great satisfaction last week, when he was galloped on the Limekilns, led by Perdiccas. Swynford is one of the most improved horses in training, but, on his public form, the odds reported to have been taken about him are absolutely ridiculous. Under no circumstances would it be wise to back Swynford until the day, as if the ground gets hard it is quite likely that he may have to be stopped in his work. I do not suppose it will be thought worth while to start Admiral Hawke at Doncaster, although he has been entered for the Cesarewitch. Cardinal Beaufort runs at Stockton this week, and if he does well enough in his race there he will probably represent his stable at Doncaster, for he can certainly stay well, but he is deficient in speed. Charles O'Malley ought to find no difficulty in winning the three-year-old race at Hurst Park on Saturday, and then he will no doubt come into notice for the St. Leger. This horse can be thoroughly trusted to stay the course, after his easy victory in the Gold Vase at Ascot.

Next week there will be racing at York and at Gatwick. The August Meeting at York is still the most important fixture between Goodwood and Doncaster, although St. Leger favourites are now rarely seen out on the Knavesmire, and the Ebor Handicap has lost nearly all its old prestige. At one time there was brisk betting every day on this race for three weeks.

There were sixty-three acceptances for the Prince of Wales' Plate of £1,000 on Tuesday, including Prince San, Night Rider, Porphyrio, Persephone, Seaforth, Romeo, Meleager, Lælia, Beaurepaire, and Borrow. I shall plump for Persephone, as I do not believe that Seaforth could give 10 lb. to Lord Derby's filly over this course. There were 115 entries for the Convivial Produce Stakes of £600, which was formerly the most important two-year-old race at York. The event is converted into a quasi-handicap by the allowances and penalties. Meleager will probably win, as Mr. Neumann's colt has the benefit of an allowance of 8 lb. The Duke of Portland might start Wrinkler, but he has incurred a penalty of 10 lb. There are 126 entries for the Gimcrack Stakes, which is the most popular race in the York programme. The list includes Pietri and St. Anton, Haphazard II., Feramorz, Lady Frivoles filly, Mushroom, and Sunstar. I fancy Sunstar the most of this lot, but he will have a considerable disadvantage at the weights with maidens, and the course is a severe one. Greenback brought backers to dire grief in this race last year. The Gimcrack form does not usually come out well afterwards.

There are fifty-two entries for the Duke of York Stakes of £400, and Charlemont or Cardinal Beaufort may win. There are seventy entries for the Yorkshire Oaks of £400, including Winkipop, whose penalty may not stop her if she runs. Thirty-nine horses were left in for the Great Yorkshire Stakes of £1,250, including Ulster King, Greenback, Yellow Slave, Willonyx, Cardinal Beaufort, Charlemont, and Rochester. Everything depends upon whether Greenback starts, and so far this is uncertain.

The weights for the Ebor Handicap were published on Thursday. Mirador is very well in with 7 st 13 lb., and Mr. Astor's horse is the pick of the lot on his best form, but he may be kept for a more important race later on. St. Victrix may prove the best of the Newmarket lot, and Bendy Tree is thrown in.

GOLF—CRICKET—YACHTING.

There has been another battle of Bunker's Hill, and the Americans have won. St. Andrews has barred, or is preparing to bar, by a resolution which no one can understand, the mallet club. It would appear that at St. Andrews the golfers' thoughts lie too deep for words. Well, this resolution has been said to bar the Shenectady putter with which Mr. Travis won the Amateur Championship at Sandwich. After the sad story of the brutal treatment which that Peter Grievous of American golf unfolded to the world so recently it was singularly impolitic of St. Andrews to select the date it did for its ruling on mallet clubs. It was too obviously another attack on that eminent golfer, yet another instance of the despicable Britisher's methods of humiliating a successful antagonist. He wanted posterity to believe that the ingenious Yankee had won his championship by using a club that no man who cared for golf as a game would ever use. To make history read in this way he framed a rule that would bar the Travis putter. This outrage on American honour could not be endured. The situation required all the tact of Roosevelt and Taft to keep the peace. Roosevelt has told the Britisher how to rule Egypt. American golfers would teach St. Andrews how to make golf rules, and so an American resolution was framed which reads: "That on the putting green the use of any club the measurement of the head of which from the face or striking surface to the back of the head is greater than the length of striking surface is barred." Whence it follows that the face and length of a club are one and the same thing. This much one learns from America.

Killick is a cricketer who has done splendid work for Sussex, wherefore it seemed good that he should have a benefit. The match was Sussex against Lancashire, and the Sussex men won by 11 runs, Leach taking five wickets when they were wanted. Now, the match was played at Brighton on the Hove ground, and but few people were present. Amongst those who played was Sharp, the Lancashire player. He has just had a benefit. He made £2,000. Killick will be lucky if he makes a fifth of that sum. But then, you see, there is all the difference in the world between the plebeians of the Old Trafford ground and the aristocrats of the Hove ground. Brighton is chock full of an intelligent aristocracy that considers that the country is going to the dogs, that there should be conscription and a Navy twice the present size, and that the foreigner should pay the tax. Therein is the secret of its patriotism. Everybody is to do something for Brighton, but Brighton objects to pay. It neither pays for its sport nor its patriotism. Its contribution to cricket is contemptible.

Lancashire went on to Southampton and scored a decisive victory. Hants declared with nine wickets down and 403 runs on. In four hours the runs were made. There was half an hour to spare. Sharp and Makepeace put on 240 runs in two hours and forty minutes. Twice this year have the northern team made a winning score of over 400 to win a fourth innings. Until this season 350 was the biggest fourth innings winning score in county cricket. It was remarkable that Cowie and McDonnell, the old Cambridge University bowlers, took all the Lancashire wickets but one.

Somerset are having a bad time. They have lost thirteen matches. They very nearly beat Kent, but Carr wiped off the tail of the team with four wickets for one run. Against Worcester they suffered similarly badly, Busher finishing off the innings with five wickets for thirteen runs.

At Lord's there was some exciting cricket in the match between Essex and Middlesex. There were good stands and collapses, J. W. Hearne taking seven wickets without a run being scored off him after lunch on the first day. Brilliant bowling by Buckenham gave Essex a lead of six runs on the first innings. Then Middlesex were left with a hundred runs to get and eight wickets down. Warner was playing steadily, and to him came Saville, new to first-class cricket. He reached well out to Buckenham. In an hour the runs were made—Saville, not out, 56; Warner, not out, 101, his first century this season at Lord's and a recovery in form which he maintained against Sussex when his team scored an innings victory. In that match Saville made another big score. Saville was recommended to Warner as a brilliant cover point. He was played for his fielding and justified his selection. He is clearly a batsman for a crisis. He played once for Marlborough in 1907. He is one of the best finds of the year.

By the way, at Lord's, of all places in the world, there was a brazen band in full blast during the Essex match. This is a vile innovation which should not be repeated. If the M.C.C. or the county want side shows then let the band play at the far end of the practice pitches, and fix up as well some musical merry-go-rounds, swings, cocoanut shies, and all the fun of the fair. A good gate will be forthcoming. The refreshment bars will do a big trade. And as for the cricket, a few idle loafers in the stands and pavilions will enjoy themselves. But, for goodness' sake, do not let the band again play in the upper stand. Put it in a corner, so that those who wish can get away from it. I wonder whether Warner's orchestra (or was it a police band?) will go on tour? I suppose we shall have a band at the Oval before long. The Surrey committee is not likely to be left behind. Their team mopped up Northampton. They profess to have discovered Smith. He will be left out before long. He only got a wicket against Yorkshire. As for Hitch, he is batting now and is fielding brilliantly, but unless he bowls as well he will have to go.

Many old University athletes will hear with regret of the sudden death, after a chill, of S. K. Holman, at the age of fifty-seven. From 1887-1906 he was the honorary secretary of the London Athletic Club, and he kept the club together through troublesome times when support was failing. He arranged matches with Oxford and Cambridge, and secured the support for the club of the majority of old running Blues. He was one of those men who got their own way by quiet tact and persistence. Yet before starting on any policy he was always willing to discuss what was best to be done, and he was ever ready to adopt any sensible suggestions that were made. He kept the time at the University sports, and on one occasion by a mere slip gave a wrong time for the three miles. Up went the figures. It was an impossible record. The mistake was obvious. But an ancient Oxford official was wildly excited. Oxford had won. There was the official time. It would go down in the records. But it did not; wiser counsels prevailed, and Holman often had a laugh about the incident. Thirty years ago this summer he won the half-mile championship on a sodden track. He just missed being a flier. But he could stay, and he knew how to run himself out. No man is indispensable. There are always others. He often said so, but only a few are badly missed, and he is one of them.

The racing yachts have left the Solent for the western ports. White Heather and Shamrock during Ryde week had some splendid spins. Bevis, who was sailing in his home waters, made the most of his knowledge of the tricky Solent tides, and scored by this means alone at least one win for White Heather. This cutter since her refit sails with more weight. She is no longer stripped for racing. Next year if an American cutter of the 23-metre class came over to meet these two craft, as the walrus observed to the carpenter, it would be grand. Westward was again successful. Her owner built her according to International Yacht Racing Union rules for vessels of Class A. When these and the R class race there is under those rules a fixed time allowance. Mr. Cochrane never meant to race her in handicaps of the old type, where, to use the language of the Turf, a donkey could beat Eclipse if the latter carried enough weight. The whole idea of the Union was to get class racing and do away with the Royal Yacht Squadron match, when a dinghey can beat a Meteor on a time allowance. Mr. Cochrane has supported the policy of the Union by bringing his vessel across the Atlantic, and now he is blamed for not racing her on some time allowance against any old tub that may be about. His agent had, in fact, entered her for all races for which she was eligible. But that was no reason for starting her.

At last a reasonable method of getting funds for a regatta has been discovered. Flags to put in boats at half a crown a-piece brought a good sum to Molesey when the experiment was first tried. At Marlow the venture was very successful. The same practice will have to be tried at Henley. But it is monstrous to tax people who are out for pleasure in this way. These regatta treasurers are embryonic Lloyd Georges in disguise.

MOTORS AND MOTORING.

THE CHOICE OF A CAR.

A CORRESPONDENT writes:—

Would you be so kind as to let me know what motor-car is the most suitable for a gentleman of not large means, in fact small means, and who wishes to use it on rather bad roads? Also what you would put down as the cost of running a car of about 12 h.p.? I am thinking of getting a car and giving up keeping a horse and trap. Perhaps you would be so kind as to give me some of your ideas on the subject and names of some really reliable cars, for which I will be most grateful.

To answer a letter of this kind to any purpose one would require "fuller and better particulars," as the lawyers say, than the writer supplies. One may say, however, without any hesitation that there are any number of good cars which would be equally suitable—so many indeed that I shrink from the somewhat invidious task of naming any in particular. Most of the leading makers nowadays turn out cars of about the horse power named, and practically any one of those bearing well-known names could be bought with absolute confidence. The actual choice is really a matter of no small difficulty, for even cars of good name and thorough reliability often differ considerably in wearing quality, and the car that costs least money is not necessarily the cheapest in the long run. There are some cars that are excellently designed and capitally built in a way, but which will give nothing like the wear of others which, when both are new, may seem to the uninitiated not a scrap better, or possibly even inferior. Such cars recall to some extent Carlyle's famous definition of modern houses as built to tumble down at the end of ninety-nine years, and they are hardly to be recommended to those going in for a car with the notion of sticking to it and getting years of service out of it. For prolonged hard wear and constant service, due to the best material and workmanship, De Dions undoubtedly have a name second to none among small and moderate-sized cars, and one may venture to single them out because there is not a motorist, probably, who would not agree with the statement. Panhards, Renaults, Siddeleys, and Talbots are other cars all of fine wearing qualities, though the mere mention of these few suggests at once the names of half a dozen others which might fairly maintain that they have quite as good a claim to be mentioned. In truth, such a question as that which my correspondent puts is really rather like asking which is the best shop in London to supply a silk hat or a tweed suit. There is no "best" in such cases, though any number that are first rate.

Even more difficult is it to give a specific answer as to the cost of running a car of the sort, for the simple reason that the answer depends so largely on the extent to which it is used. Reckoned in terms of mileage, however, I should say that the running expenses of a 12-h.p. car might be reckoned at somewhere between threepence and fourpence a mile. Tyres are, of course, one of the main items, and the cost of these is governed to some extent by the nature of the roads and by the way in which the car is driven. The careful driver, who uses his brakes with discretion, takes corners considerately, keeps his tyres at the proper pressure, and looks after them also, not only on the road, but by filling up cuts periodically, will get hundreds of miles more wear out of a cover than one of the scorcher fraternity, who goes on the principle of doing all those things which he ought not to do and leaving undone those of the other kind. Petrol and lubricating oil represent the other principal items under the head of running charges, and these, of course, are regulated entirely by the amount of work done.

What was once another highly important item—repairs and replacements—may now be regarded as an almost negligible quantity. I do not mean to suggest that charges under this head are now entirely unknown, but one may certainly say that it is possible to motor for twelve months nowadays without having to expend more than a pound or so on this score. In addition, there are the charges under such heads as stabling, insurance (a very necessary item this, sometimes overlooked by the motoring neophyte), and labour, in the form of chauffeur or odd man, which are independent of the mileage covered and in the nature, therefore, of fixed charges. As to stabling and labour, my correspondent will know his own particular circumstances. With respect to insurance, about £10 a year will give him all the protection that he will probably require, so that adding to these amounts the estimated running cost on the mileage basis as suggested, he should have no difficulty in forming at least an approximate estimate of what his motoring will be likely to cost him.

"Gentlemen, you may smoke—but not when driving a fare"; this, it seems, is to be the Home Office's amended order to the taxi driver. Second thoughts are proverbially best, and they are certainly so in this case. The original order giving the men leave and licence to smoke at all times and on all occasions was manifestly ridiculous. When the drivers themselves were found protesting against such an amount of licence as unnecessary and unseemly, it was obvious that a mistake had been made, and in revising their decision those concerned have shown more wisdom than they originally displayed in putting it forth.

Meanwhile, apropos of taxis, Mr. Shrapnell Smith has performed a public service in calling attention, not for the first time, to some of the mistaken notions current in regard to this class of public conveyance. As to the inadequate supply of motor cabs at night, for instance, he explains that the cause is not a deficiency of vehicles but of drivers. The cabs are in being, but there are not enough chauffeurs to drive them. The taxi driver shares with the prima donna the privilege of being at a premium. Hence an amount of independence, not to say arbitrariness, on his part, which is occasionally disconcerting. Of course, he does not admit the soft impeachment. He loves to talk of "hard times" and to represent himself as something of a martyr. But that is only his artfulness. He does not wish it to be generally known what a soft job he has. Personally I can imagine few more delightful callings than that of the driver of a well-appointed taxi. He is in the open air all day, having all the fun of motoring, and making a good thing out of it in addition. It is surprising, therefore, that there should be any lack of candidates for such a pleasant class of work.

The decision of the R.A.C. to give free legal aid to such of its members as may have the misfortune to need it, qua automobilists, will doubtless commend itself to those likely to benefit from such assistance, but the step is one of somewhat doubtful wisdom for the official head of the automobile movement to adopt. Of course, we are told that the club "reserves the right to refuse assistance" in the case of inconsiderate driving, but, broadly speaking, the new departure can only be regarded as ranging the club on the side of the scorcher. While a certain amount of unfair trapping still takes place it is equally undeniable that a vast amount of excessive speeding and reckless driving is still committed. Some time ago, indeed, the R.A.C. itself announced a scheme for the repression of the very kind of offences which its latest action is directly calculated to encourage. Who breaks pays. There is not the slightest reason to doubt that the vast majority of motorists who are fined for over speeding have deliberately broken the law, and though the law might be modified with advantage, it is a strong thing to assume that as things stand at present all such offenders have a claim to gratuitous defence out of corporate funds.

WOMAN.

SERVANT AND MISSIS.

IF I were an average maid in an average house I should frequently feel strongly inclined to assert my independence by cheeking my missis from time to time, by forgetting the slop-basin or the bread-knife with the unfailing regularity of a naturally good memory, or by inviting in a "friend" to finish the cold mutton-bone as often as I held it good for him. I should demand preposterously high wages—the highest rate of wages ever known to be paid in domestic service—and nothing less than the excitement of a death in the house would ever induce me to forego or postpone my evening out.

Though it is difficult enough to find a good servant, it is at least twice as hard to find a good mistress. Most mistresses may nowadays be divided into two classes; those who consider the maid too much, and those who consider her not at all. Of the two the former is by a long way the more unsatisfactory. Theoretically, of course, we are all equal; practically there is a great gulf fixed between upstairs and downstairs; and there is no greater stickler for this difference than is the servant herself. Even though she indulge in buckled shoes and Chantecler hats, as does her mistress, even though she rink passing well, and drink her tea with all the gentility of a protruding little finger, she is no less insistent on the difference, which, as long as we do not eat and work together, is inevitable. The mistress who, on obvious principle, has the welfare of her servants at heart, is certainly punished for her mistake. For it means that she directs her attention to their persons rather than to their work. While she takes credit to herself for insisting on open windows, frequent baths, and afternoon walks, they merely regard it as interference with the small amount of privacy that is theirs; when she inquires regularly for their aches and pains she raises in them expectations of a consideration that she is quite unable to fulfil. She would, indeed, be among the first to discourage the cook from staying in bed to breakfast on the ground that she had rinked too violently the previous evening and was a little stiff. When she says: "Would you mind doing this, Sarah?" instead of a plain "Do this," she does not really expect Sarah to take advantage of the suggested alternative by refusing to do that for which she is paid. When Sarah does take the law into her own hands, the mistress shows herself an unconscious humbug by scolding her peevishly, and in terror lest she should give notice. It is only the educated who understand the humbug of professional consideration, which consideration is more often than not based upon a purely selfish and futile endeavour to solve the servant problem.

The brutal mistress is at least consistent. She does not profess to consider her servants as human beings, nor does she treat them as such. She makes no bones about being mean, and does not even consider what they may think about her. She has no scruples about stairs, and, expecting the impossible, is naturally for the most part disappointed.

The fact is that the average mistress concentrates her attention too much upon the person and too little upon the function of the servant. She herself is not interested in house-work, nor is the servant interested either. Yet she dreads being made uncomfortable either morally or physically, and is thus continually and apprehensively watching her servants lest they should give notice. Half the servant trouble is caused by the mistress's fear of the maid's predilection for giving notice. The other half is due to the general nervousness of mistress towards maid, which makes all her commands tentative instead of final. To secure a good servant the mistress must show that she, too, appreciates a well-cleaned room or brightly polished silver. But her appreciation should not consist of a diffuse smile and indiscriminating praise. To be valuable, praise must be in exact proportion to merit. And it should not be distributed for merely average work. The really considerate mistress does not let her servants know that she is considerate. She works with persons, not with principles; she is friendly, but never familiar. Above all she endeavours to make her servants feel that it is as much to their interest as to her own to keep her house in order. The stigma that at present attaches to domestic service is as much the reflection of the mistress's own views as are buckled shoes and Chantecler hats of her own costume.

MRS. A.'S DIARY.

Thursday.—In Bond Street, the loneliest village of the plain, I chanced to meet the K.'s, some old American friends on their way to Paris, and this evening we foregathered and spent a delightful time at the Savoy. Husband, wife, daughter, and son were all of the party. The wife expresses the last word of gentle elegance with a manner full of grace and a demeanour of dignified calm not often hailing from the States. Her husband has an assertive crop of white hair and a no less assertive harvest of political information. His dogmas are distractingly involved to the mere lay ignorant mind of the idle, flippant Englishwoman, but he is alluringly eloquent, and I am satisfied never to know whether he is for or against the only Roosevelt, whether he appreciate or despise Tammany, and whether he deems the great Black question worthy of a great white answer. I listened greedily to his admirable phrases, and decided that a discerning future should place him in the Senate. In the intervals I was realising how admirably his pretty daughter understands the art of dress. She wore a quite charming frock with a mauve satin petticoat draped with cerise chiffon and over-draped with a tunic of mauve chiffon, while her bodice was formed of diaphanous folds of the two colours held at the waist by a narrow belt through which she had tucked a large rose of pale pink. Beneath her short petticoats I caught a glimpse of cerise silk stockings and mauve antelope shoes, eminently satisfying, and her hair was brought out in an old-world style over each ear in a thick loose plait, and coiled closely round the nape of the neck. They sat and talked and I listened till the hour was late and the lights were low, and we saw the great Marconi, looking younger than ever, and as merry and boyish as if he had not revolutionised the world of science and rendered the lot of the criminal fugitive anything but a happy one. He was talking to a gracious dame wearing a pleasing black frock of black net and a tight collar and pendant necklace of opals and pearls. I recognised her as an American when I heard her announcing that she was off to New York next Saturday; I never met one of her race who failed to do this.

Friday.—I again linger by the way of town, induced thereto by the fact that William has urgent need of some one to solace him, some one to forget that he does not take sugar in his tea. He is here en route for the North, and in proud possession of a new grey embroidered waistcoat, embroiderer unnamed.

To-night we went to the Coliseum to see Margaret Halstan in Mrs. W. K. Clifford's sketch "A Supreme Moment." I hate its moral that men always win, but I found the playlet far better written than most of its class, and Miss Halstan, whose acting was of the highest emotional order, looked radiantly beautiful, so beautiful indeed that it seems impossible that such mere trifles as a career and a little money should cause any man to leave her. Her first frock is of apricot-hued satin, with a tunic of mole-grey net, glittering with golden sequins in horizontal lines and bordered with coloured roses outlined with little turquoise beads. Her second is of white satin with an overskirt of chiffon broadly hemmed and tassled with shining bugles, while through the belt is thrust a bunch of red roses. I rather resented all the child-wonders of the programme, excepting Elsie Craven, whose pretty curls and rounded limbs added not a little to the fascination of her dancing; but I adored as ever Ada Reeve, who sings a song with more dramatic significance than any other actress on the stage. She has a nice sense of frocks, too, and her Saxe-blue satin was draped with much grace over cream lace coruscating with aluminium. She has an irresistible personality, and is generous with her talents withal, yielding many encores. William was especially impressed with her ditty which tells of the popularity of the habit of asking silly questions; and still I do not know the name of the lady who gave him that waistcoat! even though we went out to supper, where after he had confided to me with extensive detail the charms of this latest romance, and how he found her, and how he hopes he will never lose her, I remembered gratefully that man may shoot, and woman need not weep, and that the moors are a long way off, and William's industry as a letter-writer is no considerable quantity.

Joan's pink Shantung.

Saturday.—

"Where are the skirts of yester year?
Hanging in pleats round Joan, poor dear!"

Thus I criticised with all poetic and friendly licence my sister's appearance to-day at Cookham regatta, clad in a white serge dress A.D. 1909—and looking it every inch of its extensive petticoat, three yards round as the crow flies, as Edmund Payne describes his chest measurement.

It was a merry fête, and pretty women were much worn. Elderly but attractive, M—— declared the majority. Yet there were a few examples of triumphant youth. Marjorie achieved success in a white broderie Anglaise tunic, and Nellie, who wore linen with a dark blue hat banded with plaid straw, displayed a supremely becoming pair of powder-blue stockings encased in black patent-leather shoes. Iris Hawkins, of histrionic fame, coxed enthusiastically an energetic two, and looked very nice the while in a grey knitted woollen coat, a garment further patronised by a black-hatted, white-frocked slender figure in a dinghy. Constance Collier was a marvel in mauve, while Eva Moore and Lena Ashwell also represented the profession with elegance, and Nita exploited (to applause) a new brown hat wreathed with wild cherries. I sat contentedly with one Charlie, in a personally conducted electric launch; he is an ideal companion for the river: he never speaks—except to his dog. I supped with eighteen cheery others at G——'s, where the art of food is ever exquisitely interpreted and the practice of true hospitality a confirmed and much-appreciated habit.

Later, on the water, Colonel Ricardo entertained us with a capital concert, where amongst other pleasant circumstances I enjoyed the charm of Miss May Leslie Stuart's singing and the excellent outline of her soft white frock silhouetted against the dark background of night.

Mr. Kessler wound up the proceedings with a most generous display of gorgeous fireworks, culminating in portraits of the King and Queen—"very good, but not a bit like it," as a famous critic once described a famous actor's Hamlet. The lawns glowed with a thousand lights, and, as ever, when "the lamps quiver so far up the river," everybody who had never travelled further than Brighton pronounced the scene "so like Venice." (Note on modern manners: The search lanterns revealed no encircling arms, nor confiding hands, but the feminine many smoking cigarettes!)

Monday.—London is a land of lost husbands; some, I believe, have even been stolen, and others have strayed. Anyhow, there are many to be found, and in their entertainment may lurk the solution of the problem how to lose your best friend. To leave the metropolis at the moment seems flying in the face of a Providence willing to supply me with some amusement; nevertheless, I am going to Felixstowe shortly. Virginia, who lunched with me on her way to Cornwall, assured me that it is now the custom to conceal one's summer-time address, and that thus only can our intimates be persuaded from sharing our solitude and destroying its peaceful possibilities.

The latest fashion in affectations is to profess to want to go somewhere untrodden by the footsteps of man—or woman in her best clothes. Joan is the only candid creature of the deceitful many. She frankly declares no holiday resort is worthy of its name unless it be centred by a Casino; she condemns the simple life as a dreary bore; England as definitely ungay, and, with characteristic irreverence, asserts that "Good hats are more than rivulets, and graceful frocks than British woods."

She holds no view complete unless it include three other good bridge players, yet she denies that her sympathies are limited. She telephoned to announce her intention of leaving for Etrétat to-morrow. I believe she has now ordered and counter-ordered rooms at every hotel on the Continent frequented by the high finance, and will, doubtless, tarry in town another week. Yet I paid her another farewell visit this afternoon. I have already shown her this courtesy three times.

I rejoiced over her as a repentant sinner when I interviewed her latest treasure, a new pink shantung frock, made with a long coat bordered by a conventional design worked in small white beads, outlined with a band of black silk embroidered in white silk. This is distinctly new and very pleasing, and she is crowning it with a narrow helmet hat trimmed with a large black twisted bow at one side, while the neck and under-sleeves will show a border of white lace.

White lace, she told me gravely, as if she were imparting a new and valuable piece of information, is the latest trimming for black hats, a large wired bow of lace or a lace feather, or a bunch of wings contrived from lace are especially favoured. She was also full of the novelty of woollen hat trimmings achieved in crochet, a wreath of flowers worked over wires in this style having excited her considerable interest, and she had read in some paper that crochet flowers are permitted to do duty as the heads of hatpins. "Give me jewels," I cried, but up to the time of going to press nobody had liberally replied to this exhortation.

Robert has just been in to bid me good-bye before he departs on a yachting trip, which he threatens to wind up at Felixstowe, whence I am to be taken up the Orwell to Pin Mill, and expected to enjoy various seafaring privileges which I have ever bitterly hated. Why should I be supplied with the wants of others? There are so many who like yachting, and not a few who like Robert.

Mrs. A.'s Letter-Box.

I have been persuaded to counsel through these columns all wise women who send me their dress difficulties to solve. But their inquiries must be clearly addressed to Mrs. A., "Truth" Office, Carteret Street, S.W.

GWLADYS.—It is difficult to give you any good advice with such scanty details. I should know, for example, whether you want to do your hair up or in the nape of the neck. A usual and popular style is to part it in the centre and have small curls pinned up right round the back, rolled lengthwise. Then you can bring the hair out beyond the ears to whatever extent this may suit the shape of the face. Another method is to tie it into a bunch of curls with a very broad black ribbon bow. Some girls look best with the hair parted in the centre; others with it parted at one side. In most cases I advise the crown to be smoothly brushed and the hair placed low.

MOTLEY.—The most popular veils have a very wide mesh, in form like the ordinary garden netting. You should wear a grey veil with a grey hat, and a brown veil with a brown hat. Personally, I do not care for white shoes worn with coloured stockings, but have no objection to black patent leather shoes with stockings that match the dress. The antelope shoes are popular in grey and brown, but under no circumstances should these be accompanied by white stockings.

THE ACCOMPLISHMENT SCHOOL.

Some fifteen or twenty years ago the struggle between the high school and the private school was at its height. One result of the two forces—young-ladyism and boyishness—is the present-day accomplishment school, really the direct descendant, with a difference, of Miss Pinkerton's academy. Miss Pinkerton presented departing pupils with Johnson's Dictionary, which I much doubt if they ever looked at again; the modern Miss Pinkerton professes, at least, to teach the uses and meaning of Johnson, which ideal, however unattainable, is not merely confined to the drawing-room table.

Literature is, I suppose, the keynote of the accomplishment school, and, in a less degree, music and handicrafts. The circulating library, the cheap reprint, the fashion of culture among the middle classes, have made it imperative that the schoolgirl of to-day should at least not look astonished at the mention of Plato or even Oscar Wilde. Since, too, modern parents, viâ books for the bairns and their kind, have achieved a certain modicum of literary knowledge, the standard for their offspring naturally becomes more exacting. Manners loom large on the horizon of the accomplishment school. One school of my acquaintance has taught its pupils that politeness is as advisable between equals as between superior and inferior. Afternoon tea becomes an occasional function, and visitors are invited to see the girls hand cake and bread and butter properly. The girls usually put on white frocks for supper, and during the evening further accomplishments of playing, singing, or recitation accustom them to an audience. In some schools newspapers, and, of course, their concomitant politics, also stand for an educational asset.

High lights cast deep shadows, and the accomplishment school has the faults of its qualities. To begin with, it is apt to depend far too much on the personality of the headmistress. For it to be a success the headmistress must possess, beside learning and domesticity, a knowledge of the world and a habit of mixing with it. Such a woman is the exception in any walk of life; a headmaster, besides usually possessing more opportunities, is not expected to be domestic. Through the enforced narrowness of her life, too, the headmistress is apt to lose her sense of proportion; it is difficult, indeed, to be omnipotent and omniscient, even for a week, without setting up a false standard. I know one headmistress who possesses an admirable manner, and who has experience of people and things. On the other hand, she has none of the systematic knowledge that is implied even by an ordinary degree. She is an elegant conversationalist, but knows no language beyond her own. Her girls are healthy and well-mannered, but their parents complain that while they can transpose Addison into Johnson, they spell fir-tree "fur-tree," and tow-path "toe-path." Another headmistress has a brilliant London degree, but she colours when spoken to by a stranger, and spills her tea in another person's house. Both of them conduct their schools on the accomplishment principle.

I lay so much stress on the personality of the headmistress, because you can learn in five minutes from imitation what hours of abstract theory could not teach you. And there is perhaps no more imitative animal than the average school-girl. Time is the chief difficulty in an accomplishment school conducted on really accomplished lines, and manners take up even more of the day than does French or arithmetic. Even in modern times a day has only twenty-four hours, and to instil both fact and culture in time devoted hitherto only to one of them necessitates much unconscious exertion of the imitative faculty. Only a really strong and original personality, moreover, can prevent the accomplishment school from degenerating into the artificiality of its prototype.

The aim of the accomplishment school to render girls' school-life less of a segregational institution cannot be too warmly commended. At the same time parents would do well to be more on their guard against both shallowness and prejudice. It is difficult to study the newspapers without prejudice, which prejudice may be quite in the opposite direction from that indulged in by parents themselves; also much adjectival palaver on the subject of Shakespeare or another is apt to lead to second-hand appreciation—the very thing against which it should have guarded; finally, it is always useful to read, write, and reckon well and correctly, whereas accomplishments by themselves are a doubtful quantity. Given the right personality in the headmistress, however; given also more time than is usually the lot of those pupils who are later to become teachers, and there is a great deal to be said for the accomplishment school.

LETTER FROM MADGE.

Dearest Amy,—Do you remember a copious correspondence in the papers some time ago about Psycho, the extraordinarily clever automaton whist-player made by Mr. Maskelyne and exhibited in London? We went to see it in St. George's Hall one day last week. It was our first acquaintance with the remarkable android. I had to look in the dictionary for this word, and find that it means an automaton with a face like that of a human being. Psycho is costumed like a Turk, and sits on an ebony stool, which was handed about among the audience in order to show that there is no mechanism of any kind in it. The mechanical part of the figure itself was also shown to all who wished to examine it closely. As Mr. Maskelyne humorously remarked, "You will discover nothing from this. If you could, I should not show it to you." The construction of the machine occupied him, he told us, for two years and a-half, and all of it, except the outer case, was made by his own hands. It was first shown to the public so far back as 1875, when it caused an immense amount of comment in the papers. It plays a good game of whist with any three members of the audience who care to take a hand on the platform. Among the players on the day we were present was a gentleman who had played with Psycho in the same way thirty-five years since.

The cards are dealt by one of the players at the table, and Psycho's thirteen are placed before him, each card being stuck in a metal frame something like a menu holder. When it is his turn to play he looks at his cards in a most natural way; selects one, picks it up, and raises it in his right hand. Now, how does he manage to select the right card? That is the question that has puzzled a whole generation of men.

Equally natural is his manner of smoking a cigarette. He does it with a nice deliberation, raising it in his left hand, taking a puff and then holding it in his fingers while the game goes on. It lasts until the end. There must be some means of inspiring, otherwise the cigarette could not keep alight. How is it done? The emission of the smoke is entirely natural, and so is the way he turns his head and glances in the direction of his "smoke" before raising it to his lips.

The performance at Maskelyne and Devant's includes some remarkably clever tricks of illusion performed by Mr. Owen Clark, and a young man whose brain appears to consist of rows of figures gave us any dates we asked for. Demands ranged from Boadicea to the loss of the ill-fated Waratah, and embraced such a variety of subjects as the Tay Bridge disaster, the murder of Mr. Briggs in a railway carriage, and the battle of Tel-el-Kebir. When some one asked this extraordinary young man for the date of some event he not only gave it, but rattled out half-a-dozen others in connection with it. Asked when some celebrity was born, he gave the year, then the dates of his father's and grandfather's birth, with several interesting particulars that relieved the dry-as-dustiness of mere dates. He put my brain in a whirl, and I have not quite got over him yet. He is quite prodigious.

Marion says she will never again have a servant who belongs to the Girls' Friendly Society. I asked her why, and she said that on three separate occasions during the last three or four months the "friend" of her parlourmaid had invited the girl to meet her at a railway station at 1 p.m., just when she would be needed to lay the luncheon table and wait. "I let the girl go," said Marion, "because I did not like to disappoint her. Servants have so few pleasures. But it was very inconvenient, and the 'friend' should have known better than to suggest it." I have no doubt that the G.F.S. is very useful indeed in cases where servants are badly treated, half-starved, or otherwise ill-used, but they should accommodate their plans to the convenience of the employers. Otherwise, mistresses will avoid with care having a G.F.S. girl in their establishments. It seems a pity that the indiscreet members of the society should do anything to prejudice it in the eyes of employers.

Marion went to the registry office expecting the usual difficulty in finding good servants. On the contrary, there were many excellent cooks, housemaids, parlourmaids, all anxious to find places. "I have some first-rate women and girls on my books," said the manageress. "Ladies going out of town dismiss their maids instead of keeping them on and putting them on board wages. They say that so many weeks with little or nothing to do makes the servants idle, and quite spoils them for work when the family returns to town." So Marion had almost an embarras de choix. Oddly enough, among the names sent to her were two Nightingales and a Jenny Lind. The latter seemed quite unconscious that any one of note had borne this once-famous name before her.

Sophie used to take a house by the sea or in the country for August and September, and take all her servants with her, but she will never do it again, she says. On her return last year every one of them gave her notice. Astonished, she asked them why, and discovered that they had all become engaged to be married while at the seaside, Sophie having allowed them to be out as much as possible, so that they might benefit by the sea air. The cook had engaged herself to a man young enough to be her son, a butler who was going to take a public-house. The parlourmaid had promised to enter into holy matrimony with a nigger minstrel; and the housemaid, catching the hymeneal infection, had suddenly determined to marry at once the young man she had been "walking out with" for a couple of years, a cornchandler's assistant earning 17s. 6d. a week. All these facts Sophie elicited from the blushing trio. Poor things! The future does not seem to be very rosy for them.

Somebody will wake up some day to the anomaly of a wealthy country like our own being content to have but one weekly post to India and Africa. Then people will wonder why the country has put up with this limitation for so long. After that we shall have a bi-weekly service, and ultimately a daily one. Why not? It is but a question of money, and the Post Office is very rich. Those who have relatives and friends in these far-away lands think a weekly mail very insufficient, and telegrams are 2s. a word to India and 2s. 6d. to South Africa.

Clare sends me the following from Dublin:—

Dearest Madge,—Miss Broughton, in one of her clever books, satirises a too girlish "elderlyness," as "mutton masquerading as lamb." It is much the same case with mature August affecting the pranks and fickle ways of April. Think of the worry of us women in preparing for the next fortnight. It was, indeed, severe. Dress preparations from Alpha to Omega, to face any contingency from Arctic to tropical temperature, from wild storms to dead calms, and so on. Grania, with the thoughtfulness of modern youth, has had her winter clothes brought up to date; they are, in her judgment, a necessary adjunct this year to the usual smart Horse Show dress. "And besides," she adds, "the best chance of not having to wear them is to have them ready to wear."

Apropos of Horse Show dressing, one recalls the interest excited some years ago on the arrival at Kingston during a very smart Viceroyalty of a very smart member of the Viceregal house party of the "week," when a huge pile of "boxes" on the pier represented her personal luggage—her "very own," as the children say. "The Lord help 'himself,' shure, it's the wife must lean very heavy on him," a commiserating porter remarked, sorting out the pile for the train.

Princess Louise of Schleswig-Holstein, who often visits Ireland, has been staying with Sir Henry and Lady Blake at Myrtle Grove, near Youghal. The house is the Elizabethan one in which Sir Walter Raleigh lived; in its domain grew the first potato that ever sprang from Irish soil. In fact, it is the ancestral home of the potato, and what an important part that tuber has played in Ireland ever since! Some of us lament that Raleigh did not stop at the beneficent potato instead of further introducing the somewhat baneful tobacco into the kingdom.

Lord and Lady Bandon are entertaining at Bernard Castle, also in Cork County. They usually come to Dublin for the Horse Show week. Lord Bandon's heir is his cousin, Mr. Percy Bernard, who lives near Dublin, and takes much interest in Irish industrial and political affairs. His politics, tempered by a kindly disposition, are of the live and let live sort, and he is popular with all parties.

Our English "Ulster," Captain Neville Wilkinson and Lady Beatrix, with their family, are spending the summer at Mount Merrion, near Dublin, Lord Pembroke's only residence in Ireland, in which he possesses so much valuable property. The Pembrokes belong to the absentee landlord class, of whom Swift writes the scathing lines, too uncomplimentary to repeat, that is, with regard to their absenteeism. Of late years Lord and Lady Pembroke have paid occasional visits to Ireland.

Dean Greene, who died last week in England, was very popular in Dublin, where he spent a long and benevolent life. Only lately he resigned the office of Dean of Christ Church Cathedral, which he had held for twenty years. He was the son of an Irish judge and connected with the Plunket family, of which Lord Plunket is the head. He was the uncle of Sir W. C. Greene and Mr. H. Plunket Greene. Like his brother, the late Mr. T. Greene, he was eminently of the type of Christian defined by Hare as "God Almighty's gentleman."

This week the Leopardstown races on Saturday begin our festive time, after that we shall be in a social whirl, to end with the first "flying meeting" in Irish air. We hope it will be less breezy then than it has been for some time.

The Chief Secretary may fitly be numbered amongst those paying a "flying visit" to Ireland just now. He and Mrs. Birrell will spend some of the vacation in the country which Mr. Birrell generally governs from across the water. The official residence in the Phœnix Park finds no favour in his eyes. Notwithstanding its comfortable and breezy attractions, he will probably take up his abode in a less imposing one within the precincts of Dublin Castle. The Chief Secretary of a Radical Government is little likely to be popular in Irish society, wherein he has a difficult part to play. The pity is that Mr. Birrell's social charm and geniality should not have more scope in a country so capable of appreciating them.—Yours ever,

CLARE.

I send you some recipes dealing with the little brown birds of the month, and also one for salmon, so delicious just now.

Celestines of Grouse à la Vénitienne.—Cut the meat from one or two roast grouse, chop the bones and boil them with stock, vegetables, and a wine-glass of sherry. After straining this remove the grease and reduce the stock to demi-glaze; to this add half-a-pint of brown sauce and the finely minced meat of the grouse, adding a spoonful each of cooked chopped mushroom and chopped tongue, salt and pepper to season and the yolks of two eggs. Stir it on the stove to set the eggs, then spread it, three-quarters of an inch thick, on a flat dish to cool. When it is quite firm cut it out with a cutlet-shaped cutter, mask the cutlets with reduced brown sauce, to which is added a tablespoonful of purée of tomato, a piece of glaze, and a third its volume of aspic jelly. Decorate the round part with leaves of hard-boiled white of egg, dish them on a border of tomato aspic, garnish the centre with juliennes of truffles and cooked carrot, duly seasoned with vinaigrette, and put chopped jelly round the dish and a sprig of chervil here and there.

Mousse of Grouse.—Pour a little liquid aspic into a charlotte mould, decorate the bottom with leaves of chervil and star-shaped pieces of truffle. Place a large jar in the centre of the mould and fill it with cold water. Pour melted aspic between the jar and the mould, and when it is set remove the jar, thus leaving a cavity. Mince 6 ozs. of cooked grouse, chop the bones of the bird and stew them two or three hours with stock, after which strain and reduce the stock to demi-glaze. Pound the minced grouse, adding 2 ozs. of butter, the glaze and salt and pepper to taste. Rub the purée through a wire sieve, mix it with two tablespoonfuls of cream, and with it fill the cavity in the mould, pour a little cold aspic on the top, and when it is set turn it out on a silver dish. Garnish it prettily with chopped aspic and cut ripe tomatoes, seasoned with oil, vinegar, salt, and pepper.

Grouse Salad is always acceptable.—Cut one or more quite young, cooked grouse into neat pieces, remove the skin, and coat them with brown chaudfroid sauce, in which a spoonful of stiffly-reduced tomato purée is mixed, decorate them with a round of truffle, or a few leaves of tarragon. Set a border mould with aspic, garnish it with cold cut vegetables, such as carrots, peas, and potatoes, placing them tastefully in the mould and filling it gradually with aspic. When serving the salad arrange the pieces of grouse on the border and garnish the centre with crisp lettuce mixed with mayonnaise sauce, and make a border of chopped aspic and halves of tomato filled with cooked green peas.

Soufflé of Grouse à la Regence.—Remove the skin and gills from a dozen white mushrooms, and after chopping them sprinkle them with lemon juice, cook in a covered stewpan with an ounce of butter, a pinch of salt, and a squeeze of lemon juice. Mince 6 ozs. of cooked grouse, pound it with a tablespoonful of brown sauce, 2 ozs. of butter, and two tablespoonfuls of demi-glaze, made with the reduced liquor of the boiled bones. Rub the meat through a wire sieve and mix it in a stewpan on the stove until warm, add the purée of mushroom and season it with salt and pepper. Work in the yolks of four eggs, each one separately, and very lightly the stiffly-whipped whites of four eggs. Bake the soufflé in a silver soufflé lining for twenty minutes, and serve it directly it is done.

Soufflé de Saumon à la Raifort.—Pound 6 ozs. of raw salmon with 2 ozs. of butter and 2 ozs. of bread panada, which is made by stewing 2 ozs. of breadcrumbs in a gill of stock until it is a stiff paste, then cooling it. When it is thoroughly pounded work in two eggs, salt, pepper, and a teaspoonful of passed lobster spawn. Rub the fish through a fine wire sieve and work it briskly with a gill and a-half of cream. Steam it in a buttered timbale mould, and, when serving it, pour round it a creamy cucumber sauce, and at the last moment put iced horseradish sauce in the centre.

To make the horseradish sauce.—Mix two tablespoonfuls of grated horseradish with half a gill of whipped cream and half a gill of aspic jelly, season with salt and pepper, and put it in the ice box until required for use.

For the cucumber sauce.—Parboil a minced cucumber in salted water for ten minutes, drain and finish cooking the cucumber in a little good stock, which reduce. With a teaspoonful of sugar, rub the cucumber through a hair sieve, mix it with half its quantity of white sauce and two tablespoonfuls of thick cream.

Ever your loving Cousin, MADGE.

BENGER'S

The particular and important feature of Benger's Food is that it can be prepared to suit any degree of digestive power. It contains in itself the natural digestive principles which act during the cooling process just before it is finally heated for serving. As the weak stomach of babe or invalid begins to strengthen by the assimilation of the Food, a gradually increasing amount of digestive work can be left to it, thus giving the advantage of a regulated exercise of the digestive functions

"Retained when all other foods are rejected."

"TRUTH" PUZZLES.

"TRUTH" DOLL AND TOY SHOW.

PRELIMINARY NOTICE.

It seems early days yet to be reminding my readers of an event which is still four months ahead. But the fact that some 4,000 of dolls have already arrived from the manufacturers, and are crying aloud for clothes, impels me to direct the attention of TRUTH'S lady friends to their condition, and to the fact that they will be required for exhibition at the Albert Hall in the middle of December, prior to distribution among the London Poor Law Schools and Hospitals.

I hope that many ladies will take pity on the poor dolls, and forward their applications as soon as possible. The usual prizes for the dressing of the dolls will, of course, be awarded after the Show.

HOME-MADE TOYS.

The exhibits in this class last year did not come up to expectations. This year special efforts will be made to stimulate amateur toy-makers to take part in the Competition. With that object in view the Editor of TRUTH has decided (assuming the entries warrant it) to give a Special Prize for

HOME-MADE DOLLS' HOUSES,

in addition to the usual Prizes offered in the Home-Made Toys Class.

He desires me now to direct particular notice to this, as he is of opinion that the making of Dolls' Houses is an art in which amateur talent is likely to find congenial scope for its exercise. Moreover, a Dolls' House is a peculiarly serviceable sort of plaything for children, both because it is one in the delights of which several can share simultaneously, and also because it is better able to withstand the wear and tear of daily use than smaller and more fragile toys.

A further and more detailed announcement of the Show will appear in due course. Meanwhile, let readers of TRUTH make a careful note of the date, which is Wednesday and Thursday, December 14 and 15, 1910.

CONDENSED RULES.

All answers to the current Puzzle must be sent in on or before the morning of the Monday week following the date of that Puzzle's publication to the PUZZLE EDITOR, TRUTH Buildings, Carteret Street, Queen Anne's Gate, London, S.W. The answers must be signed by a nom-de-plume of not more than twelve letters, and must not be sent on postcards, nor by telegraph, nor by hand, whilst in the case of new competitors the real name and address must be forwarded with the first reply sent.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE No. 1,644.

I am indebted for the subject of this week's competition to an obliging correspondent. He calls my attention to the fact that "Dagonet," of the Referee, has spoken of Golder's Park, Hampstead, as the prettiest Park in London. "With this opinion," adds my correspondent, "many of your readers may not agree;" and he goes on to express the view that a London Parks Competition would make an interesting subject for one of TRUTH'S weekly puzzles.

In that view I quite concur, and I hereby offer the usual Prize of Two Guineas to that competitor who shall prove successful in NAMING, IN ORDER OF MERIT, THE THREE PRETTIEST PARKS IN LONDON.

N.B.—London, for purposes of this competition, should be interpreted to mean the administrative County of London, and also the area embraced by what is technically known as The City.

The Prize award will be determined on a plébiscite basis.

No competitor may submit more than one list of three prettiest parks, and all lists of Parks must reach TRUTH Office by the first post on Monday, August 29.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE No. 1641.—ASSORTED SPECIMENS—GOOD AND OTHERWISE.

HUMOROUS ANECDOTES, ILLUSTRATIVE OF THE EXAGGERATED BOASTFULNESS OF THE TYPICAL YANKEE.

1. A Yankee, viewing Windsor Castle from a boat on the Thames, at Datchet, said: "I guess it's noo (new) alongside our White House." 2. Harvard licks all creation, as a scholastic emporium.—Canning.

A Yankee and an Englishman were staying together in an hotel in London, which being very full, the two men had to be satisfied with a double-bedded room. The Englishman was beginning to be very "sick" of the Yankee's denunciation of everything English and his constant bragging of the vast superiority of everything in the States. Taking a stroll one afternoon the Englishman saw a man with a coster's barrow full of tortoises. He bought a pretty big one, and, taking it to the hotel, slipped it into the Yankee's bed. At night the Englishman managed to get into bed first, leaving the Yankee to put out the light, which, when he had done, he jumped into bed. Immediately there was a deuce of a yell—the Yankee was out of bed in a jiffy, turned up the light, opened his bed, and saw the tortoise. "Well," said he, "I guess the United States will have to take a back seat in bugs anyway." (N.B.—Every insect in the States is a bug).—A. S.

Another illustration of the speed with which trains travel. It is said that the signal whistle is of no use on a certain line "down East," because on one occasion at least the train was smashed in a collision before the sound of the whistle got there. Again, the backwoodsman is so proficient in the use of an axe that one is known to have sheared off the ear of a dog with such ease that the animal was unaware of his loss until he put up his paw to scratch the missing organ.—Arundo.

"When I lived in Maine," said Uncle Ezra, "I helped to break up a new piece of ground; we got the wood off in the winter, and early in the spring we began ploughing on't. It was so concarned rocky that we had to get forty yoke of oxen to one plough—we did, faith—and I held that plough more'n a week; I thought I should die. It e'en amost killed me. Why, one day I was hoein', and the plough hit a stump which measured just nine feet and a half thro' it—hard and sound white oak. The plough split it, and I was going straight through the stump when I happened to think it might snap together again, so I threw my feet out, and had no sooner done this, than it snapped together, taking a smart hold of the seat of my pantaloons. Of course, I was tight, but I held on to the plough handles, and though the teamsters did all they could, that team of eighty oxen could not tear my pantaloons, nor cause me to let go my grip. At last, though, after letting the cattle breathe, they gave another strong pull all together, and the old stump came out about the quickest; it had monstrous long roots, too, let me tell you. My wife made the cloth for them pantaloons, and I haven't worn any other kind since." The only reply was: 'I should have thought it would have come hard upon your suspenders." "Powerful hard."—Kroy (York).

Talk about the thoughtful Britisher, he's not in it with the Yankee. Here's one little instance. When Phineas K. Baldwin "struck ile"—tapped a natural petroleum reservoir—in his backyard at Slinkersville, Missouri, U.S.A., he didn't want to give the thing away, because the locality suited him, being quiet and respectable; and he knew that if it leaked out that oil had been found, the vicinity would be rushed. So he quietly barrelled the oil, and sent it away, telling his neighbours that it was some new kind of spa-water he had discovered that was mighty stimulating and invigorating. One of the citizens who heard him was just recovering from a severe attack of ague, and he asked Phineas K. to give him some of his spa-water to brace him up. Phineas K. naturally refused. So one night the sick citizen, also naturally, climbed over Phineas K.'s fence, and crept to the well, and drank about a quart of petroleum. It made him sicker than when he accidentally ate his mustard plaster in mistake for a ham sandwich. He crawled home, and got busted up, through his breath catching fire and exploding him when he tried to blow the candle out. There was nothing left of him except a suspender button and a smell of paraffin, and the coroner's jury had to be content with sitting on those. The widow was a good deal broken up by the accident, but she was not half so much broken up by it as her husband was. In time, as the first fierce torrent of her grief was assuaged, she thought she could trace in this last sad incident another proof of her dear departed's loving thoughtfulness, for she was sure he must have had some premonition of impending death, and had carefully arranged to go off in this way in order to save her the worry and expense of a funeral.—Kroy.

Say, Sam, that's real sad about Derk. B. Robinson. What's that? Wal, you know he's always been real frightened of fire, and when he moved into his new sky tenement, on the eighth floor of New Buildings, 35th Street, he most died of fright, fearing the place would catch on fire. Wal, finding he could never run down the stairs or get out of the building except through the window, he had a rubber suit made—all blown up like a bike tyre and ready to put on when the house caught fire. Slick in the middle of the night Derk wakes to find the place ablaze, so he on with his suit and jumps like a kangaroo out of the window, but his pneumatic suit is such a derned good one that when he touched ground he bounced, and he went on bouncing three days and nights till at last they had to shoot him to save him from dying of starvation. Sad death.—Adela.

1. At a recent swimming gala two of the spectators were discussing the merits of the various entrants for the diving competition. Said one, "I wonder what is the shallowest water that these fellows would dive into?" The other replied, "Well, when I was at the sea last year there was a man who every morning dived off the top of a bathing machine into about two feet of water." An American who was standing by and who had overheard the conversation felt called upon to uphold the superiority of his countrymen. "Waal, stranger," said he, "way out in Kansas I knew a man who could dive off the top of a pantechnicon into a puddle."—Heth.

2. An American and an Englishman were once discussing the relative speeds attained on the railways of their respective countries. "Why," said the Englishman, "we think nothing of travelling at ninety miles an hour in this country." "Waal," replied the Yankee, "I guess we can lick you there. I was once travelling on the railroad in my country, and we were going pretty slick, but nothing special. A Britisher who was on the car says to me, 'Say, what's that large cemetery we're passing?' 'I don't see any cemetery,' says I. 'Why, man,' he says, 'can't you see all the tombstones?' 'Tombstones!' says I. They're not tombstones they're milestones!'"—Heth.

The news comes from Kansas that a boy climbed a cornstalk to look around him, and now the stalk is growing faster than the boy can climb down. The boy is right out of sight. Two men have tried to cut down the stalk, but it grows so fast that they can't hit twice in the same place. Much anxiety prevails. —J. Pen.

An Englishman boasted to an American of the superiority of the horses of his country. He instanced that the celebrated Eclipse had run a mile a minute. "My good man," exclaimed the Yankee, "that is rather less than the average rate of our common roadsters. I live at my country seat near Boston, and when riding to town in the morning my own shadow can't keep pace with me, but generally comes into the office to find me from a minute to a minute and a-half after my arrival. One morning my horse was restless, and I rode him as fast as I could several times round a large factory, just to take the Old Harry out of him. Well, sir, he went so fast that the whole time I saw my back directly before me and was twice in danger of riding over myself. English horses, indeed!"—Ephesea.

An American having been in London exactly ten days, and consequently being thoroughly acquainted with all the sights, proceeds to pilot round a newly-arrived friend. He takes him to the Tower Bridge. "That is what is known as the Tower; that's where all the old Kings and Queens of England came to be beheaded—traitors, and them sort o' 'guys.'" "Oh, I've read about that. Ain't there a block and an axe one can see?" "Man, you are certainly badly read. Don't you know they disappeared with the Crown jewels?" "It's a fine structure!" "I should say it was. It's millions and mill—well, thousands and thousands o' years old." "Who was the architect?" "Man, you've done me. I can't remember his name—a very famous man, though—lived in the reign of King Frank." "What?" "Lived in the reign of King Frank." "But I've never heard of a King Frank." "No, no, you wouldn't know nothin' about him—a most unpopular King."—Jic.

Scene.—Stratford-on-Avon, the "Mecca" of the travelling American. Two Americans doing the "grand tour" have just arrived, and the following conversation ensues:—"Well, Josh, here we are at last—Stratford-on-Avon—Shakespeare's birthplace. Now see here, when we get back to Omaha, no matter what tales we tell about the other towns and cities we have visited, the straight tale about Stratford. Others from Omaha have been here, therefore keep very wise to everything you see or hear." "I'll do that. Don't you think we might have something to eat before we start? Where shall we go?" "Where shall we go? Why, right here, of course—the Shakespeare Hotel." They enter the coffee-room and find, over the mantel-piece, a large painting, underneath which is a tablet, inscribed, "Room in which Shakespeare was born." "Josh, we've struck a spoof 'joint.' Waiter! waiter! Waiter: "Yes, sir?" "Do you imagine this paintin' is authentic—correct?" Waiter: "Quite authentic, sir, and quite correct." "Then let me tell you, sir, you Britishers know nothin'—absolutely nothin'. Why, man alive, I thought the smallest infant knew that he was born in a manger!"—Jic.

"Yes, gentlemen," remarked the Yankee commercial, "the firm I represent—the Human Developer Co.—boasts some remarkable testimonies to its usefulness in the cause of suffering humanity. For instance, some months ago a railway worker lost his leg and sent for a box of our limb provider mixture. After the first dose a pimple appeared where the leg had been. He persevered, occasionally drinking whole bottles full. The growth continued and gradually gained shape until it was eighteen inches long, when a kneecap formed. Still it progressed, and yesterday the patient informed me that nails are forming on the new foot. The only drawback is that the limb is childlike; whenever the man sits down the new leg persists in kicking the table, like a baby's would do."—Glenrosa.

An American walking down the Strand seized upon a gentleman who was passing and, shaking him warmly by the hand, claimed acquaintance with him. The gentleman protested he had no recollection of the other. "Probably not," returned the Yankee; "your memory is not so good as mine. Allow me to refresh it, sir. We met in the air just after the boiler of a steamer burst. As you were going up I was coming down. I never forget a face, sir!"—Glenrosa.

An English merchant was rather bragging to an American commercial brother on the amount of business done by his firm. "Why," said the Yankee, after listening to the tale of figures, "we save ten thousand dollars a year in our ink bill by not allowing our clerks to dot their i's or cross their t's."—Neno.

An American express had a collision, and the engine was terribly smashed. A doctor got down and went to the front of the train. As he was leaning over the driver to see if he were dead, he heard a whistle and some swear words. The unfortunate driver had switched on the one and uttered the other when he saw the accident was imminent, but was dead before the sound reached him.—Neno.

A Scot and a Yankee were in hot dispute as to the merits of their respective fatherlands. "Eh, mon," quoth Sandy, "America is weel enough for folks to emigrate tae, but in comparison wi' Scotland it's just naethin' ava." "Scotland!" snorted the offended Yank, "Why, Sirree, Scotland could be hid away in any odd corner of our magnificent country and no one ever guess that it was there, except for the smell of whisky."—Hopeful.

"We put a live hen into one of our fireproof safes, lit a fire round it, opened the safe after twelve hours; then hen stepped out alive." "That's nothing," said a rival Bostonian. "We tried much the same experiment in one of our safes, and when we opened the door after twenty-four hours the chicken was a block of ice."—T. de P.

Your Paulhan and White are great fliers, but I guess old Abe Mansfield holds the record. He went prospecting up the mountains, taking his old mule with him, and, night coming on, he fitted up his raggy tent and, creeping into it, went to sleep. When he wakened up he found himself speeding through the air at ten miles a second rate—not a bad figure for an old man. The wind had caught the tent and carried him parachute-like a whole fifty miles in five ticks of the clock, and the wind, being an intelligent one, dropped him nicely and neighbourly-like into one of his own fields. When he got to his feet and shook himself clear of the tent he saw his old mule standing a few yards off bolting the hay for all he was worth. The old mule, you see, had been tethered to the tent-pole and had acted as good ballast. Your aviators can't beat that. —Northlander.

"Talk about your lack of babies and your family famine," said the Yankee, "I knew a man who, when he got married to his seventh wife—this happened in my State, Ohio—his children and their children, with their children, couldn't get into the banqueting hall in the ordinary way; they had to form a queue nearly a mile long, with policemen to keep them in line; that was a line of descendants for you."—Northlander.

Two Yankees were discussing the Jeffries-Johnson fight in Broadway, New York, and one said to the other, "Say, but I don't call that nigger coon a black; he's simply got a tint shed over him." "How do you make that out?" "Well, folks don't know, anyway, what a fellah should look like to be real black, but I saw one once that was the real sort I'm talking about, and I discovered it right there." "You don't say," said the other. "What was he like?" "Well, he was so black that when I whipped out a bit of charcoal and drew it across his skin it left a darned white streak on the background!"—Georgina.

"Does it pay to advertise with us?" sniffed the Yankee editor to the backwoods farmer, "Why, I should think it does. Only last week a Florida family, who had lost their little boy, advertised in our columns, giving his description, etc. That very afternoon an alligator crawled out of the swamp and lay down and died on the front door step. In his stomach the distracted father found a handful of red hair, some bone buttons, a glass marble, a pair of pants, and a paper collar. How do you think that speaks for our advertising department?"—Hypatia.

An American and Englishman were passing St. Paul's Cathedral, and the latter, thinking he would surprise the former, remarked: "Don't you think I have wonderful eyesight, for I can see a fly on the cross of St. Paul's?" "Fairly good," the American rejoined, "though not equal to mine, for I can see that fly and notice that it is winking at us."—W. J. S.

Some Yankees from rival cities were bragging at a bar of their fishing exploits, the last speaker's record being always the most marvellous. A Chicago man and a St. Louis man lay low, hoping to get the last word. At last the St. Louis man was asked, "Do you never fish?" "Fish! You bet." "What do you catch?" "Whales." "Whales," said the Chicago man, contemptuously; "we use them for bait." With a wink at the company one of them offered to bet the St. Louis man that Chicago could tell the biggest lie any day. The bet being taken, the Chicago man was called to speak first. "Well," said he, "there was once a gentleman of Chicago—" "Stop!" said he of St. Louis; "take my dollar. I can't beat that any way."—Ancient Mariner.

"Fine orchestra," said the Queen's Hall enthusiast, as Henry J. Wood's baton continued to draw the soul out of his glorious band. The enthusiast's American friend considered the matter. "Fine, you say? Why, so far as it goes, I'm not saying it ain't a good little band enough, but if you're using 'fine' in the sense of being large—Great Christopher! you'd oughter see some of our musical combinations in the States. Why, in one of the orchestras over there the chief tympanist is so far away from the conductor he has to come in three bars ahead of time to allow for the sound travelling. —Nibbler.

"Seventy mile per hour, you say? Wall, in the States I guess we'd call thet crawlin'. I knew a man who shot at a bird across a railway track in America. Express flashed past just at the time. Same charge of buckshot killed the driver and broke every window down the hull length of thet train, woundin' over eighty passengers."—Thersites.

"Yass, I guess Amurican seamen air smart now. I knew one that fell from the topsails into the sea and announced, 'Man overboard!' as he passed the decks. The boat was lowered and waiting for him when he came up for the first time. Yass, I guess they air smart."—Thersites.

The American visitor had ordered a leg of mutton, and mine host had provided the best obtainable, but his guest had informed him that "in America" mutton chops were of superior size. That was yesterday. To-day Boniface had been told that the fine chicken he had prepared would be called a sparrow "in America." This was too much. Determining to "get his own back," he procured three large lobsters and, placing them in the Yankee's bed, awaited the latter's retirement. Patience was rewarded. Close on midnight terrible shouts disturbed the air, and soon the American appeared with one lobster hanging to each ear and the other to his nose. "Here, what d'ye call these tarnation things?" he cried. "Oh," answered mine host, indifferently, "they're English fleas; got any like 'em in America?"—Alpha Beta.

A damsel, wearing a hat of enormous proportions, had just passed by, and the Englishman observed that his companion had doubtless not previously seen such colossal headgear. The American, however, declared that the ladies in the States were well to the fore in Dreadnought millinery, proceeding thus:—"When the venue of the Jeff-Johnson fight was changed, it was found that in Reno there was no big building available, and it looked as if the affair would fall through, when the wife kindly offered to let the authorities have the use of her new bonnet-box. Of course," he explained, "it had to be got ready, but the space was ample, and the memorable contest duly took place therein."—John, M.P.

They were finishing breakfast in the saloon of the "Mauretania" on the first morning out from Liverpool, and the bishop, who had done justice to the meal, remarked upon the size of the mushrooms, which he had been discussing. His neighbour sniffed contemptuously. "I'd like you," he said, "to see the mushrooms we raise in Michigan. Why, sir, in the mushroom season, the umbrella manufacturers close down." "I don't quite follow you," said the bishop; "what is the connection between the facts?" The man from Michigan explained: "You can bet," he said, "in the States folk don't plank down their dollars for umbrellas when the Almighty sends 'em for the picking. I tell you, sir, them mushrooms are, I reckon, from three to five feet from edge to edge, and will shelter two men to oncet, if they are kind o' or'nary size men. Buy umbrellas? Not much."—Ballantrae.

Two Americans were disputing as to which had experienced the greatest cold in winter. Said one: "In the part of Iceland where I was last summer the ground is frozen so hard all the year round that when they want to bury a man they just sharpen his feet and drive him in with a pile hammer." The other replied: "Yes, I know that place. Didn't stay there long—found it not bracing enough for me. Went on to a small town further north. The hotel where I was staying caught fire. My room was on the top storey. No fire escapes or ladders in that primitive settlement. Staircases burnt away. Luckily, kept my presence of mind. Emptied my bath out of the window and slid down the icicle."—Cleveland.

London Visitor (to fruiterer, whose melons he was eyeing scornfully): "Do you call those apples?" Yankee (contemptuously): "Can't you tell a pea when you see one?"—The Old Jap.

Londoner: "If you want to see big hotels you should come to London." Yankee: "Nearly all the hotels here have rooms larger than any London hotel, and" (pointing to a line of sewer pipes about twenty yards long and a yard in diameter) "you see those?" "Yes." "Well, that's about the size of the kitchen poker."—The Old Jap.

An American gentleman, referring to the correspondence now occupying the columns of the "Times," said: "Why, that's nothing. Over there, not long ago, in one of our healthiest localities, where folk don't die overmuch, I saw an old man—must have been eighty at least—weeping by the side of the road, so I went up to him and said, 'What's wrong with you, old man, anyway? What yer crying about?' 'My father's been giving me a licking,' he says. 'Your father giving you a licking? Why, what have you been doing?' I said. 'Heaving rocks at grand father,' says he, and I left him weeping, but looking wonderful healthy."—David.

"Oh, I'll admit that was not a bad stroke of yours," said Cyprus P. Schwank to his partner at golf, "but it scarcely comes up to a fine one I made on the links in Scotland last summer. My ball lay right on the edge of a pretty wide stream, which it was necessary to cross. However, I was in grand form that afternoon, and made my stroke. Imagine, if you can, my surprise when I saw a large pike jump at my ball in its flight and swallow it; and yet, such had been the force of my stroke that both pike and ball were landed high and dry on the other side of the river."—Hypatia.

An American and Highlander were walking one day on the top of one of the Scotch mountains, when the Scotchman, wishing to impress his boastful "cousin," produced a famous echo to be heard in that place. When the echo returned clearly after nearly four minutes, the proud Scotchman, turning to the Yankee, exclaimed: "There, mon, ye canna' show anything like that in your country," to which the other replied: "I guess we can better that some, stranger. Why, in my shooting lodge in the Rockies, when I go to bed I just lean out of my window and call out, 'Time to get up; wake up,' and eight hours afterwards the echo comes back and wakes me."—Kalulu.

2. An American grower once declared he had grown a pumpkin so huge that one day, whilst strolling on its surface, he discovered a large hole, and, full of wrath, he at once got some ladders and descended with lights into the interior. After walking nearly half an hour he came upon a labourer. "Now, stranger, what are you doing in my pumpkin? I guess you'd best make a bee-line for home." "I guess I ain't going, boss, until I've found my waggon and four horses, which fell down this shanty a week ago, and for which I have been looking ever since."—Kalulu.

ENTRE NOUS.

A CONTEMPORARY states that the King and Queen will not reside again in town "until October." As a matter of fact, their Majesties will not be in town, except merely to pass through, until the beginning of February, when they intend to take up their residence at Buckingham Palace for the season. The greater part of the late autumn and winter will be spent by the Court at Windsor Castle, and their Majesties are likely to reside there from the middle of October (when they return from Scotland) until they come to town, except during the period which they will spend at Sandringham for the shooting.

---

The proposed formal investiture of the Prince of Wales at some town in the Principality has led to an angry controversy between Cardiff and Carnarvon, each place claiming to be selected as the scene of the ceremonial. I hear that the King will probably decide to arrange for a double investiture—at Carnarvon for North Wales and at Cardiff for South Wales. This will be the best solution of the difficulty, as the selection of the one town instead of the other would cause much grumbling and ill-feeling in the Principality.

---

The Prince of Wales and Prince Albert joined in a cricket match which was played last Tuesday on the ground in the Balmoral Castle "policies" between the Royal Household team and an eleven from the Aberdeen Caledonian Club. The King and Queen watched the game for some time, and the two Princes distinguished themselves as batsmen, the Prince of Wales also doing well as a bowler. The match was won by the Household team.

---

Queen Alexandra decided to postpone her journey from Sandringham to Scotland until this week. Princess Victoria joined her mother last week from Harrogate, accompanied by the Grand Duchess Marie Georgievna and her brother Prince Christopher of Greece, both of whom left Sandringham for the Continent on Saturday.

---

The Empress Marie returned to Russia last week, and she will spend the next month at her villa in the Imperial Park of Peterhof, after which she is going to Denmark, to meet Queen Alexandra and the King of the Hellenes. The Empress was conveyed in the Royal yacht Alexandra from Dover to Calais, whence she proceeded direct to St. Petersburg, travelling in the Imperial train. The Empress and Queen Alexandra will probably pay a visit to the Duke and Duchess of Cumberland at their country seat in Upper Austria late in the autumn when they leave Denmark, and it is very likely that they will be accompanied thither by the King of the Hellenes.

---

The announcement that the Empress of Russia will go to Kreuznach for the waters is incorrect. The Empress is to "make a cure" at Bad Nauheim, and she will reside at Friedberg, where her brother, the Grand Duke of Hesse, has a schloss, which he has placed at her disposal. This château has been redecorated and refurnished during the last month. The interior was very shabby, and the furniture was poor and scanty.

The Duke and Duchess of Connaught returned to England on Thursday from the Continent, and they have gone to Scotland on a round of visits, accompanied by Princess Patricia. They will be the guests of their Majesties at Balmoral, of Lord and Lady Wemyss at Gosforth House, and of Sir Reginald and Lady Cathcart at Cluny Castle.

---

Prince Arthur of Connaught has been staying for a few days at Lavington Manor, near Devizes, on a visit to Mr. Charles Awdry. His Royal Highness is going to Scotland, and he will spend a week at Balmoral as the guest of their Majesties while he is in the North.

---

Princess Christian has been staying for a month at Osborne Cottage on a visit to Princess Henry of Battenberg, and she will proceed from the Isle of Wight to Aix-les-Bains. H.R.H. will probably pay some family visits in Germany before she returns to England. Princess Victoria of Schleswig-Holstein has gone abroad to pay some visits in Germany and Sweden.

---

Princess Louise of Schleswig-Holstein, who has been paying a round of visits in Ireland, was last week staying at Newtown Anner, Tipperary, with the Duchess of St. Albans, who usually spends the summer there with members of her family. It was the early home of the Duchess, and now belongs to her. Situated near Clonmel, the neighbourhood is a sociable one, and not a social solitude, as so many an Irish country locality is.

---

Princess Frederica of Hanover, who spent the early part of the summer at Biarritz, is now taking the waters at Bad Nauheim, whence she will proceed on a visit to the Duke and Duchess of Cumberland at their country seat on the Traun See, in Upper Austria.

---

The Duchess of Albany is to leave Claremont Park on Saturday, September 3, on a round of family visits in Germany and Holland. H.R.H. goes first to Bentheim, in Hanover, on a visit to the Prince and Princess of Bentheim, and she will proceed thence to Reinhardsbrunn, the Duke of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha's hunting seat in the Thuringian Forest. Prince and Princess Alexander of Teck left Claremont on Friday afternoon on a visit to the Queen-Dowager of the Netherlands at the Château of Soestdijk, whence they are to proceed to Bentheim, where they will meet the Duchess of Albany.

---

The sudden and mysterious journey of King Alfonso to Ostend is said to have been caused by an urgent summons from his uncle, the Archduke Frederick, who had been charged to convey a confidential message of great importance from the Emperor Francis Joseph to his Majesty.

TO THE EMPEROR OF AUSTRIA.

(The Grand Old Man of European Sovereigns.)

Oh! on its hinge the creaking door
Hangs longest, so they say;
When first you donned the Crown of yore
You seemed indeed a creaking door,
Yet here you are to-day.

The outlook was extremely queer,
The skies o'ercast and grey;
Sagacious folks expressed the fear
That you would hardly last a year;
Yet here you are to-day.

Kings' thrones fell toppling down around
In disconcerting way;
Your patchwork Empire, weak, unsound,
Seething with civil strife was found;
Yet here you are to-day.

It shows what patient tact can do
Resentments to allay;
How rulers wise and straight and true
Can win their way all discords through;
That's why you're here to-day.

What's more, your throne more firm is set
Each further year you stay.
Let's hope your century you'll get,
And live to be more honoured yet
Than e'en you are to-day.

Sir Fleetwood Edwards succeeded Sir Henry Ponsonby as Keeper of the Privy Purse in 1895, and he held that important and highly confidential office until the death of Queen Victoria, when he was appointed Serjeant-at-Arms in the House of Lords, a post which he exchanged last May for that of Paymaster of the Household. He had a useful and successful career in the Royal Engineers between 1863 and 1878, when he was appointed (after the death of Sir Thomas Biddulph) Assistant Private Secretary and Assistant Keeper of the Privy Purse to Queen Victoria, the two superior offices being held by Sir Henry Ponsonby.

Sir Fleetwood Edwards was really indebted for this promotion to Sir Lintorn Simmons, to whom he had been aide-de-camp for three years when the general was Inspector-General of Fortifications. Sir Lintorn recommended his aide-de-camp to Lord Beaconsfield as likely to be a valuable acquisition to the famous Special Mission to Berlin for the Congress of 1878. He found great favour with Lord Beaconsfield, through whose influence he became a member of the Queen's personal Household. Sir Fleetwood Edwards was noted for his charm of manner, but he was a man of strong commonsense and most resolute character, and gifted both with fine tact and finesse and great discretion. He obtained (as he deserved) the full confidence of Queen Victoria, and the successive Ministers who were in office fully appreciated the value of his services. He was one of the executors of Queen Victoria's will, a post which brought him delicate and important duties of the most strictly confidential nature.

---

The other executors under the will of Queen Victoria were the Duke of Connaught and Princess Henry of Battenberg, who received assistance of the greatest value from Sir Fleetwood Edwards, as he was an excellent man of business, and he had become perfectly acquainted with all the details of her late Majesty's private property. The administration of Queen Victoria's will was really carried out by Sir Fleetwood Edwards.

The office of Paymaster of the Household, which is in the Lord Chamberlain's department, is one of the places in the personal gift of the Sovereign, so the King can appoint whom he pleases. The salary is £1,000 a year.

Lord and Lady Aberdeen returned last week to the Viceregal Lodge from a short holiday previous to dispensing hospitality for the Horse Show week in Dublin. Lord Aberdeen's heart is not with the horse as much as the Lord Lieutenant's is popularly expected to be. Nevertheless, he and Lady Aberdeen punctually perform the duties of viceroyalty during the Horse Show week, dispensing hospitality at the Viceregal Lodge and attending the show at Ball's Bridge on Wednesday and Thursday in state. Lady Aberdeen takes a special and active interest in the Art Industries Exhibition, now held in conjunction with the Horse Show in the Ball's Bridge premises.

The week in Dublin is a very full one in every way. The programme of festivities includes the Horse Show, open for four days, three days given to race meetings at Leopardstown and Phœnix Park, and polo matches of interest on several afternoons. After that, at the beginning of the next week, the first aviation meeting ever held in Ireland takes place at Leopardstown.

---

Lord Spencer was the doyen of both classes of the Knights of the Garter, having received his blue ribbon from Lord Palmerston in 1865. The Duke of Grafton, who dates from 1883, is now the doyen of the ordinary Knights. He was nominated by Mr. Gladstone. The doyen of the extra Knights is the Emperor of Austria, who was invested in 1867.

---

Lord Spencer will, no doubt, be succeeded as Lord Lieutenant of Northamptonshire by his brother and successor in the title. This is an office which is almost hereditary on the owners of Althorp.

---

The late Lord Spencer's mother was a descendant of the Viscounts Montagu, of Cowdray Park, the last of whom was drowned at the Falls of the Rhine in 1793, just after the magnificent house at Cowdray had been burnt to the ground. The title became extinct, and the large family estate passed to Mrs. Poyntz, the sister of Lord Montagu. Her two sons were drowned in a boating accident at Bognor in 1815 within sight of their mother, and their father was rescued with great difficulty. Mr. and Mrs. Poyntz were left with three daughters, who were co-heiresses of their mother's property, and they sold the Cowdray estate in 1843 to the sixth Earl of Egmont, in whose family it remained until last year, when it was purchased by Sir Weetman Pearson, who has taken his title from it on his elevation to the peerage. The daughters became respectively Marchioness of Exeter, Countess Spencer, and Baroness Clinton.

---

Lord Pearson, who died at Edinburgh last week, had been in failing health for several years past. He was the son of a well-known Edinburgh accountant, and had a very distinguished career at Oxford, after which he was called to the Bar, and practised at Edinburgh, where he soon obtained as much work as he could get through. After holding minor posts he became Sheriff of Perthshire in 1889, an office which is almost invariably a stepping-stone to the Bench. A year later he became Tory member for the University of Edinburgh and St. Andrews, and at the same time he was appointed Solicitor-General for Scotland. In another year he had become Lord Advocate in succession to the late Lord Robertson. He was not a successful judge, although he was a sound and able lawyer. He had the Eldonian craze for thoroughly investigating minute details of no importance, and he was over-anxious and worried himself about trifles. He was a most genial and agreeable man, and when in the vein his talk was remarkably bright and interesting. He was a staunch member of the Kirk, and for several years he held the office of Procurator of the Church of Scotland.

---

Lady Guendolen Ramsden died last Tuesday at Bulstrode Park, the fine place in Buckinghamshire which she inherited from her father, the twelfth Duke of Somerset. She was married in 1865 to Sir John Ramsden, who sat for many years in the House of Commons as a Liberal, and is said to have refused a peerage. Sir John succeeded to his valuable Yorkshire estates (including the land on which the town of Huddersfield is built) in 1839, when he was eight years old, and after he came of age he invested a considerable portion of the large savings of his minority in purchasing nearly the whole of the "country" of Cluny Macpherson in the Laggan district of Inverness-shire, including the famous deer forests of Ardverikie and Ben Alder. Lady Guendolen was known for many years as a most charming hostess, and she entertained most hospitably both in town and country. She was a niece of Mrs. Norton, her mother having been the "Queen of Beauty" at the Eglinton tournament, and she inherited the talent and the literary faculty of the Sheridan family. She read largely, and she wrote successfully both in prose and poetry, among her works being a couple of family biographies.

---

Early in 1866 the Times one morning electrified the country by announcing that Lord Russell had resigned, and that he would be succeeded as Prime Minister by the Duke of Somerset, who was then First Lord of the Admiralty. Lady Guendolen Ramsden was sitting with her mother, the Duchess of Somerset, when the Duke returned from a Cabinet Council. She asked, "What news have you?" The Duke replied (in joke) "Russell goes out, and I am to succeed him." Lady Guendolen went away with this startling piece of information and imparted it to every friend she met, so in the course of an hour or two it reached Mr. Delane, who accepted it as correct, and the Times article was the result.

---

Lady Edward Cavendish is staying for a few weeks at Compton Place, which has been lent to her by her son the Duke of Devonshire, and later on she will pay a visit to Lord Richard and Lady Moyra Cavendish at Holker Hall.

---

Lord and Lady Coventry will entertain a large family party next week at Croome Court for the wedding of Lady Dorothy Coventry and Sir Keith Fraser, which is to take place in the parish church of Croome D'Abitot on Tuesday, the 30th. Croome Court is a plain square building, with two fine fronts, and the interior is well arranged, the principal rooms being very handsome. It was built on the site of an ancient manor house belonging to William Jeffries, a member of the Household of Henry VIII., whose daughter and heiress married Sir Thomas Coventry in 1593. There are some interesting portraits in the house, including George III. and Queen Charlotte, presented by themselves after their visit to Croome in 1788. The grounds were laid out by "Capability" Brown, and the park is well wooded, and contains a temple from which there is a fine view.

Lord Plunket has returned from New Zealand to Ireland and joined Lady Plunket and his family at their residence, Old Connaught House, near Bray, where Lady Plunket has been living for several months. Two successive and successful Governors of New Zealand have been Irish, Lord Plunket's predecessor being Lord Ranfurly.

Lord and Lady Zetland left Marske Hall on Saturday for Letterewe, their shooting lodge on Loch Maree, where they will entertain a number of guests for deer stalking in the forests of Fisherfield and Letterewe. These celebrated deer forests, which comprise about 45,000 acres, were purchased some years ago from Mrs. Bankes by Lord Zetland, who had previously rented Kinrara, the old Speyside seat of the Dukes of Gordon, along with an extensive range of the Duke of Richmond's shootings in Inverness-shire. Lord and Lady Zetland will return to Aske Hall about the middle of October for the hunting season.

Mr. Richard Peter, of Launceston, who died last week in his 101st year, was one of the best known and most highly esteemed public men in Cornwall. He had a large and lucrative practice as a solicitor, but he was most widely known in the West as a strong Liberal of the most advanced type, and he was an eloquent and uncompromising advocate of Radical principles at a time when they were by no means fashionable. He pertinaciously opposed the overwhelming influence of the Dukes of Northumberland in the Launceston district, where their ownership of the Werrington Park estate and of considerable property in the town made the borough a safe Tory seat. Lord Chancellor Halsbury entered the House of Commons (after numerous defeats) as member for Launceston. After the Reform Bill of 1885 Launceston was merged in a district of Cornwall which has since returned Liberals, and Mr. Peter often remarked that if the battle had been uphill and very long it had ended in a complete triumph. He was an active social reformer, and at Launceston he carried out many important improvements. He was an excellent Latin scholar, and had a fine and well cultivated literary taste, and he was also distinguished as an antiquary. He wrote a very interesting History of Launceston, the contents of which discovered an immense amount of careful research.

The papers all over the country published on Friday a telegram addressed by Sir Gilbert Parker to the Press Association, giving information that his sister-in-law had been robbed at St. Moritzdorf "of £9,000 worth of jewels." I do not comprehend why the British Press should have been informed in this way of the robbery, and it is impossible to understand any one taking "£9,000 worth of jewels" to the Engadine. People who travel about in the tourist season with valuable jewels deserve no sympathy if they lose them.

THE TAXI-DRIVER.

I.—From His Own Point of View.

No catch this taxi-driving is,
As ignorant folks aver;
In fact, it is a rotten biz,
And so I tell you, sir.

What with the fiver that they bone
In fees at motor-school,
And finding petrol on your own,
And penny tips the rule,

And ladies who don't tip at all,
When they our cabs engage;
It's blamed hard work to earn a small
And barely living wage.

The ladies! Yes! Our bane are they.
Some name that sex the fair.
Well, when they're called upon to pay,
I only wish they were!

Pooh! Ladies fair—as poets sing?
In looks, perhaps. Who cares?
In cabs they're quite a different thing—
They're merely lady-fares.

In continuation of the interesting discussion on "Seats for Women" that has been going on in the Correspondence columns of Truth I have had a letter from a lady who thinks that seats are no use by comparison with votes, and uses the following argument:—

> The granting of the suffrage to women would doubtless lead to the question being raised of equal conditions of payment. At present women are unable to insist upon such. If the work done is the same, payment should be equal, whether the work be performed by a man or a woman.

Why on earth should the granting of the suffrage raise a question respecting the remuneration of female labour? Are male M.P.s going to pass laws regulating the rate of women's wages? If not, do these good ladies seriously suppose that the possession of a vote will be considered by employers to confer a right to higher wages? Are men paid on a higher scale when they have votes than when they have none? Have the agricultural labourer's wages risen since he was enfranchised? Are increases of pay among men brought about by voting power? Of all the fantastic absurdities ever offered in the shape of argument, this idea that the enfranchisement of women will increase their earning power is the most fantastically absurd.

"At present," says my esteemed correspondent, "women are unable to insist upon such"—meaning thereby that they shall be paid at the same rate as men. Why are they unable to insist upon it? They have all the rights and powers of men. Can they not combine and strike? If not, it is their own fault. So far as law is concerned they have the same power as men, and all the members of the House of Commons together cannot improve their position in that respect. Men have no means of getting increased pay except by combining and striking.

It does not seem to have occurred to ladies who take this singular line of argument that a great many of their sex are paid as highly as men already. There are several ladies on the staff of Truth. They are paid at the same rate as their male colleagues. It has never occurred to me that they should be paid less because they have no votes, and it certainly would not occur to me that they should be paid more if they had. I do not suppose that journalism is very different in this respect from other fields of employment. No doubt women are often paid lower rates than men who do the same work. For this I can see two reasons, and two only: (1) That female labour is not worth as much as male in these particular lines; (2) that women workers are more submissive, less disposed to stand up for themselves, less capable of organising and fighting their own battles—less fit, in short, to hold their own in the rough and tumble of life. In both cases the root of the trouble is simply that they are women, not men, and this is a misfortune which no Act of Parliament can alter.

Apropos of the foregoing remarks, here is a good example of the "sweating system" which at present flourishes in the educational world—though not exclusively at the expense of women. A mistress is just now wanted in a ladies' school in the Midlands. The following are the duties as explained to an applicant for the berth: To take the kindergarten and transition forms (twenty to twenty-five pupils) and assist with one other; to take the needlework instruction throughout the school; to take a class for water-colour painting; to walk out with the young ladies; and to take an interest in hockey and tennis. And the pay? "£15 and plain laundry"—less than the wages of a competent housemaid. It may be as well to note that in this case both employer and employed are women. Possibly the employer wants a vote, but not, I take it, with any idea that the raising of the salaries of governesses will follow.

THE TAXI-DRIVER.

II.—From a Lady-Fare's Point of View.

Miss Letitia Skinflint loquitur:—

The taxi man let some extol.
He is a brute, I say.
I hail him with my parasol;
He looks the other way.

Or if his eye to catch I chance,
He pulls up sure enough;
But very surly is his glance,
His manner sour and gruff.

And when to pay his fare I come—
As pay I always do—
And hand him the full legal sum
That he's entitled to,

D'ye think he's grateful? Not a bit!
He holds it in his palm,
And scornfully surveying it,
Inquires, "What's this, then, marm?"

Ugh! grasping thing! The bun he takes
For avarice and cheek.
And yet I'm told he often makes
A pound and more a week!

The Warden and Fellows of New College, Oxford, have presented the Rev. S. J. Buchanan, Vicar of Berwick Bassett with Winterbourn Monkton, to the living of Marshfield, near Chippenham, which is of the net value of about £400 a year, with house, and vacant by the death of Canon Trotman. The benefice vacated by the preferment of Mr. Buchanan is of the net value of about £300 a year, with house, and in the gift of the Bishop of Salisbury. The new Vicar of Marshfield is a son of Archdeacon Buchanan, canon-residentiary of Salisbury Cathedral.

The Bishop of Oxford has signified his approval of the appointment of the Rev. D. C. Simpson, Reader in Hebrew and Theology at St. Edmund Hall, to fill the same office at Manchester New College, when he succeeds the Rev. W. E. Addis, vicar of All Saints', Knightsbridge. Mr. Simpson took high honours in theology and Oriental languages, and he is regarded in Oxford as one of the ablest and most learned Old Testament scholars among the younger members of the University.

Lord Richard Cavendish has presented the Rev. G. S. Smith, vicar of Walney Island, Barrow-in-Furness, to the living of Cartmel, vacant by the preferment of the late incumbent. There is a magnificent old church at Cartmel, with much fine decoration and oak-work, and interesting monuments. The vestry contains a valuable library, which was bequeathed to the church by Thomas Preston, of Holker Hall, who died in 1692.

---

The Bishop Suffragan of Hull has instituted the Rev. Charles H. B. Trollope, curate of Ewell, Surrey, to the rectory of Escrick, near York, on the presentation of Lord Wenlock. This living is of the net value of about £450 a year, with an excellent house. There is a very handsome church at Escrick, which was built in 1854 by the Rev. Stephen Lawley (uncle of the present Lord Wenlock), who was rector of the parish for over twenty years. The old church stood in the grounds of Escrick Park.

The death of Dean Wickham is very widely and most sincerely regretted, and to his friends the loss is irreparable. He had a highly distinguished career at Oxford, where he soon became known as a most accomplished and accurate scholar. As a tutor at New College he was very successful, and he was much liked by all who really knew him. He took a prominent part in university work, and he was active as an academic reformer. In 1873 he became headmaster of Wellington College, replacing Dr. Benson, who had been appointed by Bishop Wordsworth to a stall in Lincoln Cathedral. He ruled the school with conspicuous ability and efficiency, and it made great progress under him, but he was never a popular headmaster in the ordinary sense of the term, though he exercised in a quiet way a powerful and most excellent influence over both masters and boys. In 1894 Dr. Wickham replaced Dean Butler at Lincoln on the nomination of his father-in-law, Mr. Gladstone, and the appointment met with universal approval. For several years his promotion to a bishopric had been generally expected, but he was much more suitably placed in a deanery.

Dr. Wickham will be a great loss to Convocation. He was a Churchman of the Broad-High school, with scholarly and academic associations, and a taste for quiet and retirement. He turned out an admirable Dean, and he soon became a great favourite among both clergy and laity. His strong common sense and large experience of practical business, his wide mind, and his general courtesy and fine tact gave him a powerful influence. He took an active part in educational affairs at Lincoln, and he was quietly busy as a social reformer. He was a most attractive preacher, and his sermons were always interesting and impressive. In politics he was all his life a strong Liberal.

Yet another of the Motherwell Protestant leaders has achieved the martyrdom of Barlinnie Prison. This one rejoices in the name of Pastor Boal. He was charged at Hamilton Sheriff Court with a breach of the peace on five occasions by using language calculated to create disorder. The Sheriff imposed a fine of £10 with the alternative of sixty days' imprisonment, and he chose the gaol, where a rival leader, the Kilwinning Martyr, has already preceded him, owing to his having declined to find security to be of good behaviour. Prison is a good pulling advertisement for donations and subscriptions, as the Suffragettes long ago demonstrated.

I am asked by Lord Donoughmore to call the attention of readers of TRUTH to the work and needs of the Benevolent Society of St. Patrick, of which he is the president. This society is specially engaged in relieving the needs of the Irish poor in London, who are, unfortunately, numerous, not only by distributions of food, boots, clothing, but by medical assistance and helping boys and girls under twenty to obtain employment. In work of this kind the society spent last year £225 in excess of its income, which sufficiently indicates its need of increased support. There are so many bogus agencies defrauding the charitable public with programmes of "free meals" and other relief, especially for necessitous children, that I am glad to be able to point to a society to which money for such purposes can be entrusted with confidence. The office of the Benevolent Society of St. Patrick is at 61, Stamford Street, S.E.

In regard to a recent reference made by my contributor "Madge" to the Girls' Friendly Society, I have received one or two letters of protest from people interested in that organisation. I am bound to say that I have always regarded it as useful and discreetly managed, and I should hope that the incident mentioned in TRUTH was quite exceptional. Here are some observations on the subject from "A Branch Secretary":—

I feel sure that "Madge" does not really know much about the Girls' Friendly Society and all the good it does, or she would not have said that "the G.F.S. is very useful indeed in cases where servants are badly treated, half-starved, or otherwise ill-used"—as if it was no use for any purpose but this. The use, I take it, of the G.F.S. is largely to give girls higher ideals, and a feeling that what they do matters to some one besides themselves. It is not only servants who belong to the G.F.S., but girls in every rank of life.

Of course, if the Associate of "Marion's" servant really wrote and invited a girl to meet her at one o'clock it was most tactless and inconsiderate. But it would surely have been easy for "Marion" to have said that this was an inconvenient hour, and then the "Friend" (as "Madge" calls her) would probably have asked her at another time. One of the earliest lessons one is taught as an Associate is that if any members are in service one must study the convenience of their mistresses. No doubt there are tactless Associates, but I think that, as a rule, the mistress is properly considered, and that "Marion's" case is an unfortunate and exceptional one.

The G.F.S. does so much good that it seems a pity that it should be written of in a slighting way, and in a manner quite likely to do it harm. Personally, I like a servant who belongs to the G.F.S. She takes a more intelligent interest in things, as a rule, and if she is a good member she tries to keep the rules of the society, and is kind and obliging.

I have also received the following amounts for Lady St. Helier's Children's Holiday Fund:—H. O., £1; Eileen, Bowes, Denise, Lilah, and Dermot, £25.

Colonel William Lambton has been promoted to the command of the Grenadier Guards, in the place of Colonel Maxse, who has been appointed to the First Infantry Brigade at Aldershot. The colonels in command of the regiments of Foot Guards take in turn the duties of Field Officer in Brigade Waiting to the King.

Major-General Cowans, Commander of the Presidency Brigade at Fort William, Calcutta, is now in England on leave, and he will not return to India. He has been selected to succeed Lieutenant-General Sir W. H. Mackinnon as Director-General of the Territorial Forces. It is understood that this appointment has been made by the advice of Lord Kitchener.

The death of Lieutenant-General F. G. Slade at the comparatively early age of fifty-nine removes another link with the Wolseley small wars of the seventies and early eighties. Until he was struck down by illness three years ago "Keggie" Slade was one of the most popular men in the Army. Cheery and light-hearted in his regimental days, he was the leading spirit of the "fun and frolic" of the famous Thursday guest nights in the palmy days of the Woolwich mess, which is now so scientifically dull. "Keggie" never qualified for a seat on the Army Council, being neither scribe nor Jesuit. An out-of-door soldier, he sat restlessly in an office arm-chair. But no better regimental or staff officer of the common-sense, man-of-the-world type ever served his country. He was a favourite with chiefs of such differing disposition as Lord Wolseley, Sir Evelyn Wood, and the Duke of Connaught, to whose recommendation, when Slade was Inspector-General of Artillery, he owed his early promotion, which no one grudged him, to the rank of lieutenant-general.

---

Why did artillerymen emasculate their strength by dividing themselves up into expert branches? The all-round gunner officer of the Slade type is dying out, and is being replaced by the half-trained artillery specialist, who is only useful in his own narrow circle, and lacks the knowledge, experience, and general professional grasp which made the great artillery commanders of the Peninsular War and of the Crimean and Indian Mutiny Campaigns.

With reference to recent remarks in TRUTH regarding jobbery in the Army Medical Service, a correspondent points out that injury was done to Surgeon-General O. E. P. Lloyd, V.C., C.B., as well as to Surgeon-General J. G. MacNeece by the retention in the Service of Surgeon-General Gubbins, who ought to have retired in July, 1909, under Article 549 of the Royal Warrant, Surgeon-General Lloyd having in consequence to wait till last November for his promotion, which was his by right in the previous July. The injury done to these two surgeon-generals is, however, trifling when compared with the injustice inflicted on Colonel Robinson by Colonel Babtie's promotion over his head, since he will now have to retire for age next March instead of obtaining the promotion due to him last April.

When there was a Commander-in-Chief he was responsible to the Secretary of State that in the case of promotion and appointments there was no departure from the letter and spirit of the Sovereign's Warrants. Now no one is responsible. Mr. Haldane gives the Army Council a free hand in these matters, lest critics should say that military appointments are due to political favour. As, however, the Army Council cannot be trusted to use their powers of patronage impartially, the only remedy in the absence of a Commander-in-Chief is for the Secretary of State to act as the revising as well as approving authority in the case of all superior appointments and promotions.

Complaints reach me from cavalry officers serving in India of their treatment in the matter of chargers. At home, under the new regulations, if he so wishes, a cavalry officer may be supplied at State expense with two horses, which he may only use for military purposes; but if he wants to use them for general purposes, including hunting and regimental racing, he can do so on payment of £10 a year for the hire of each horse. He is also allowed to buy the horses right out from the State if he wishes, and have them stabled and foraged at public expense. What is the case in India? No horse is supplied at State expense, but an officer may hire one from the Government for £10 a year on condition that he only uses it for military purposes. If he wants, as he always does, a second horse for his work he must buy it out of his private purse. Since there is little demand for riding horses, apart from polo ponies, except as chargers in any Indian station, cavalry officers stand to lose heavily when they come to sell.

---

In such a matter it seems to me that officers should be uniformly treated, whether serving in England, India, or elsewhere, horses required for military purposes being in all cases provided by Government. If officers want to use Government horses for other than Government purposes, it is only right they should pay a contribution as hire, but this should not be exacted, as the Government of India exacts it, when the horses are only allowed to be used on parade.

---

Why does not the Army Council see to these matters instead of leaving officers to ventilate their grievances in TRUTH? The facts, as stated above, are perfectly well known to the Quartermaster-General, the Army Councillor concerned, and he should press them on the notice of the Commander-in-Chief in India with a view to an alteration in the regulations. Failing success in this way, the Quartermaster-General has only to ask Mr. Haldane to see Lord Morley, who would send out the necessary "hukum" to the Government of India. The fault is with the Army Council, who lend British officers to India without insisting on their being fairly treated. It is this kind of thing which is causing unrest in the Army, and a consequent shortage of candidates for commissions.

---

From a case that has just come under my notice it appears that if a youth joins a Territorial battalion from a cadet corps he is ineligible under the regulations for a recruits' shooting competition, but he is not exempted from his recruit's drill. Thus a cadet who, notwithstanding that he joins with a certificate of efficiency, has to do forty drills like any other recruit, finds himself barred from a recruit's prize on the ground that he is not a recruit. Mr. Haldane, as a man of logical mind, will be the first to see the indefensibility of this state of things, and I rather think he will find that forcing an efficient cadet to do a recruit's course of drill is contrary to declarations that he has himself made on this point.

Here is a good illustration of the way men manage to escape foreign service under the present order of things. I understand that there is a sergeant of the R.G.A. doing duty at the Ordnance College, Woolwich, who has fourteen years' service, during which he has never been abroad. Three other N.C.O.s at Woolwich, each with over nine years' service, have had the same pleasant experience. Why is not a definite rule with regard to foreign service in the artillery laid down and strictly enforced?

An officer commanding a battery R.F.A. forwards me the following document sent to him by J. N. Masters, Limited, of Rye, with a request that he will cause it to be handed to a gunner in the battery:—

Gunner ——,

SIR,—As you have not sent, we intend acting as intimated. You are a Dishonourable Man, and Mr. Portans is ashamed of you. We shall write your C.O. on the matter, pp. J. N. MASTERS, LIMITED.

The letter written to the C.O. is a printed document with the name of the delinquent gunner typed in. This shows it to be a form kept in stock for use in such cases, and it is quite clear, both from this fact and from the number of similar letters addressed to officers by firms like Masters, that such firms find it possible to obtain the assistance of officers in collecting their debts.

This state of things has been the subject of repeated notice in TRUTH for years past, and it prevails in the Navy as well as in the Army. The War Office and the Admiralty are to blame for not issuing definite instructions to officers on the subject. The ground for doing so is perfectly sound. The rank and file of the Army and Navy would not under ordinary circumstances be able to get credit from tradesmen. They have no property that affords security for payment; their pay does not suffice for much more than their current requirements; they are frequently on the move and outside the reach of the civil courts. Nobody would dream of supplying them with goods on credit if it were not for the chance of getting them into trouble with their superiors when they make default in the payment of their debts.

---

This is the "security" that advertising credit firms like Masters rely on. Why should they have it? It is bad for the men that they should be tempted to incur debts which they have no means to pay. It is an abuse of the authority given to officers of the Army and Navy that it should be used for the purpose of encouraging tradesmen to tempt the men into debt. Neither the War Office nor the Admiralty would move a finger to assist a tradesman to recover debts from an officer, and in this they are quite right.

---

It used even to be the rule in those Departments—and so far as I know it is still—to refuse a creditor information as to an officer's address when he has left the service. This is rather overstraining the principle, for tradesmen may legitimately give credit to officers, who generally have private means in addition to their pay, and when they occupy houses credit is frequently given in the ordinary course of business. But if neither the War Office nor the Admiralty would use its authority to make an officer pay his creditors—unless his insolvent condition has reached the stage at which it becomes a scandal—they assuredly ought to stop these same officers from using their authority in the interest of harpies who, when they make bad debts, thoroughly deserve to lose their money. If Messrs. Haldane and McKenna would look into this matter I am sure they would see that the best interests of the men require firms like Masters to be discouraged by all possible means.

Rear-Admiral Sir Douglas A. Gamble, K.C.V.O., has been appointed to undergo a signal course, followed by a war course. This will be his first return to active association with his own Navy since he quitted Constantinople after reorganising the Ottoman Fleet. This system of instructional courses for flag officers is a very sound one, affording opportunity, as it does, to break away from the "out-of-touch" rustication of half-pay.

Engineer Rear-Admiral R. B. Priston, who was lately serving on the staff of the Commander-in-Chief at Chatham, has just retired after forty years' service upon a pension of £575 per annum. As a consequence Engineer-Captain J. H. Adams will get his step, relinquishing his present billet in the Portsmouth subdivision of the Home Fleet and a good service pension of £150 a year.

Rear-Admiral Carden, who succeeds Rear-Admiral Sir Colin Keppel as Rear-Admiral in the Atlantic Fleet, will hoist his flag at Chatham on board the battleship London on Saturday next. Sir Colin Keppel is to strike his flag on Friday.

Rear-Admiral Sir Henry Jackson is to vacate the command of the Sixth Cruiser Squadron, which forms part of the Mediterranean Fleet, in October, and he will probably be succeeded by Rear-Admiral Sir George Warrender, who not long ago vacated the command of the East Indies Squadron. The appointment is generally for two years.

---

The Admiralty and outports writers—who form the clerical staff of the dockyard and naval establishments—have been buoyed with hope long deferred by Dr. Macnamara. If the Financial Secretary were able to do all he promises, he would be the most popular official who ever set foot in the Admiralty. But, unfortunately, the Treasury comes between the wind and his amiability. The net result of a prolonged period of waiting on the part of the writers—whose claims were investigated and acquiesced in by the Macnamara Committee fifteen months ago—is an official statement that the present "London allowance" of £40 to dockyard writers and draughtsmen "lent" to Whitehall is to be reduced to £25. What is sometimes called "an Irishman's rise!"

---

It really seems necessary that the naval authorities should exercise a little more judgment in arranging and carrying out target practice. Last week the regatta was held at Plymouth, and a series of target practices in the local waters had been arranged, in complete disregard of this annual fête. The result was that shells were frequently bursting amongst the racers, and one yacht had her mainsail ripped by a projectile—close enough in all conscience. Of course, the Navy must practise shooting, but surely a little more discrimination as to time and place would be possible.

---

The Colonel-Commandant, Plymouth Division, Royal Marines, seems to have eccentric ideas in regard to the administration of justice and the maintenance of discipline. A corporal, with eight years' service and two good-conduct stripes, whilst returning to barracks one night recently was stopped by the military police patrol and informed that he was drunk and would be arrested. On arrival at the main gate of the barracks the sergeant on duty interviewed the patrol and their prisoner and dissented from the suggestion that the latter was drunk. The sergeant of the guard-room took the same view, and stated that, although the regulations obliged him to receive the prisoner, he declined to enter him as drunk upon the charge-sheet. Two corporals who were in the guard-room on duty confirmed the sergeant's opinion. I may add that the patrol consisted of one N.C.O., a lance-corporal of Marines doing duty as a general military policeman, and a private soldier.

---

After three days under close arrest the corporal was brought before Colonel Money, and all the circumstances detailed. The N.C.O. of the R.M.P. and the private soldier deposed that the corporal was drunk on the occasion in question. Two sergeants and three corporals denied this, including the corporal of Marines who was on duty with the picket when the prisoner was arrested. In this state of the evidence the colonel deprived the corporal of his two good-conduct stripes, and fined him 5s. Not content with this, he accused the R.M.P. corporal of giving false evidence, and returned him to duty, which involved the loss of his stripe and 3d. per day. The sergeant on the main gate and the sergeant and two corporals of the guard were severely cautioned likewise for giving false evidence. The action of the commandant is so extraordinary that one must assume that he saw some reason to suppose that five non-commissioned officers conspired to give false evidence in order to get the prisoner off, but what this reason could have been when there were only two witnesses on the other side it is impossible to conceive, and no such decision ought to be come to except after an exhaustive trial in due form, and the examination and cross-examination of the witnesses by expert lawyers. Incidentally, it would seem that the whole proceedings were irregular, for I understand that on a charge of drunkenness an N.C.O. ought to be tried by court-martial, and not convicted summarily.

---

The foregoing incident, which I gather is not without parallel in Stonehouse Barracks, makes it easy to understand the desire of the Marines not to be under the jurisdiction of the Military Police at all, but under that of the Naval Police, who equally picket the ports where they are stationed. Constant friction, resulting in petty acts of injustice, is said to exist. A curious anomaly is that the R.M.P. are not permitted to exercise any authority over the Blue Marines, but may apparently do as they please with the infantry. Why should this be?

THOS. GOODE & CO.—Exhibition of old and modern WEDGWOOD, including many specimens never previously exhibited. South Audley Street, London.

The Navy League is promoting a National Conference on Sea Training, to open on October 21, between representatives of the Admiralty, various county councils, and the principal shipping companies. I hope this does not portend a propaganda for compulsory training for naval service in competition with the programme of the National Service League. If it only means that consideration is to be given to improving and extending the training of our population for a seafaring life, nothing could be more useful, and I would invoke every blessing upon the Navy League's little effort.

It is a most surprising thing that, amid all the talk there has been of late years about finding work for the unemployed and diverting young lads from casual labour and "blind alley" occupations into settled employment, nothing has been heard of the great opening for British labour in the manning of British ships. Not many months ago I reproduced some of the official statistics bearing on this point. In 1908—the last year for which I can find the figures at the moment—there were 275,721 persons employed in British ships (other than vessels engaged in inland navigation). Of these 196,834 were British, and 78,889 were Lascars and foreigners. The number of foreigners pure and simple was 34,735. The relative proportion of the native and foreign elements has not materially altered in the last twenty years, though during that time the total number of hands employed has grown by about 40,000. Since 1903 the British hands have increased considerably, but prior to that their number was actually decreasing.

---

There is no parallel to this state of things in any other industry, and it is a strange phenomenon that it should occur in the most distinctively British of them all, and the one in which our superiority over all other nations is most conspicuous. I suppose that the principal cause at work is the desire for economy and the freedom of the shipping trade from the influence of the trade unions, which prevents other employers from importing cheap labour from abroad. But, even so, one would think that a great deal of the surplus labour of our towns would find its way to sea when employment is slack, if some practical step were taken to bring the supply into touch with the demand. The seafaring life is a rough one, but it is not without its advantages and its attractions—especially for young men—and at the worst it is better than starvation and the casual ward or tramping the streets in search of a job. And there is certainly no reason why youngsters who have got on to the wrong track in one direction or another at their first start in life should not be systematically drafted off to this wholesome and useful occupation.

EXPOSTULATION AND REPLY.

(After Wordsworth.)

["It is time for somebody to rise and protest vigorously against the nonsensical idea that early rising is a good thing."—Daily Paper.]

"Why, William, on your bed of down,
Thus for the length of half a day,
Why, William, lie you thus alone,
And snore your time away?

"The bacon's cooked, the coffee seethed,
The eggs to harden are inclined!
Up! up! quite long enough you've breathed
Like one of porcine kind.

"You turn again your ponderous girth,
As if the night were still before you,
As if the day were little worth
And breakfasting would bore you."

One morning thus, when half awake,
When sleep was sweet—I well know why—
To me my good wife Martha spake,
And thus I made reply—

"My dear, why come and worry me?
Let me alone to slumber still;
I'm comfortable as can be,
To rise I have no will.

"The fact is that I lately read
That early rising is absurd;
So leave me in my little bed,
Nor say another word.

"To breakfast I do not incline,
The thought of eggs does not impress,
Whilst I can feed this mind of mine
In a wise passiveness.

"Then ask not wherefore, here, alone,
Still dreaming as I may,
I lie upon my bed of down
And snore my time away."

At a recent meeting of the Stretford District Council the Libraries Committee submitted a proposal that the chairman and the librarian should go to London to purchase books for the library. The council objected to the proposal because of the expense, but ultimately voted £8 for the chairman to go alone. I should have thought that if it was essential for any one to go to London to buy books the librarian would have been the proper person, and not a gentleman whose judgment on cheese and bacon would be considered much more authoritative than on literature. But why should it be necessary to visit London at all? If the librarian and committee between them cannot select books from a catalogue, surely there are booksellers in Manchester capable of supplying all that Stretford needs!

The Chorlton Guardians last week brought an action in the Manchester County Court to recover £13 odd as the cost of out-relief supplied within the past twelve months to a widow, on the ground that she had recently come into a legacy. Judge Parry gave judgment for the defendant on the technical point that the guardians had not in the pleadings alleged that she had the means to pay. But his Honour also stoutly denied that a pauper was under any liability at common law for expenses incurred in his relief, and in this most people will agree with him, for it would be a monstrous thing if every poor person who had been compelled to go to the parochial authorities for relief should be liable to be sued by the guardians so soon as he is just getting on his legs again.

Two cases heard before the Poole (Branksome division) magistrates last week supply a fine instance of magisterial aberration. A woman charged with being drunk and incapable was sentenced to a month's hard labour, while a man charged with cruelty to a horse was fined 30s. and costs. At the worst the woman could only have been said to be her own enemy. The man had hired a horse and trap and driven thirty miles. On his return the animal's back was so bruised and wealed that it was impossible to count the injuries, while in thirteen places it was bleeding from cuts, and the whip he had taken was split and almost broken to pieces. Magistrates with such muddled ideas about justice really ought not to be allowed to sit on the bench.

A very similar case, in which a still more ridiculously inadequate penalty was imposed, was decided by the Wimbledon Solons last week. In this instance a horse had been handed over to a man to take to a field to be rested. On the way he got a lift on a trap from another man, and as the animal could not keep pace with the trap, both men flogged it unmercifully for a long distance. A penalty of half-a-crown each was deemed by the Wimbledon wiseacres an adequate penalty for this piece of brutality.

One of the penalties of the holiday season is the moneylender's circular, and one of the busiest of the touting brigade is George Egerton, of 41, Great Russell Street, London, W.C. Egerton remarks in his circular that gentlemen holding important positions in the commercial world and also those interested in agriculture ofttimes experience considerable monetary loss and also loss of prestige owing to the fact that they are not at a moment's notice in a position to avail themselves of ready cash to complete a purchase. I am afraid that their prestige is much more likely to suffer if it becomes known that they apply to a moneylender to finance them. George Egerton, I learn from the register at Somerset House, is a dual personality, the two gentlemen who have calmly annexed the pseudonym of the well-known novelist being George Herbert Eldridge, of 6, Rosemont Mansions, Lithos Road, South Hampstead, and Percy Edward Martin, of 25, Effra Road, Brixton.

A philanthropist very busy just now in offering cash advances of from £50 to £20,000 without security is Mr. Hyman Lewis, of 15, Hanover Street, London, W., who registers his private address as the Ivanhoe Hotel, Great Russell Street, W. These are, however, by no means the only addresses at which he transacts business registered at Somerset House. There are hundreds of them, the last list registered on March 3 last numbering no less than twenty in all parts of the country. This looks as if Mr. Lewis had hit on an ingenious method of evading the clause of the Moneylenders Act which makes the loan null and void unless it is completed at the lender's registered address. Apparently he meets the difficulty by registering as his place of business any place where the transaction is completed, and colour is lent to this view by a letter attached to the file from a hotel-keeper stating that he is perfectly willing to allow Mr. Lewis to make use of his premises for the purpose of lending money. I do not think that if I applied to this worthy for a loan and he brought me the money that I should care to have the fact put on record at Somerset House.

In calculating last week the percentage charged by Bennett and Co., the poor man's moneylenders, of Benhill Road, Camberwell, I am afraid that I did the firm a little less than justice. A correspondent points out that instead of being below the normal 60 per cent., the rate of interest on a loan of £1 in which 4s. interest is deducted in advance and the loan repaid by instalments of 1s. a week really works out at 150 per cent. This is calculated to make the Shylocks of the West End turn green with envy.

An advertisement appeared recently in the Times purporting to be from the "Australian Cadet Association," offering to place youths on farms in Australia and New Zealand. A youth who replied to the advertisement received a prospectus, an application form, and a list of vacancies. A commission of £7 if a non-salary paying farm was selected, while £10—£2 of which was to be payable on application—was asked for placing a youth on a farm where he would receive a salary. The name of the manager of the Association was given as Charles Wilson, and its address as 70, Tavistock Road, Westbourne Park, London, W. As, on inquiring at the offices of the agents-general, I found that nothing was known of the Association, I sent to 70, Tavistock Road to obtain further particulars from Mr. Wilson. My representative found the address to be that of a newspaper shop where a party giving that name calls for letters. He seems also to call for the attention of the police.

With a view to raise funds to provide themselves with a football and cricket ground the committee of the Luton Corporation Tramway Employees' Recreation Club has sent out an appeal to the secretaries of similar organisations to dispose of tickets in a "grand prize draw." The tickets are modestly priced at 2d. each, but as the total monetary value of the prizes offered is under £12 there is evidently margin for a very considerable profit if even a small percentage of the tramway employees of the country go in for this little gamble. Apparently the ingenuous promoters of the scheme imagine that they have circumvented the Lotteries Act by printing on the ticket after the name of the club the words: "Received the sum of twopence towards the funds of the above," followed by "the following list of prizes may be purchased for a further sum of twopence by subscribers holding numbered receipts." In their own interests I would recommend the committee to take legal advice before proceeding any further with their scheme. They may think that the law is "a hass," but it is not such an ass as to be deceived by such a transparent device as this.

It is difficult to follow the strenuous activities of Mr. W. Taverner, of Old-age Pension Trust notoriety. Last week I found him at work in Devonshire. Immediately on top of this comes a newspaper report of a lecture at Skebrae, which, if I mistake not, is in the Orkneys. Reference has already been made in Truth to the Taverner campaign in that distant corner of the kingdom, and it is to be feared that he is recruiting subscribers on a large scale in many districts where the inhabitants are not as wide awake as they are in the big towns. I am glad to see that the Orcadian, in reporting a Taverner meeting, adds a useful word of warning in regard to the pension scheme. It is a pity that all provincial journals do not show an equal sense of responsibility, for such reports are practically advertisements.

It is always an unpleasant task to criticise a contemporary, but I must say that a grievance which a London firm have against the Sheffield Daily Telegraph affords strong ground for unfavourable remark. A few months ago Messrs. R. A. Skelton and Co., of Moorfields, were entrusted by the architect with the design and construction of the steel work for the gallery of a cinematograph theatre at Sheffield. The rest of the steelwork, offering no technical difficulties, was designed by the architect and ordered by the builders, and the contract was eventually obtained, in competition, by a Manchester firm. A week or so before the building was to be opened the advertisement manager of the Sheffield Telegraph wrote to Messrs. Skelton and Company, "as a firm having taken part in the erection," soliciting an order for a general advertisement of their business, to appear on the same page as the account which would be given of the opening of the theatre. This invitation was declined.

In due course the paper published an illustrated description of the theatre, with complimentary notices of various firms engaged in its erection, with the solitary exception of Messrs. Skelton and Co. Under the heading of "Structural Steel Work" the article simply said: "Messrs. Robinson and Kershaw, of Manchester, supplied and erected the constructural steel used in the Palace," adding further particulars respecting this firm. The firm's advertisement, together with those of the other firms incidentally mentioned, was displayed in parallel columns with the article. Messrs. Skelton wrote and protested very forcibly against the omission of their name, seeing that they had both designed and supplied the most expensive and the most important part of the steel work. It might have been expected that the managers of the paper would then have done their best to put themselves right by apologising for the omission of Messrs. Skelton and Co.'s name, and correcting their statement in their next issue. The reply which they made, however, was as follows:—

> It is to be regretted that you did not avail yourselves of the opportunity, in reply to our inquiry, of providing any information which, in your judgment, was necessary for the completion of the article referred to. Our only desire was to have it complete, and the information contained in it was the information placed at our disposal.

This rather pitiful prevarication only makes the matter look worse. The material information that Messrs. Skelton and Co. had supplied a part of the steel work was obviously in the possession of the paper when the firm were invited to advertise. If the only desire was to have the article complete, fuller information as to the amount of work supplied by this firm could easily have been obtained in Sheffield. What was done, however, was to suppress the information that the paper had, and thereby not only make the article incomplete but misrepresent the facts. Why? Obviously, because this firm had declined to advertise. This looks rather ugly. If the advertisement department had said, "Unless you order an advertisement we shall not let the public know that you had anything to do with the work, and we shall lead them to suppose that another firm (provided we get their advertisement) did the work which you really did," there would be only one name for such an intimation. Yet this seems to have been the actual state of the case, and whether it was declared openly beforehand or left to be discovered afterwards from the result does not very materially affect the merits of the proceeding. That tradesmen who are possible advertisers should be treated in this way by important newspapers is very unfair to them, unfair also to newspaper readers, and not calculated to raise the credit of newspapers generally.

BIRD SONG OF 1910.

(Translated from the Declaration of Airwarmageddon, published in the August number of The Ornithoglossidion.)

Lo! how the groundlings are taken with lust of the Lordship of Ether!
All the wide welkin is shaken,
and echoes the wing-clang beneath her.
Choirs of the air are affrighted, song of the skies is a thing dumb,
Byrde on his crag is alighted and yields his ethereal kingdom.
This is the air's Armageddon, onset of men that unfurl wings,
Riding (by space-hunger led on) turbines, propellers, and whirlwings.

Have they not continents, islands,
rocks, to the world's utmost edges?
Have they not won through the high lands?
tracked the Great Bear in their sledges?
Brought out the forces aforegone—fire, sesquioxide of iron,
Demiurge, Lok, Demogorgon, and all the old gods—to environ
All the round world with a girdle and ring it with railways and wireways?
Could they not leave us our Birdland—
us that were kings of the higher ways?

Have we not granted them wayleaves for words that were voiceless and wireless,
Free as, on Midwinter Day, leaves fly when the wood-winds are tireless?
Have we not franked to their spectrum force-waves sent out by Orion,
Harmonies struck from his plectrum, informed with electron and ion?
Free, they exploited our regions,
all our resources employing;
Now they are sending winged legions, raiding, annexing, destroying!

Man, weaker-vanned than a midge,
Pole and sea-bed alike has invaded;
Perched upon Asia's high ridge-pole, and Onagra's habitat raided;
Stormed the redanned Himalaya and Everest's battlements taken;
Paved with his steelclads the Praya,
and dived to the lair of the kraken.
Shall not these holdings suffice him—
the ocean and continents seven?
Why should the air-voids entice him to blaze through the houses of heaven?

Once—before Man had bound Phusis, set the Great Forces in motion,
Turned Kraft and Stoff to his uses, and rifled the ether and ocean—
Only the birds had their pinions;
then King Fish ruled the sea-deep,
Marking Man's landward dominions
by lines of the breast-deep or knee-deep.

Man then was gill-less and finless;
then he was wingless and tail-less;
Anthropoid, natural, sinless,
walking by seas that were sail-less.

Next he went diving and swimming;
now, with the sky-peoples vying,
Over the sphere he goes skimming, flouting the fates! He is flying!
Dædalus-gifted, unfearing,
over the wings of the morning,
Through the piled cumulus steering!
BUT, hear the song of our warning:
Icarus-fated his gift is,
headlong his planes to their grave rock,
Whirr of Man's plumes in the lift is not the encore of the laverock.

Dynamo's drone in the dome-place
lulls not the lark's lilted lyric,
See, Man must leap to his home-place.
Lo! for his skill is empiric,
Tentative, experimental,
tuning his wires to disaster!
Neptune in bondage is gentle;
earth-gods hail Man as their Master,
Demigod, thaumaturge, clever.
Ours is a loftier pæan;
This is our air, and for ever;
our Empire and our Empyrean!

SCRUTATOR.

WESTERN MEN AND EASTERN MORALS.

IT is quite impossible for me to deal in any detail with the voluminous correspondence evoked by the recent TRUTH articles under the above head. But as the subject has created, not unnaturally, a great deal of interest, and as there seems also to be some difference of opinion in regard to the facts, and even a disposition to dispute them—which surprises me very much indeed—I feel bound to give my correspondents as much of a hearing as limits of space permit. In view of the letters already published from those who regard the prevailing state of things in Burma and Assam with horror, it does not seem necessary to go further into that side of the case, and I will therefore confine myself mainly to correspondence written from a different standpoint.

In the first place, one or two readers have had the temerity to challenge the accuracy of the statements made in TRUTH of August 10. The most notable of them is a gentleman whose position in life and long experience of the East entitle him to consideration. He writes at great length in defence of the attitude of the Bombay Burma Corporation towards its married staff, and refuses to belief the allegations of the gentleman who brought this matter up, or that concubinage is in any way favoured as alleged. I can only say in regard to this that I prefer the evidence of a gentleman who has been through the mill, who threw up a good berth in consequence of the way he found himself treated, and who holds the highest testimonial from his late employers. Incidentally, my present correspondent devotes a great deal of space and much unnecessary indignation to a supposed imputation upon the whole class of Government officials in Burma. If he will read the article again he will, I think, see from the context that the word "officials" was used, not of Government officials, but of the officials of the company whose regulations were under discussion. I only refer to this point in case anybody else should have misunderstood the passage in the same way—though I do not think it is likely. One or two other correspondents, without any pretension to personal acquaintance with the facts, refuse more or less emphatically to believe that concubinage is habitually practised by young Englishmen in the East, still less encouraged by their employers. The best answer to this is contained in the huge pile of correspondence that I have before me from men, and even from one or two women, who admit the facts and boldly justify them on one ground or another. It would be waste of time under these circumstances to argue with people who refuse to believe what innumerable witnesses familiar with the country treat as not only existent, but natural and legitimate.

There is a little difficulty in discussing this side of the case, the nature of which brings one face to face with matters unsuited for discussion in journals intended for general reading. But it appears to me of importance that people at home should be fully informed on this subject, and if they are to be so they must understand the attitude of Englishmen who know the East towards the practice of concubinage as at present prevailing. I will therefore ask those who are averse to the consideration of these matters to kindly close their eyes to the rest of this article and pass on. It will be sufficient to select two letters out of many to much the same effect, and the whole ground is pretty well covered by the following, which is of special interest and authority because it comes from an officer of the Royal Army Medical Corps:—

As an Englishman who has recently spent several years in Burma I hope you will allow me to point out some of the difficulties of the situation which your leader-writer does not appear to appreciate

In connection with this rather delicate subject an Englishman in Burma, or for that matter in any other country, has four possible alternatives. He may practice strict continence; he can marry; he may make an irregular union with a woman of the country, or he must run the risk of becoming infected with certain noxious diseases, which I need not specify.

The first is easy nowhere, certainly not in a Burmese jungle, where often there may be no other white man to speak to. Many noble attempts at continence in the Further East have ended in melancholy, drink, or other undesirable courses, only resulting in complete mental, moral, and physical shipwreck. I do not say strict continence in the East is impossible, but it is for the majority a counsel of perfection.

The second and best alternative is, of course, marriage, but marriage to a white woman in Burma has all the pecuniary and other anxieties attaching to marriage in England, plus a climate that is particularly injurious to white women and young children; and also there are the lonely, unsociable surroundings which many English women soon find intolerable. Sooner or later, for one reason or another, most married women in Burma "go home," and are in no particular hurry to rejoin their husbands, who are thus left alone to make the best of one or other of the three unsatisfactory alternatives I have mentioned.

Trading companies in the East know these facts only too well, and it is becoming a general scandal in the East that both officials and business men are constantly using the delicate health of their wives as a pretext for avoiding unhealthy or lonely stations, or as a lever to demand extra leave, extra allowances, or extra accommodation. Naturally both commercial companies and Governments are beginning to kick against this. Is it fair to blame them for doing so?

And now for the other two alternatives. Concubinage, however dreadful its aspect may seem to those who live in Piccadilly or in Fleet Street, is not under the circumstances so necessarily demoralising in a Burmese trading post. For consider the circumstances. A young commercial agent, or official, is often away in some remote trading post for months together, where there is either little or no white society—often there is no other white man within a day's ride of him. He is lonely, and perhaps gets depressed (a very frequent and bad mental symptom in Burma, where insanity amongst isolated Englishmen is fairly common). A housekeeper of some kind is necessary, if only to keep his numerous domestics in order and prevent petty thefts. From her, too, he can rapidly learn the language of the district and the habits and feelings of the natives. His meals and clothes want looking after, and during the spells of interminable rain he wants a companion, and one by preference who knows the ways of the country, and who can save him in this way more than she costs to keep. She will, at any rate, allow no other "frail" ladies to hang round his bungalow in the evening, which they would otherwise almost certainly do, with, again, undesirable results. I need not dwell on this aspect; it includes the dreadful fourth alternative, which not even "Exeter Hall" in its saner moments can really desire.

Burma is a country in which there is a tendency for the health of even the temperate Englishman to break down. Malaria and dysentery, ill-feeding, and exposure to the sun, are always at work on his constitution. The lonely life that many have to lead soon breeds depression—the half-brother to insanity. All these tendencies are most certainly aggravated by the strain of an enforced continence, which, unnatural and difficult at home, is more than difficult in the climate of the further East.

I quite agree with all your article says regarding the shameful neglect by many Englishmen of their "natural" born offspring in Burma. Such neglect to provide proper clothing, maintenance ,and education should mean imprisonment or, at least, cashiering. The affiliation laws should be most strictly enforced for the benefit of the unsophisticated Burmese women, who, after trusting to the honour and generosity of the English "sahib," are but too often shamefully abandoned with their half-caste children, without any provision for their maintenance.

Ex-Oriente.

In passing, I would remark that the last paragraph of this letter disposes of a point made by another correspondent, who was highly contemptuous of the ignorance of Indian law displayed in my first allusion to this subject. It was there observed that the Burmese mistress has not even the protection of the affiliation order for herself and her offspring. As a matter of law this appears to be wrong. I assumed the law to be at fault, from the facts of which I had evidence. But it is the facts that are important, not the law. "Ex Oriente," whose evidence cannot be challenged, endorses all that was said on this subject in my first article, and emphasises it. From what he says and from what I previously knew, it is clear that whatever protection the women and children may have in law, it is worth very little in practice, and it is easy to imagine reasons for this.

Before saying anything further on this side of the subject, I supplement the medical officer's testimony with one from a senior officer in the Indian Service, which may be taken as exemplifying the attitude of the average layman who defends the present order of things:—

Sir,—It is perhaps not surprising to find the Londoner, although he lives in such an exceedingly brittle house of his own, ready to throw the first stone at his sinning Burman brother. But poor human nature is much the same all the world over. It would no doubt be better for the morals and health of every young Englishman, whether he lives in London or Burma, to marry young. But it is very difficult for a man in the middle or upper classes, who has no means of his own, and has his way in the world to make, to marry one of his own standing without hopelessly handicapping himself in the race of life. The Burman system of concubinage, with its attendant evils, is after all more moral than a less permanent tie; it has the sanction of Scripture; and although it fits in badly with our modern and Western ideas, we must remember that our present substitute for it is a great deal worse.

In former days, at any rate, the irregular tie you refer to brought no loss of self-respect to the lady; but I think if you had taken her for a walk down Piccadilly and explained to her the profession of many of the well-dressed ladies she passed she might well retort that your anxious fathers and mothers may consider their sons as safe in Burma as they are in London.

When we bring up our girls so that they can live a frugal life, and be a help and not a hindrance to a poor man struggling in London or sweating in a Burman jungle, we shall be able to cope with the vice in our own country, and can then turn to purify the morals of the East.

Mashebo.

I do not know why this gentleman talks about Londoners throwing stones at their sinning Burman brethren; nor why other correspondents garnish their communications with sarcastic allusions to "sanctimonious moralists," "Exeter Hall virtue," "unctuous rectitude," and similar pleasantries. No stones have been thrown at any sinner in Truth. I have rather gone out of my way to disclaim passing any expression of opinion on the moral aspects of this question. In introducing the subject I referred to the adaptation of Europeans to the morals of tropical countries, and endeavoured to convey that it appears to me an inevitable result of the circumstances. Last week, again, I said as plainly as I could that I do not regard the morals of our fellow countrymen abroad as any affair of mine, and that they might be best left to the care of the clergy and purity crusaders. In all this I hoped that I had sufficiently guarded myself against the imputation of "unctuous rectitude" or "throwing stones at sinners." But it seems I have failed, and I will not waste time by trying again. As for the assumption in the above and many other letters, that because there are opportunities for immorality in London and other great towns a boy may as well be sent to Burma as anywhere else, I can only say that it seems to me unworthy of serious notice. It bears no relation to fact or reason. As well might it be argued that there can be no objection to a young man joining a gambling club because he can gamble anywhere if he chooses; or that there is no harm in his consorting with friends who get drunk daily because there are public-houses in most of our streets.

There is only one observation of an argumentative character which I feel it a duty, though an unpleasant one, to make on the above correspondence and some other letters to the same effect. I refer particularly to the allusion to noxious disease. If concubinage is defended as a protection against this evil, I must say that on the evidence that has reached me it is far from effectual for its purpose. This is the most unpleasant side of an unpleasant subject; and for this reason I purposely avoided it in my first article. But the most shocking of the statements made to me by the gentlemen who introduced the subject to my notice had reference to this very evil. Evidence to a similar effect comes from other sources. It is necessary to say so much if the whole truth about the general question is to be arrived at. Before dismissing the point, I think I must give here one of the most painful letters among the many that have reached me:—

Sir,—I certainly agree that there ought to be some protection for boys going out for the first time. But what about the girls to whom men become engaged when on leave and who later go out to be married? . . . At nineteen I went out to Burma to be married, knowing absolutely nothing. I was there nine months and then ran away I found that my husband had three sons by different native women in the orphanage at Rangoon, and that up to the time of my arrival, and many times after I was there, he had native women in the house. I came home with no money, too proud to tell my friends the reason, and finding that I had contracted an unmentionable disease. . . .

Life is ruined for me, but seeing your article I feel impelled to thank you for taking this matter up. I lived in Burma only a short time, but long enough to find out that most of the men, service or company, married or single, are alike in this matter.—Believe me, yours very truly,

Another Englishwoman.

As against this, in order to keep both sides of the account fairly balanced, let me say that I have had a letter from yet another Englishwoman, a married lady who has lived long in the East, and who takes a kindly and indulgent view of the situation, having nothing but praise for the Burmese "temporary wife," and considering that the arrangement is wholly advantageous to both parties.

The English reader has both sides of the case before him. He can form what opinion he pleases, or none. The only opinion which I consider it my business to express has been stated already, and is in no way affected by any of the arguments or opinions which have been so lavishly poured upon me. I look at this matter from two points of view: first, that of the English boy who goes from home to the conditions of life which are universally acknowledged to exist; secondly, that of the women of the country and the children begotten of them under those conditions. As regards the latter, the evil results are not denied by the gentleman who makes the most scientific defence of the existing order of things. As regards the former, nothing that has been said by way of apology seems to me to touch the point. Let us grant, for the sake of argument, that concubinage is the only convenient arrangement from the point of view of employers; that it is highly desirable (for the men) from the medical point of view; that it is highly advantageous from the point of view of domestic comfort; that it presents useful opportunities of acquiring the vernacular tongue; and, lastly, as urged by my military friend, that it is Scriptural. The question seems to me to remain whether it is a desirable condition of life for an English boy to enter upon as soon as he leaves school, or even before he attains his majority. The answer may be a matter of opinion. I can only say that if I were a father starting a boy in life, I should consider that Burma under these circumstances was no place for him. My impression is that this will be the general opinion of British parents when they know the truth. Very few of them know the truth at present, and that they should know it, and not send their children in ignorance to temptations from which they would save them if they had their eyes open, is the object with which these articles have been written. Men when their characters are formed, and their views of life are more or less settled, can choose for themselves and do as they think fit. The case is totally different with boys going out from home into the world, and with those who are responsible for their future. I would repeat that among the latter are their employers, and one of the conclusions which seem to me to follow from all that has now been said is that employers in Burma have no business to take boys from England into their service at all.

Since the foregoing article was written I have received another lengthy letter with reference to Assam; and as the case of Assam was described by a previous correspondent at some length, and there is here a direct conflict of evidence in regard to facts, I give as much of the letter as I can find room for:—

As an Assam planter of thirty-three years' experience (not a day of which I regret), I ask your courtesy in fairness to be allowed to make a few remarks on a subject evidently troubling your journalistic mind . . . [I omit here a number of irrelevant references to my previous correspondent, "Paget, M.P.," Mr. Keir Hardie, and so forth.—Ed.]

To touch, first, on the moral aspect of a young planter's life: Your readers, being, presumably, people with some knowledge of the world and its temptations, will admit that the age of, say, eighteen to twenty-six is a critical time in a young man's life; and it is at this age that most budding planters start life "in tea." The atmosphere surrounding them is entirely different from that in which they have been brought up and are accustomed to. Amongst strangers they come, in a strange land, far from the influences of home life, placed in a position of command and authority as regards the labour force, and requiring extreme tact and discretion from the outset. Of course, they are exposed to temptations, but these are no more confined to Assam than to any other quarter of this wicked world, whether East or West. The failures in Assam are comparatively few. . . . I can assure that anxious parent "An Englishwoman," and also "A Grateful Reader," that if their youngsters are of proper grit and mettle they can as easily lead clean, honourable lives in Burma—[Hadn't we better leave out Burma?—Ed.]—or Assam as in any other part of the globe, and, speaking of Assam in particular, there is every chance of their sons turning out respected, capable members of a community in which there is no room for "slackers," still less for what your correspondent so elegantly describes as "breeders of bastards"! . . .

The references made to the relationships of companies and their employees are gratuitously insulting to the highly honourable and able body of business men who control the tea industry in their capacity as managing agents and directors. Men of from four and a half years' experience are not dismissed to make room for others cheaper, and to save six months' furlough and allowances. If found useless they are fired out long before that, and quite rightly, too. If of the right sort they are cheerfully granted their leave, and with every chance of promotion on return.

Let me add, for the benefit of those parents who contemplate putting their sons "into tea," that it is a life with many attractions and many drawbacks, much as in other directions, and with little chance of amassing wealth, but any youngster willing to work hard and play hard can live very happily with no more chance of his morals being contaminated than in any other line of life. The essentials are a robust constitution, tact, and endless patience, with a conscientious love of work often carried out under depressing conditions. Combined with this there are opportunities for sport and play seldom obtainable with other occupations.

I am convinced that your sense of fairness will induce you to find space for this necessarily somewhat lengthy letter, for it would not be playing the game to leave your readers with a one-sided idea of immorality and depravity, amounting to a horrible scandal, playing havoc in many an English home at the thought of enormities to which sons and brothers are being exposed.—I am, sir, yours faithfully,

Ranald D. Davidson.

My previous correspondent is a gentleman of good character and position. He has spent, I think, over twelve months in the country. He spoke of what he had seen or learned. As a witness, he is in every way as much entitled to credit as Mr. Davidson. That he is not a tea-planter does not seem to me to prejudice his testimony. It is possible that he may have generalised too widely from his observations; on some points he may have exaggerated or fallen into inaccuracy. Here again, readers who have any personal interest in getting at the truth must judge for themselves. But I would point out that Mr. Davidson has rather gone out of his way to give a clean bill of health to Burma as well as Assam, and in regard to Burma there can be no doubt about the facts whatever.

THE HUDSON'S BAY AND PACIFIC AGAIN.

On August 10 there appeared in the columns of Truth some comments on a circular issued by Mr. J. H. Watts, of 1, Westminster Mansions, offering for sale shares in the Hudson's Bay and Pacific Railway Company, Limited. These shares Mr. Watts was offering, "to close an estate," at 50s. each in parcels of 40. Accompanying the letter was a prospectus which purported to give particulars of the present position and prospects of the company. This document stated that the railway company is entitled to issue 4 per cent. Gold Bonds for £4,000 per mile of railway constructed, which bonds "are to be guaranteed by the Canadian Government as to principal and interest." It stated that the Development Company has acquired a charter "for the construction of the Hudson's Bay and Pacific Railway, which is incorporated in a company of the same name at Ottawa," subject to a reservation of 44 per cent. That the profits, after payment of interest on the bonds, belong to the Development Company, and that on the construction alone profits of £1,000 a mile will be earned, while profits from lands and other sources are estimated on an equally lavish scale and show a return of £54 on every £1 share. The document goes on to state that all arrangements for financing the railway company have been completed, that the deposit of £40,000, as required by Canadian law, has been made and the stock-books opened, that the contract for building the railway has been accepted, and that the route for the first section of the railway was approved and signed by the Minister of Railways on June 18, 1909. Finally, there appeared at the end of the document the following list of the names of the directors of the Development Company: J. E. F. Greville, London, chairman; Vaughan Williams, London; E. T. Pearce, London; Carl Mannesmann, Ramscheid, Germany; Ewald Bastian, Paris; William Brice, Paris; James Kerry, London; Colonel Josiah Harris, C.E., London; John Weston, London; John Friends, accountant, South Shields.

From previous knowledge of the Hudson's Bay and Pacific Railway Development Company, I had my doubts as to the reliability of these statements, and I accordingly communicated with the Canadian Government office, and in the result was able to state, on the authority of Lord Strathcona, that the statement regarding the guarantee of the Hudson's Bay and Pacific Railway bonds by the Canadian Government was an absolute fabrication. As Mr. Watts in his circular had suggested that the secretary of the company would be pleased to answer any inquiries regarding the company, I invited him to tell me how it was that this absolute fabrication had appeared in the prospectus. My inquiry has elicited the following reply:—

56, Moorgate Street, London, E.C.,
August 17, 1910.

Dear Sir,—I am instructed to write you that at a meeting of the Board of this company, held yesterday, the attention of the directors was called to the article in your issue of August 10, referring to the recent circulation of a printed offer of shares in this company, based upon certain statements as to the position and prospects of the company, and followed by a list of names of directors. I am further requested by the Board to say that the circular in question is absolutely unauthorised, and was published without their knowledge and consent.

We trust that in fairness and justice to this company you will give the same publicity to this as you have given to the statements contained in your issue, and oblige—Yours truly,

(For the Hudson's Bay and Pacific Railway Development Company, Limited), James E. Hatton, Secretary.

Previous to the receipt of the foregoing letter, however, I had received a communication from Mr. Watts, in which he informed me that he had taken considerable pains to verify the accuracy of the particulars supplied to him, and that he had every reason to believe that they correctly stated the present position of the company. He also enclosed the copy of a letter he had received from the clients, the trustees of the shareholder whose estate was being wound up, on whose behalf he was disposing of the shares. As in fairness and justice to the Hudson's Bay and Pacific Railway Development Company I have given publicity to their disclaimer of the prospectus, I think it only fair and just to Mr. Watts to give the following excerpts from his clients' letter:—

I explained to you that from the information I obtained it was evident that the company had found considerable difficulty in arranging its finances until recently, when, according to the information given me by some of the directors and the secretary of the company, the necessary financial arrangements had been made to carry its project out successfully, and on the basis of those statements the circular you have issued was prepared, was submitted to the secretary of the company, confirmed by him, and since then, as you are aware, was submitted to the managing director of the company, and also approved by him.

If, as Truth states in its issue of August 10, there is no warrant for the statement that the railway bonds are to be guaranteed as to principal and interest by the Canadian Government, I can only say that any blame attaching to you or to us is not justified, and should justly fall upon the Development Company's officials. But for those statements the circular would never have been prepared, nor should we have been parties to making you or any one else any offer of the shares.

There appears therefore to be a direct conflict of evidence as to who is responsible for the "absolute fabrication" regarding the Canadian Government guarantee of the railway bonds, unless the letter of the secretary is to be read in the sense that the board of the Development Company is in its corporate capacity unaware of the doings of its secretary and managing director. If such is the case, it is about time that the board should take a serious view of its responsibility in connection with statements made in regard to the disposal of its shares. When I referred to this concern in January and February last I gave particulars of operations by the managing director, Mr. Greville, for the disposal of shares by offering to purchasers billets on the unbuilt railway. At that time a number of well-known gentlemen were represented as being directors of the undertaking, and upon their attention being drawn to the use being made of their names they one and all repudiated connection with the company. The present directorate should therefore be grateful to me for informing them of the use which is being made of their names in the disposal of shares in their undertaking. For it cannot be too widely known that the instance to which I referred is not a solitary attempt to dispose of the H.B. and P.R. Development Company's shares. It is for this reason that I have set out above both the list of names of the present directorate and the definite statements made as to the present position of the company. The board has officially informed me that the circular making these statements is absolutely unauthorised. I now invite them to go a step further and tell me and the public exactly what is the present position of the company. So far as I can learn, the majority of the statements I have already quoted have just about as much or as little foundation of fact as the "absolute fabrication" in regard to the Government guarantee of the railway bonds to which I have already referred. It is true that the company is in possession of a charter to build the railway. But I am informed on the highest authority that any one can obtain a charter to build a railway in Canada if he is prepared to pay the necessary fees. I am informed, also on the highest authority, that the possession of a charter in no way implies the sanction of the Government to build, that permission to do so has not been accorded either to the Hudson Bay and Pacific Railway Company or to the H.B. and C.P. Development Company, nor is it at all likely that such permission will be granted. I am further informed that the Canadian Government has already surveyed the route with a view to constructing a railway itself, and, in fact, is to all intents and purposes pledged to the construction of the line. If I have been misinformed on these essential points I shall be pleased to publish the contradiction of the Development Company's board of directors. If that contradiction is not forthcoming I fail to see any reason for the continued existence of the Development Company, unless for the purpose of unloading worthless paper on the public.

TAXI-PARASITES.

I do not know whether the modern tendency is for people to grow more and more helpless, but I am continually annoyed in my walks abroad by people wanting to do things for me—things which I am quite capable of doing for myself. On looking at the matter carefully it seems to me that every development of a new industry brings into being a crowd of parasites who live at the industry's expense. My particular grievance just now is the loafer who hangs around a taxi-rank. He annexes that rank. For all practical purposes the drivers on that rank might be men in his employ. If you want a cab you first buy him off with coppers, and then, and then only, can you start off on your journey. If you do not settle with him you find him hanging like a leech to the door handle, so that you cannot enter. As I wish to discuss this subject in a purely philosophical spirit, I must be fair. A certain number of these parasites perform a more or less useful function. You often come across a taxi-rank where there are cabs by the dozen, but no drivers. The creature then, spotting your requirements, dives into the hostelry which these very independent Jehus use as their club, and emerges with one. Then for a copper or two he kindly puts his dirty paw on the door handle, and you may drive off. It is these pence that I grudge. If drivers wish to keep a call-boy, it is their business to pay him, and not the business of the public.

This is the parasite performing a more or less useless purpose. In the more common form he is simply a hanger-on. If you hail a cab from a rank it comes up to you towing one of these wretched creatures who has affixed himself to the door handle. When you get out there is always another one somewhere about ready to plunge forward and hold the door open. If by any chance there is not one of the hoary professionals hawking round, the odds are in favour of two or three little guttersnipes, with or without evening papers, dashing forward to assist you. These imps I imagine are the young of the parasite, and I loathe them. If you happen to be with a lady they are even more officious. I have had as many as three at once struggling to put their grubby little hands on the door and claim a tip for so doing. At one important rank in Kensington which I patronise pretty frequently there is a blind hanger-on. I dare say many people know him and are charitable. I always tip him, because a blind man is out of the running in the struggle for work and appeals to your sympathy, but the other night a hefty scoundrel plunged forward also. He tried to oust the weakling, and would not desist until the chauffeur and myself threatened to knock him down. Then he moved off muttering threats.

Drivers know that all these people are a nuisance, and try to discourage them, but what is wanted is for the public to discourage them also. There is a drunken-looking ruffian who has taken charge of the rank nearest to where I live. I should think he takes sufficient toll in coppers to keep himself pleasantly drunk all day, because whenever I see him he is going backwards and forwards from a public-house to the rank. He gets no more coppers from me, nor do any of the parasitic crew. To give them money is merely to encourage a vicious form of idleness. If you make a rough calculation how many taxis leave an important rank during the day, you will find that even with a penny toll from a percentage the amount of blackmail gives the parasite a comfortable competence. I have patented a new method now which I find most efficacious, because it annoys both the driver and the loafer, and therefore shows the driver that it is to his interest to help to put down the nuisance. When I call a cab, and it comes up with one of these leeches on the door handle, I say very politely, "I'm so sorry. I see that's your cab; I'll get another." Then I walk away promptly, leaving the other two to fight it out between them. I have tried this many times with quite satisfactory results. The army of people who live by making themselves a nuisance, and having to be bought off, has increased, is increasing, and ought to be diminished.

A HOLIDAY CORNER IN SPAIN.

One leaves Waterloo at night. Every one knows the look of it, the general effect of hurry and business. It is not especially English, because all railway stations are alike; but it is in no wise suggestive of pleasure. One crosses the Channel in the dark, and goes on board a luxurious steamer in time for breakfast the next morning. Then there is a day and a half of swift, steady progress across the Bay. The indifferent sailors sit about with an unaltering expression of surprise because they are not feeling ill. Only the very bad ones are absent.

One comes in sight of a coast of golden mountains. They are big and bare, but the descending sun throws glamour about them. Besides, they are Spain—the very name breathes romance. All the flirtations grow instantly more violent, but the sea side of the ship is deserted. The dinner bugle, however, shifts the centre of interest for a while.

When one comes up afterwards it is dark. The ship is just slipping in between two great black islands, from the top of which lighthouses silently answer each other. The engines have almost stopped. Shoals of fish shoot about the bows, visible in the eerie light of the phosphorescent foam. Overhead the stars are of many sizes and distances, and the Milky Way really merits its name. Black mountains appear before the ship, and then a hill of lights rising from the water—Vigo. All the effects have been most admirably arranged for us; as we look a honey-coloured radiance stains the sky behind the mountains. With an air of curiosity the round warm moon looks over the top. Beerbohm Tree himself might turn his face to the wall if he could see this.

Arriving at some places by night, one should leave before dawn. It would be foolish to do so here; Vigo by day has her loveliness, and she is only the gateway to a land of dreams. It is called by Galicians "the Little Land," and its songs are "the little songs." When people put the mother-feeling into their nicknames it usually means a good deal. It is a land of dreams and contradictions, where trains totter like feeble old men on sticks, and motor-cars of surprising horse-power shoot like meteors down roads which look like flashes of forked lightning laid against the side of a mountain; where Sancho Panza, with his striped blanket, ambles along through mediæval villages admirably lit by electricity; where women grind corn in the manner known to Abraham, and enterprising companies found soap-factories; where British engineers build dry-docks six hundred feet long and warships of fifteen thousand tons beside the little hundred-and-fifty-foot granite slips where the ships for Trafalgar were launched—the "tremendous three-deckers and long frigates" of Borrow's admiration; where Indian corn and aloes grow up the mountains to a line at which quite suddenly pines and heather begin; fir and cypress hobnob together; pigs are lean and ants are fat; where the peasants are more picturesque and less self-conscious than the chorus of a comic opera; and where in one town you find electric trams and streets which consist simply of remarkably bad pavements overhung by ancient houses, and not more than three feet wider than the motor-cars which unconcernedly hurl themselves up them.

The mountains themselves are kindlier than those of the North. They have the tolerance of mastiffs, which live and let live. They never shut one in and oppress one; everywhere they lean back from exquisite valleys and still more exquisite bays. It rains frequently, but usually in a way of its own. A great cloud of dull silver will come rolling up a green and golden space between the mountains and blot them out, or more frequently blot out one or two of them. This cloud is cool and very wet indeed. It gently envelops one object after another. Usually by the time it has gone all up the valley and hidden the mountains at the top those at the bottom are beginning to be guessed at again, and the dull silver becomes bright. If this be on one of the bays, far beneath the road, two or three pines on a rock will appear, black on a silver screen, and perhaps a boat, its sail grey and motionless. Only a Japanese could paint rain in Galicia.

For inland scenery Mondariz is a Paradise. There are healing springs here which bring people from all parts of the world to combine a perfect holiday with physical benefit. The motor-drive from Vigo is of surpassing beauty, and the visitor who happens to hit on the day of a village fête here will see some lovely faces, hear some native music of bagpipes and drums, and witness some fine dancing. He will also feel exactly as though he were on the stage, particularly when he sees a Galician peasant of swarthy eyebrows and large size hustling into obscurity the beautiful peasant girl on whom he, the visitor, has cast an admiring glance. One soon comes to believe in melodrama in Spain.

La Toja is an island in the Bay of Arosa, where hot springs bubble up that will cure the body of almost anything, where the soul is rested and strengthened by the scenery and the tonic quiet, and the mind is looked after by a very complete casino and the charms of roulette. It is a budding Monte Carlo in an unspoiled Riviera.

The tourist who wants cities should try Santiago. It is a paved Venice built up a hill. All the houses are colonnaded, and since none of the streets were meant for traffic, traffic must e'en make the best of it, so bullock-carts and motor-cars, and motor-diligences also, go about in Santiago with an unconcern which is very engaging but rather stimulating to the nerves. The cathedral would strike a poet dumb, but it has an opposite effect on the archæologist. Both are happy, and so is the ordinary tourist who wanders about and comes upon pilgrims in cockle-trimmed cloaks and cross-staves, or ladies with pale faces and dark eyes, dressed all in black, and lets the dead and gone builders fill him with larger thoughts than he will ever express. Outside the cathedral is a stone fountain, to which come the peasant women in shawls of blazing colour and brilliant head-kerchiefs. They sit gossiping on the ledge of the fountain, and presently put the great jars of water on their heads and walk away more gracefully than any empress. It is all so picturesque that it seems quite unreal to the travelling Briton. He only feels quite sure of himself when he gets back to his clean, comfortable hotel and lifts up his voice to the effect that it is an outlandish thing to have fish after meat. Fish is meant to be eaten before meat—we all know that, because that is the way we have it in England. Having thus vindicated himself he is ready for more of this dreamlike, impossible, exquisite city.

Or there is Coruña, where modern life goes with a swing. There are tramways here, wharves, docks, fine shops showing jewellery of which some is so beautiful (though in no sense national) that the Rue de la Paix might envy it; a large theatre; big barracks, where gallant officers with blue uniforms tell feminine visitors that their collars are pale blue because that "is the colour of the love;" several social and sporting clubs, and so forth. A little way out of the town, on a headland, is a Roman watch-tower, whose sturdy stones and mortar have been encased in a square modern sheath leading up to a light of great power. One may read the secret of North-west Spain in the Tower of Hercules. Modernity, in so far as it is convenient, one finds there, but intact under this it needs no research to discover the unaltered Spain of romantic times. It must appeal to all tastes, because it is so much more amusing than any musical comedy, so much grander than any grand opera, so much more interesting than any romance, so much more colourful than any painting. For ten pounds you may get there and back in luxury, and be fed well on the journey. It is a small fare from here to a country where all the impossible things happen, where beauty is a matter of course and feeling is good form, where hospitality is not only a tradition but a reality, and where you never know in which out of seven or eight centuries your next step will land you.

NOTES FROM PARIS.

HOUDON'S WASHINGTON.

THE original statue of Washington by Houdon, executed at Mount Vernon, stands in the Capitol of Richmond, Virginia. The replica presented by the State of Virginia is now in the Vestibule Napoléon at Versailles. It towers, for the father of the American Republic was tall, above busts of the too matter-of-fact Franklin and Lafayette. The first view of this Washington took my breath away. Houdon, in narrating all about the mission with which he was charged by the State of Virginia, declares that he felt a too religious awe for Washington to let preconceived notions at all affect the work he had undertaken. I believe, from the close concordance of each feature and line with every other, that this is true. Washington received him with kindly and simple dignity and hospitable words, full of meaning. He begged that there should be no pageantry in the dress and other accessories, would not hear of a military uniform, or a sword, and only allowed his walking stick, which he used in going over his farm, or estate, to be brought into the work. The sculptor, however, persuaded him to allow a ploughshare to lie at his feet, and to lean, as he seems to look far into the distance, on the consular faisceaux, which a mantle half drapes. He stood for this portrait statue in his ordinary coat of blue cloth, with a chamois-yellow collar. The rest of the suit is composed of a long waistcoat, small clothes, and neatly-fitting leggings, with the light shoes that befit the Virginian climate. The man is clean built, of a slenderly elegant figure, and the outlines are extremely graceful. There is but one fault of taste in the sculptor's part of the work. He places the heels too close to one another, and turns out the toes over-much, as do German officers and soldiers. But it may be that the turning out of the toes was in Washington's time and circle a part of good manners as then in England.

The neck is rather long. But phenomenal strength of will, and, as it seems to me, poise of judgment appear in the countenance with a sort of dignity nearer to that of the Red Indian chief than that of any European type, ancient or modern. It is quite natural, and yet one fancies it high as the heavens. The nose has in it something leonine, and the eyes are deeply sad. They are slightly fixed, and give the impression of being the eyes of one who lived very much in his own thoughts and had but small companionship with the members of his set or circle. Washington, as Houdon presents him, was not perhaps a man of a great heart or mind, but rose through firmness of character, a lucid head, and enormous self-respect (which found its fulcrum in duty) to be the creator of the republic across the Atlantic. A stern and unflinching will are revealed in the chin and mouth, and the self-respectful aspect of his disposition is apparent in his whole being. The portraits of him on American postage stamps must be misleading if this statue is truthful.

I can imagine there was something in him of that quiet firmness and perfect balance of his faculties for which the late Lord Spencer was so remarkable, as there was something similar in the bodily frame of both men. The Washingtons of Virginia came from within a few miles of Lord Spencer's Northamptonshire seat. They must have enjoyed a fairly good county, or at any rate local, status. They had a coat of arms that pointed in its mullets or spur rowels to knighthood. This heraldic distinction would have been valued by the old settlers in Virginia. A novelist, without losing sight of probability, might infuse Spencer blood into the veins of the Brington Washingtons. The two families belonged to the same parish and went to the same church. One sees on a memorial tablet to some Washington in the church the coat of arms which became the American flag. I did not count the mullets which the revolted colonists took for stars, nor the stripes that flanked them.

The Vestibule Napoléon in the Palace of Versailles leads from the Orangery of the Hall of Congress, where Presidents of the French Republic are elected. As Houdon is a highly valued sculptor, his Washington cannot fail, when Presidential elections are on, to be noticed and talked about by electors. In this way the statue may have a happy influence on French politics. I was not aware that Washington had near relatives or connections besides his wife and step-children. But the Marquis de Sequi, whose ancestor served in the War of American Independence, appeared at the Versailles ceremony as representing Washington's family.

M. Jusserand, French Ambassador to the U.S.A., made a speech really worth reading at the unveiling of the statue. He may one of these days be sent as ambassador to London, and was careful to avoid anything that could be taken for tail-twisting, while exalting the American colonists and their Virginian chief. M. Jusserand is the author of a highly meritorious work on English literature, in which he devotes a bulky volume to the reign of Elizabeth and the authors who have placed a nimbus round her head. He is the most judicious writer I know of who has dealt with that period, and one feels glad to have him for a guide. He sums up the character of Elizabeth in saying that she was neither a lovable nor an admirable woman, but a truly great queen, and that she exactly suited England when it was under her sceptre, and the time in which she lived her personal defects were as valuable to her in the exercise of sovereignty as her greatest regal qualities.

The "Néron" of M. Haraucourt, which Antoine has been studying at his Brittany retreat at Cameret, presents many scenic difficulties. It greatly tempted Mme. Sarah Bernhardt, both as player and manageress; so much so that she took a long time to make up her mind. In the meanwhile she covered the wide margins of the manuscript with pen and ink drawings to direct scene painters, decorators, costumiers, and players. One of her illustrations covers a blank page serving as a fly-leaf. It represents her reading a roll on which is written the names of the actors and actresses she had chosen to second her in her personation. The rôles had been distributed, and verbal directions given to decorators, when the great actress and the author fell out on some question of detail. His manuscript, which he had often asked for, lay on her table. Seeing it there, he took it up, and went home to place it in a pigeon-hole of his desk. There it remained until Antoine rescued it from the oblivion into which the author had condemned it.

"Néron" is in five acts and in verse, is rich in colour and luminous thoughts and traits, and scenic. M. Haraucourt is too much the optimist and his kindness too deep for him to debar Nero from a verdict of "mitigating circumstances." Instinctively, and from habit and principle, he is an optimist, and foreran Capus in preaching "que tout s'arrange." He once told me that his optimism is too full-blooded for him to admit to himself there is such a thing as a quite plain woman. When presented to one who has the misfortune to be so reputed, he at first may be disagreeably impressed; but he at once reacts against what he saw, or thought he saw, at first sight, and is sure to discover that the fault lay, not in the plain face, but in his own eyes.

In dealing with Nero he takes him as he comes fresh from the tutelage of Seneca, who was a dealer in resonant and emphatic talk, more Spanish than Roman, and liked to listen to himself. The stepson of Claudius, when he assumes the toga virilis, is already a neuropath. He at first aspires, but in an unhealthy way, to a wider sense of beauty, based on realities personally felt. There would not be any great harm in this were not that part of the Roman world in which he lives and wants to shine and enjoy himself in his own artistic way so villainously bad. All the facts of that world conspire to render him a monster and to turn his fresh enthusiasms into sources of corruption. He finds the persons whom he had venerated as a boy, on the whole, the most cowardly and selfish of the courtiers who see in him the rising sun—the future Cæsar. The virtues he thought to cultivate are trampled upon by Claudius, his father by adoption, and by Agrippina, his mother, who unite to deprive him of family ties and affections. The honest Burrus kills in him the sense of probity. When later he marries, the frivolous Poppæa undermines his respect for womanhood; Otho and Britannicus so act as to make him imagine there is no such thing as friendship in a court. The Apostle Paul, who obtains access to him, brings him the gospel of Jesus Christ, and he sees in it higher truth than any he had been taught. But Nero is a neuropath. He is badly balanced. His many brilliant faculties want counterpoise. He at first opens his mind to the doctrine that Paul expounds to him. Then he kicks against it. Jesus Christ, in being all in all to mankind, kills in Nero the hope he has begun to nourish of being the great benefactor of the world. This arouses in him all the furious and sanguinary instincts inherited from forebears who drowned the Roman Republic in blood. Nero could claim a triple descent from Antony. The epileptic flaw came down to him through this heredity. It had rendered the ambition of Cæsar boundless, the lusts of Antony uncontrollable, and it made the rage for destruction that took possession of Nero overmastering.

We are mad about the aviators of the Circuit de l'Est, and can you object to the madness? They will be entertained at grand lunch by the City of Paris as airmonarchs with all the state that marks a feast in honour of a visitant king. With this there will be an enthusiasm genuine, unbounded, and deserved. The War Minister has arranged to have them at a lunch which will be a grand function, and will mark a turning point in military science. We have hitherto had three arms—cavalry, infantry, and artillery. Henceforth there is to be a fourth—aviation. "Higher and farther" will be the motto of this corps. Officers who study aviation and practise it professionally are numerous, and have done remarkably well. Not a single accident has befallen them in monoplane flyers for two persons—the man who steers and the man on the look-out.

"Our Boys" must not think that courage, muscle, and a good eye are all that is needful to make a first-rate air-man. All the French flyers of a high class are first-rate mathematicians. Blériot and Aubrunn graduated in the two great engineering schools. The others, impelled by their taste, became mathematicians as best they could in private study, at mechanics' institutes, and at night lectures. Legagneux belongs by upbringing to Puteaux, which is a dreadful suburb tantalised with a near view of a paradise on earth. It lies on the Seine's side facing the St. James's end of the Bois de Boulogne, and has in front those two lovely islands which in summer are devoted to the sports and pleasures of two highly-fashionable clubs. Puteaux is devoted to the manufacture of motors. No place near Paris can surpass it in grime and the noise of anvils and hammers, or a population with nerves out of gear.

The Court of Lisbon is seriously agitated. Do not fancy that some black plot for the extermination of the Royal Family has been discovered. The cause is a decision of the Civil Tribunal before which a creditor—French, I hear—of Queen Maria Pia sued her for non-payment of a long outstanding debt of about £4,000. She did not contest the validity of the claim, but simply demurred on the ground of "royal privilege." The for and against her demurrer were ably, and towards the close warmly, argued. The Tribunal decided for the creditor in a learned judgment, in which it dwelt on some principle of the Constitution and its amendments. Hence the flutter at the Court, for Maria Pia can never deny herself the pleasure, when she passes through Paris, of going round the shops and ware rooms of the Rue de la Paix and ordering whatever takes her fancy without stopping to count whether her Civil List allowance is not already weighted down with debts. Somehow, the Portuguese have seldom found fault with her for incapacity to live within her means. They even excused her on the ground that she never had any opportunity to learn in the convent in which she had been brought up, and that she came, a mere child, to Lisbon to be married. On the other hand, though the junior Queen Dowager Amelia has many sterling qualities, no flaw in her conduct or bearing is overlooked or pardoned. They regard her philanthropy as a premium of insurance against Republicanism. It lacks, they say, the grace of being disinterested. A Portuguese assures me that her very tall stature in a country where smallish people are far the most numerous is the cause of the misunderstanding. She looks, in an assembly at Lisbon that is not greatly made up of diplomats, a phenomenal being—a sort of Gullivera among Lilliputians.

LETTER FROM THE LINKMAN.

ENGLAND, dear Lady Betty, is a country where all the rich go to the Continent and all the poor to the Colonies. The Navy is maintained to protect the game.

There are two questions which are commonly heard here. The rich ask, "Where have you been?" to which the answer is Paris, Rome, America, Monte Carlo, or Cairo; the poor, "Where are you going?" to which the reply is Canada, Australia, or New South Wales.

Those only are stationary who are decrepit, immature, incompetent, or insolvent.

"A Villager" writes the following letter, which has suggested these observations:—

"Sir,—To us villagers our Sovereign is the King, but our King is the squire. Democratic institutions have been established throughout the country, but autocratic government survives almost unaltered in the village. Our cottage, labour, private life, and opinions are the absolute property of the squire, who can drive us from the district whenever he pleases.

"There has never been a Dick Whittington of Agriculture; 'All ye who enter here abandon hope' is the announcement attached at every entrance of the village. The estate is a business which is conducted on altogether different lines from any other; the most talented agricultural labourer can never hope to obtain a partnership in the undertaking, establish a rival concern, or even improve his social position materially.

"The towns overflow with successful operatives; several are millionaires; some, peers; others, members of Parliament; hundreds of thousands, prosperous. Who ever heard even of a retired agricultural labourer?

"Independence is an unpardonable form of iniquity, and is rigorously suppressed. Republicanism is Socialism in the town; reluctance to vote for the Conservative is Socialism in the village.

"The cottager is sold with the estate. Our late squire was an intolerant Tory, and the slightest exhibition of sympathy with Liberal principles entailed almost certain dismissal. The property was bought by an aspiring financier, and all have now to attend the Primrose League gatherings to avoid suspicion.

"The slavery of the soil is not apparent on the surface, but it is none the less real. 'The land belongs to us, and all upon it is our property—corn, cattle, and cottager,' in effect contend the landowners of England.

"There is one law for the town, another for the village. Under the latter agriculture must wither. From the servitude described we fly to the towns, from the congestion in the towns to the colonies—'Back to the land' is only back to the landlords."

* * * * * *

The English have a genius for perpetuating imbecilities. The Hereditary Champion claims to challenge the enemy of the Sovereign at the Coronation. Were there a fight, the Champion might now be committed for creating a disturbance, and were he to kill his opponent he might be committed for manslaughter!

At every turn the old and the new come into contact at the moment, and the condition will be more emphasised daily until it degenerates into a broad farce. We risk being put to music—having a burlesque Great Britain.

"A Suffragette" was injudicious to write this:—

"All Employment Open to Women.

"Sir,—Travelling in the country, I observe with indignation that the scarecrow in every field is represented as a man! The flapping of woman's skirt, the waving of her feathers would assuredly be as effective for the purpose as is the dangling of a coat? We will eventually displace man in every field."

"Of action," the lady obviously omitted.

Believe me to be very truly yours,

MARMADUKE.

ROUND THE MARKETS.

HOME SECURITIES AGAIN DWINDLE—RALLY IN SOUTH AMERICAN RAILS—YANKEES STRONG—THE OUTLOOK.

THE stock markets last week were practically left to take care of themselves. Half the members are away on holiday, and so for the present the hopes of renewed activity in certain departments which recently were said to be ripe for a boomlet must be left unfulfilled. The course of prices has been very irregular. Home Rails and the gilt-edged securities have remained in yielding mood. The demand in both cases is almost a negligible quantity, while as regards Consols, India stocks, Metropolitan Water Board issues, and others of a like nature, some heavy amounts have come to market in connection with the realisation of the estate of the late Baron Schroder. This liquidation is taking a little time to complete, and for the present must tend to retard a recovery in the Funds, low as prices are.

Foreign bonds have maintained a hard appearance, and so far nothing has occurred to shake the faith of investors in this group. The death of Senor Montt, President of Chili, had no disturbing effect upon Chilians, for while the country loses a leader of ripe experience and wise counsel, its political affairs are at present in a satisfactory state, and there is no reason to believe that the event will be followed by internal disorder. South American Rails have shown a firm front. Argentine descriptions benefited from the publication of good traffic returns. The receipts of the Central Argentine continue exceptionally good, thanks to the carriage of a fine maize crop. The Leopoldina, an important Brazilian coffee line, has broken its recent run of traffic decreases with a moderate improvement. This is noteworthy as indicating that the movement of coffee has now begun (the harvest is several weeks late this year), and from now onwards earnings should show expansion. The company is this year having also the benefit of a substantially higher exchange, so that its next annual report ought to make satisfactory reading. Leopoldinas have in the last week or two recovered a point or two, and it would not be surprising to see them go over 70 this year. Colombian Railway issues have been picking up, apparently because the market is satisfied with the new administration, but Guayaquil and Quito bonds have lost ground further in the absence of any indication that the State of Ecuador is going to meet its obligations.

The Yankee market, usually a law unto itself, has shown a fair degree of strength. Mr. "Jim" Hill's optimism over the grain crops, and the improved monetary position on the other side, have helped the market, but the main influence probably has been buying by the big people, who, having successfully frozen out certain interests which showed too much ambition, and having acquired a good deal of stock in the process, are naturally anxious to make a better market to sell on. It was mainly on this account that I ventured some weeks ago to express a favourable view of the immediate course of Americans. How far the recovery will be carried it is hard to say. Trade in the States is not good, though slack trade has been discounted. What is likely to have chief weight with the market as the months go on is politics. Wall Street expressed open pleasure the other day at the defeat of Mr. Roosevelt for the chairmanship of the Republican Convention, but it knows well enough that Mr. Roosevelt is not done with yet, and recognises that the incident will only tend to widen the cleavage in the Republican party, and perhaps let in the Democrats, while it will bring still more into the forefront of the fight the issue of the People versus the Tariff and the Trusts. Thus, while Wall Street's biggest leaders appear again to have taken the "bull" side, the speculator will do well not to forget the motto: In and out quickly.

RAILWAYS.

A MINOR CANADIAN RAILWAY—THE PROGRESS OF THE QUEBEC CENTRAL—VALUE OF THE BONDS CONSIDERED.

The preliminary report issued recently by the Quebec Central for the year ended June 30 last marked a new step forward in the history of this progressive little road, for the company is paying a first dividend of 10s. on its £25 ordinary shares. The Quebec Central, which owns a railway of a present length of 250 miles, was formed in 1881. It encountered trouble five years later when the guarantee given by the Province of Quebec expired, and as a result the company's capital underwent rearrangement. It now consists of £604,837 four per cent. first debenture stock, £336,450 three per cent. second debenture stock, £336,450 seven per cent. income bonds, and £694,850 capital stock. Since the issue of the present income bonds in 1901 the growth in the company's revenues has been such as to permit of a steady advance in the rate paid on those bonds until in 1907 the full 7 per cent. was forthcoming. This rate has been maintained since, and now, as I have just stated, a commencement has been made with dividends on the shares. The company's net revenue for the past year amounted to $351,856 as against $305,940 for the preceding year. The increase was therefore $45,916, of which the 2 per cent. dividend on the shares absorbs about $35,000. The £25 shares stand at about 18, and as the yield is only $2\frac{3}{4}$ per cent., they look fairly valued. For the investor the 7 per cent. income bonds, quoted at 119, which carry the year's dividend of 7 per cent., are perhaps the more attractive. The margin behind these bonds is now fairly secure, for the board would hardly have begun paying dividends on its share capital unless it felt reasonably assured that the bonds were sufficiently protected. The principal question which buyers have to consider is that of redemption. The income bonds may be repaid at par on January 1, 1922, but redemption is contingent upon the company redeeming at the same time the 3 per cent. second debenture stock. The fact is that these two issues are part and parcel of one another. When in 1901 the old incomes were converted holders were given for each £100 bond £50 of 3 per cent. second debenture stock and £50 seven per cent. income bonds. While, therefore, redemption of the incomes in 1922 would have been almost a certainty could they have been extinguished by themselves, the matter becomes much less a certainty seeing that a like amount of 3 per cent. stock has to be redeemed at the same time, for to make the operation worth the company's while it would have to raise new second debenture stock on something less than a 5 per cent. basis. Without allowing for redemption the incomes give a yield of £6 5s., which is, of course, a very liberal return. While, however, redemption in 1922, for the reason just given, is not a strong probability, it is a possibility, and for the investor wishing to guard against this a good plan would be to take an equal interest in the 3 per cent. second debenture stock and 7 per cent. income bonds. £100 of the former would cost about 76, and £100 of the latter 119, or, say, 112, allowing for accrued dividend. Thus the two together would involve an outlay of £188, on which the income would be £10 per annum, equivalent to buying a 5 per cent. stock at 94. This would mean a yield of £5 6s. per cent., not allowing for redemption, while if redemption did take place in 1922 the return would be brought up to £5 14s. per cent.

"OPTIONS" ON YANKEES—THE ATTRACTIONS OF THE CONVERTIBLE BONDS—SAFE SECURITIES THAT POSSESS POSSIBILITIES.

Investors desiring to take an interest in American Rails, but whose means prohibit them from incurring the risks attaching to the big fluctuations to which the Common stocks are liable, might find it worth while to look into the position of the convertible bonds.

Leaving aside for the present the Erie, there are four roads well known to the public here which have bonds outstanding that carry the option to exchange on specified terms into Common stocks. The companies in question are the Atchison, Norfolk and Western, Southern Pacific, and Union Pacific. The financial position of each of these companies is now so good as to leave no practical doubt about the safety of their bonds, and as the convertibles offer yields at present prices of 3¾ to 4 per cent., they are not extravagantly valued looked at merely from the income point of view, without making any allowance for the conversion rights. The Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe has two classes of convertible bonds. The 5 per cents. may be converted into common stock at par (that is par New York, equivalent to, say, 103 London, taking the dollar at the arbitrary rate of 4s. fixed by the Stock Exchange) at any time until June 1, 1913. They are callable at 110 and interest at the company's option, and are finally redeemable in 1917. The present price is 110-12. Perhaps the more attractive purchase is the company's 4 per cent. convertibles, standing at 106-108. These are also convertible into common stock at par, but the option extends to June 1, 1918, while the final redemption date for the bonds runs to 1955. It is true the company in the case of this series also may call the bonds at 110 and interest at any time, but early redemption of a 4 per cent. bond is not very probable. The option given to holders may easily become of value; it was not many months ago that Atchison common touched 127⅞, while last year the shares reached 129½.

Norfolk and Western Convertible Fours stand at 101-3, so that they yield 4 per cent. Some of my readers may ask how a 4 per cent. bond bought at 103 can give exactly 4 per cent. The explanation is briefly this: Dealings in American bonds are carried on in London upon the basis of the dollar being worth 4s., and the quotation appears in dollars per cent. Thus a buyer of five $100 bonds quoted at 100, while he would pay £100 sterling would receive bonds of a face value of $500 whose actual worth would be not £100, but approximately £103, the dollar being worth 4s. 1½d. Consequently the yield upon a 4 per cent. bond quoted at 100 instead of being 4 per cent. would be about £4 3s. This method does not apply to American shares, which, while dealt in on the basis of 4s. to the dollar, are converted to parity and dealt in at so much per share. Norfolk Convertibles offering a return of 4 per cent. cannot be regarded as other than cheap, for the property is a very valuable one, and in recent years has been one of the most progressive in the States. The right to convert into Common at par (New York) extends until June 1, 1917. Norfolks at the present time are quoted in London at about 100, but the shares in the course of the present year touched 111¾, and possess good scope for increment between now and 1917. The bonds mature in 1932, with the right to the company to call them after June 1, 1917, at 105.

The big fluctuations that occur in the shares of the Pacific roads will keep alive special interest in the convertible bonds of the Southern and Union Pacific. The former has an issue of 4 per cent. bonds, standing at about 102, which carry the right until June 1, 1919, to be converted into Southern Pacific Common at the rate of $130 per share (New York). Seeing that the company last year showed net earnings equal to 13 per cent. upon its Common stock (although it is limiting present dividends to 6 per cent.), this option is rather a fascinating one. Only recently Southern Pacifics stood at 142 9-16. The bonds are callable after March 1, 1914, at 105 and interest, and they mature in 1929. In the case of Union Pacific 4 per cent. convertibles, holders have the right to exchange into common stock at $175 per share until July 1, 1917, or, if the bonds have been called for redemption, until within thirty days prior to the redemption date. They are callable at 102½ and interest on and after July, 1912, on every interest date, and mature in 1927. The present price of the bonds is 106-108. Union Pacific Common has in the last few years had a predilection for going over 200. In 1906 it touched 203, in 1907 it soared to the record price of 225⅞, and as recently as the present year stood at 211. The company is without doubt one of the most wealthy corporations in the States; last year net earnings represented about 20 per cent. upon the Common stock, or twice the amount of the dividend paid. Thus the Convertible Fours possess scope for increment which is rare amongst securities that may be fairly described as "safe."

RUBBER

The Malacca Report—Advantages of Junior Shares—Singapore Para.

The Malacca report, it must be admitted, furnished ground for grave disappointment, and if the directors of the company are in the least susceptible to the complaints of dissatisfied shareholders—or to the criticisms of the Press—their hours of reflection of late can have brought them but little comfort. The board includes a director of the Bank of England and others enjoying an equally high reputation in City circles for business capacity and probity, and they cannot but be alive to the seriousness of their responsibility for a débâcle which has not only inflicted heavy losses upon a number of the company's shareholders, but has, in view of the company's importance, indirectly brought discredit upon the whole plantation industry. The declaration of a 10 per cent. interim dividend practically at the close of the year, when the directors must have been fully informed as to the results of the whole year's operations, encouraged the market to expect, according to precedent, a substantial final distribution, and as the steady appreciation in the company's shares which followed the payment of the interim dividend led investors to pay a heavy premium for their holdings, shareholders will, no doubt at the forthcoming meeting ask the directors for a full explanation of their misleading procedure.

The actual output from the property makes a miserable showing when compared with the optimistic estimate which the directors took the responsibility of furnishing to their shareholders, and argues, to say the least, either a strange lack of foresight or a want of intimate knowledge of the local conditions to which the company's estates are subject. It may quite possibly be true that the directors have taken a wise course in not forcing production, but this consideration will not relieve them from the blame which attaches to the declaration of the interim dividend, and to the circulation of assurances that after a few months' delay the output would be increased to 60,000 lbs. of rubber monthly.

However, if everything that is true about Malacca has already been said, much also has been said that is not true. The company, it is stated in some quarters, has the worst possible directors, the worst possible trees, and even the worst possible coolies; and it is, perhaps, time for us to pay some regard to considerations other than those upon which criticism has of late been so severely centred. If we have been misled by the optimism of the directors in the past we must endeavour to avoid the double blunder of sacrificing our holdings at the present ruinous prices. The Malacca Company owns the largest group of rubber estates in the East; it has in hand a working capital, as I pointed out last week, of about £200,000; its capitalisation after the conversion of the debentures will be so low that when the estates are in full bearing two shillings per lb. net profit on its rubber will enable it to earn dividends of over 200 per cent. per annum. and last year's dividend, it may be noted, was earned from the tapping of only one-thirtieth part of the company's planted acreage.

The grouping of estates tends to more economical working than the individual management of small properties, and, although labour troubles have caused some serious temporary difficulties, it can hardly be doubted that, when once these are fully overcome and the Malacca organisation is complete, the company's working costs and its general results should compare favourably with those of any existing Eastern plantation. The present low quotation of the shares is largely attributable to the habit which investors have of valuing their investments solely on the basis of the current year's dividend, apart from the question of prospective yields. But this method is not properly applicable to an estate which is now producing barely one-thirtieth of its ultimate crop, and the table which I give below will compare the market valuation of the Malacca estate with the current valuations of some other well-known rubber properties:—

| Company. | Shares Issued. | Nom Value. | Planted Acreage. | Working Capital in Hand. | Price of Share. | Market Valuation per planted Acre. |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| Anglo-Malay .. | 1,500,000 | 2/- | 3,391 | £13,464 | 25/- | £546 |

| Vallambrosa .. | 506,000 | 2/- | 1,887 | — | 44/- | £587 |

That the disparity in the market valuation per acre thus disclosed is not due to any wide divergence in the ages of the companies' trees may be seen by the following comparison of the planted acreage:—

Malacca, it will be observed, whether judged by its supply of working capital, the age of its tappable trees, or the strength of its reserves of young rubber, is by a long way the cheapest share which the market has to offer, and I want my readers not to overlook these important points in the casualties of the company's present unhappy situation. If the company were dissolved to-morrow the sale of its estates to a number of smaller companies would secure a return to shareholders far greater than the equivalent of the present share quotation. My own strong view is that no one should sell before the meeting, and that holders should average as far as possible. The debentures, in particular, are so well secured that they are not likely to suffer any further heavy fall, and the shares, both preference and ordinary, at present prices can hardly fail to yield handsome profits to those who can afford to wait for a recovery.

One of the outstanding features of the present year has been the heavy and sustained rise which took place in the shares of what were regarded in Mincing Lane as "backward" estates, and it may perhaps afford consolation to those of my correspondents whose holdings I feel bound from time to time to describe as "poor" and "unpromising" if I call attention to a few examples of previously neglected companies which have in a comparatively short time been converted by good management into prosperous concerns.

Within the same period Anglo-Malay, a typical market favourite, appreciated about 60 per cent. Low capitalisation is the distinguishing characteristic common to all shares which have marked heavy increases in value since the beginning of the year, and it may be taken as a general rule that increases in share values have occurred in direct proportion to the smallness of the company's capitalisation. Indeed, if we may take the current selling prices of planted rubber as a guide to the future it would appear that, during the next year or two at least, the shares of the well-managed younger companies should show a greater proportionate increase in value than can be expected from the older companies whose acreage, as I show above, is sometimes valued at £500 or £600 per acre. Old rubber land must, of course, by virtue of its substantial crops, always command a higher price than young rubber; but the investor who buys into a company on the basis of £600 per acre, although he may get ample compensation in the shape of handsome dividends, can scarcely expect to see his shares double in value as readily as the shares in a non-producing company possessing a liberal supply of young rubber valued now at, say, £40 per acre, which may perhaps in a year or two increase in value to £80 per acre, and possibly to much higher figures as time goes on. In active markets and with a rising price for rubber the big producing companies, of course, derive the chief, if not the sole, benefit, and although I look for higher prices for the heavy shares I think the investor would do well to include in his holdings some of the low-capitalised group to which I drew attention in my table of July 20, and which I included in my list last week. Glen Bervie, already a dividend-payer, Prye, Johore Rubber Lands, and Bandar Sumatra possess considerable investment merits; and for the investor who does not mind holding a share with a somewhat limited market Klabang would make an excellent holding. The company is well managed, and the official estimates of output are as follows:—

|---|---|
| 1911-12 ..... | 36,845 lbs. |
| 1913 ..... | 70,761 lbs. |
| 1914 ..... | 121,687 lbs. |
| 1915 ..... | 180,000 lbs. |

The issued capital is £37,000, and there are options (not mentioned, by the way, in Parry's useful A.B.C.) over the 13,000 unissued shares.

Singapore Para is obtaining satisfactory yields, and I hear that the company is acquiring another property on very good terms, particulars of which I hope to communicate to my readers in an early issue. The shares may be recommended as an attractive investment at the current quotation of 3⅝.

MINES.

Nineteen-day Account Conditions—French Investors and Kaffirs—Jungle Factors—Surprise Chairman's Statement.

The revival recently enjoyed by the mining markets has not been maintained. Prices in most sections have drooped during the past week, and although hopes are entertained that "shop" support will lead to some recovery before the carry-over on Friday it is not expected that outside business will expand until the present nineteen-day account is out of the way. Anticipations in respect of the coming month are of the cheerful order, and it certainly will be rather surprising if business does not increase to some extent as the end of the holiday season draws near.

The generality of market men seem to be of opinion that Rhodesians will be the first among mining descriptions to go ahead, but there are not wanting some who look for a rise in Kaffirs, while others favour "Jungles," and more particularly the Nigerian tin shares, which are dealt in in the West African market. In respect of each of these groups it is possible to find "bull" points, and it may be that each will receive attention from the public when they have had enough of the seaside and the moors for the current year.

Rhodesians, of course, have a stronger backing now than they ever previously enjoyed, and as there are still understood to be several schemes on the stocks, it is expected that the "insiders" will do their best to initiate another upward movement, and that before very long. Besides, it is contended that there is more scope for a gamble in Rhodesians than in Kaffirs, and according to market men "the public does like a gamble." There is something in this idea, but it is not correct to assume that Rhodesians are the only shares with attractions for the speculator. There are Kaffirs with speculative possibilities as well as Kaffirs which are established dividend payers, and whose quotations do not vary greatly from one year to another. In respect to Kaffirs in general, it seems probable that Rand results during the current half-year will record some improvement, and it is interesting to learn from Paris advices that French investors, who have done practically nothing in Kaffirs for some time past, are now evincing interest in these descriptions.

As regards West Africa, it must be admitted that progress at the gold mines has been rather slow, and that more money has been required for development purposes than was expected, but share values are comparatively low, and the probability is that if the "insiders" see their way to initiate a market revival other people will take a hand. Attention has been directed recently to the poor results which have attended development work at the Wassaw West property, but too much importance should not be attached to these. Other mines on the Taquah field had a like experience when they were developing comparatively near the surface, but with greater depth values improved. The Taquah mine has just announced a very satisfactory development, the reef where cut at the 9th level showing a value of 38 dwts. (equal to about £8) per ton over a milling width of as much as 67 ins.

At the Surprise meeting last Thursday the chairman (Lieut.-Colonel Jarvis), in course of his address, referred to the recent press criticism of the management in regard to the publicity question, and this is how he tried to pass the matter off:—

> The management of this property has been criticised for not giving information every other day. Well, anybody who knows anything about mining knows that there cannot possibly be any information of value to give, and anybody who understands anything about quartz mines knows that the value is never the same for two days running, and that good values are just as misleading as are poor values. Every competent engineer will tell you that, in justice to any quartz mine, you can only get a fair average value of the property about once every six months. It is very different if you are working from six faces simultaneously, but totally misleading when you are working only from one, and that one, as I have explained to you, of no account whatever in determining the value, but simply determining the line of strike.

My memory, however, is not so short as that of the chairman would appear to be. I remember the publication by the company of several glowing statements, some of which contained good assay values. Look at the following extracts from the statements published by the company up to the middle of June (the dates they appeared in the financial papers are added):—

> February 11.—"The varying values of the reef as development progresses are of minor importance, though it is most satisfactory to note that the reef where first struck gave an assay value of 2 ozs. 4 dwts., and at the deepest point so far reached, 13 ft. below where first struck, the reef assayed 1 oz. 11 dwts."
> February 23.—"Development . . . continues to look exceedingly well."
> March 4.—"In the opinion of the consulting engineer, there is every prospect of the pay shoot extending for 4,800 ft., and consequently the mine being the biggest in Rhodesia."
> May 7.—"Driven on new strike 40 ft., last 20 averaging 13½ dwts. over 34 ins. Reef looks splendid."
> June 3.—"Developments are proceeding satisfactorily."
> June 14.—"Developments . . . proceeding most satisfactorily; latest values in depth in winze 2 ozs."

What is one to think of the management of a company which issues such statements, and then some time afterwards says that "good values are just as misleading as are poor values," and values from only one face are "totally misleading?" I could continue the criticism, but I do not think it worth while. If the Surprise officials do not realise by now that the shareholders have a legitimate grievance, I am afraid they never will.

Cornish and Nigerian Tin Mining—Conditions Compared—Dolcoath and Naraguta Results.

By a coincidence, the issue of the report of the directors of the Dolcoath Mine at the end of last week synchronised with the publication of an output and profit statement by the Naraguta, one of the companies formed to work tin-bearing alluvial in Northern Nigeria. Except that both are concerned with the same kind of metal, the two undertakings have little in common, and it is interesting to compare the conditions under which they are working, especially as a revival of market activity in Nigerian tin shares is expected to occur before very long.

The Dolcoath mine in Cornwall has been worked for more than a century, and, as my readers are probably aware, it is a reef, or lode, proposition. During its lengthy career several shafts have been sunk, and at the present time there are many miles of underground workings. Shaft-sinking is an expensive operation, to say nothing of the provision of the necessary equipment. In connection with its new vertical shaft, which is 3,000 ft. deep, the Dolcoath has expended a sum of over £100,000. The Nigerian alluvial concerns, however, have no such huge expenditure to face. The material they are treating, or intend to treat, is the surface ground. The Dolcoath's ore, when it has been mined and raised to the surface, has to be crushed and passed through or over machinery of various forms in order to separate the black tin (tin oxide) from the waste rock. The Nigerian tin-bearing alluvial does not require crushing, and if content to work on a comparatively small scale, the companies need not provide any elaborate machinery. The tin can be separated from the earthy matter by hand labour and by the aid of water in "calabashes" or in wooden sluice boxes. It is intended, however, to instal modern sluicing plants with suction pumps such as are used in Australia, as these will enable a much larger quantity of ground to be dealt with, at the same time reducing labour requirements and the ratio of working costs.

The Cornish mines, of course, are better situated as regards transport facilities and the early disposal of their product, but the Nigerian concerns have the pull over companies working reef mines in that they have no deep sinking or driving in hard rock to do, and no costly hoisting and air-compressing machinery to instal and operate. Moreover, the royalty the Nigerian companies have to pay (10 per cent.) is based on the net profits they make, whereas the Dolcoath and most of the other Cornish mines have to pay a royalty on their output. The latter is a most unsatisfactory system, as under it a company which might produce its tin at a loss would still be liable to the landlord for a portion of the gross sum realised by the sale of the metal.

The Dolcoath report for the first half of the current year shows a net profit of £13,018 as compared with £12,722 for the preceding half-year, although the quantity of black tin sold was 853 tons, as against 903 tons. The slightly larger profit is accounted for by the fact that the prices realised by the company for its product averaged £88 13s. per ton during the six months under review, as compared with £82 6s. per ton in the latter half of 1909. The company could pay another dividend at the recent rate of 5 per cent. per annum, but the directors consider it better policy to keep the funds in hand, "having regard to the extra expenditure incurred in the Williams shaft and the commitments of its equipment and completion." It is expected that when the new shaft is used the mine's working costs will be very considerably reduced; the manager estimates the saving at many thousands of pounds per annum.

The Naraguta (Nigeria) Tin Mines—to give the concern its full title—was formed last January, and took over at the beginning of February an area of upwards of four square miles, of which one square mile had been extensively prospected by the Niger Company. The Naraguta now reports an output of 215 tons of tin oxide in respect of its operations during the six months ended July 31 last, and the estimated net profit is given as £10,000. Not many mining companies are able to announce a profit six months after their formation, and it should be borne in mind in connection with the Naraguta's production that the tin has been won by quite primitive methods, such as I have briefly described above. How much ground has been treated for the production of the 215 tons of tin now reported the official message does not state, so that it is not possible to calculate the average yield. But from the fact that the approximate value is given as £21,500, and the estimated net profit as £10,000, it can be deduced that each ton of tin cost rather more than £50 to win and to ship to this country. The cost of transport from the tin field to Liverpool is about £27 a ton, but when the road from the railway to the mining field is completed it is expected that the through transport rate will not exceed £15 a ton, in which case, of course, profits will automatically increase by about £12 per ton of tin produced. Later on the Naraguta will probably instal a modern sluicing plant and treat large quantities of the alluvial, and I shall not be surprised if this concern eventually passes the Dolcoath's rate of tin production. Even with hand labour the Naraguta's output is equal to one-fourth that of Cornwall's premier mine, and whereas the Dolcoath's issued capital is £340,000 that of the Naraguta is £158,000.

INDUSTRIALS.

Textiles Buoyant—Bolckow Vaughan and Guest Keen Results—Lake Superior Corporation—Egyptians and Oils.

The continued strength of textiles has again been a feature of the industrial market. The North keeps on buying Sewing Cottons and Coats. The latter have risen to nearly 14, which seems a steep price to pay, even admitting the great strength of the company and the possibility of that much-talked-of bonus. But the "bulls" remain sanguine, and talk about 15 being reached this year. Activity in the shares was stimulated by the report that the company has concluded contracts up to 15,000,000 lbs. of yarn with South-East Lancashire spinners for delivery within six months. Castner Kellner Alkali shares have been in good request, and the fact that the £1 shares stand at nearly £3 indicates that the market is looking for a favourable report. The company is, of course, closely allied to the textile industry. It manufactures caustic alkali and bleaching powder by means of electrolytic and decomposition of salt or alkaline salts, and does a very important business with the Bleachers' Association. Since 1904-5 (the accounts are made up to September 30 and issued about November) the company's record has been one of unbroken progress, as the following dividend record shows:—1903-4 and 1904-5, 6 per cent.; 1905-6, 7 per cent.; 1906-7, 12 per cent.; 1907-8, 12½ per cent.; 1908-9, 14 per cent.

Satisfactory reports still come to hand from the steel and iron and colliery districts. Bolckow Vaughan, whose increased dividend I referred to a week ago, displays profits for the year ending June 30, after providing for depreciation, of £286,135, as compared with £241,675 for the previous year. A smaller amount is this time written off new plant, machinery, and various extensions, the sum being £30,968 against £93,380, but after raising the dividend from 5 to 6 per cent. the company is carrying forward £162,314, as compared with £128,402 last time. Guest Keen and Nettlefolds, whose year ends at June 30, shows the substantial profit of £348,092. This is not up to the 1908-9 level, when net revenue amounted to £371,724, but the company is in so very strong a position that it has maintained the dividend of 15 per cent. after putting £50,000 to reserve and £20,000 to accident and fire insurance fund, and carries forward the big balance of £168,000, which is lower than that of a year ago by the amount of the reduction in profit. This company now has a general reserve fund of £1,200,000, and an accident and fire insurance fund of £140,000.

The Lake Superior Corporation for the year ended June 30 last received $201,500 less in bounties from the Government than in the previous year, and allowing for this circumstance its revenue statement appears satisfactory enough. Gross earnings of the subsidiary companies controlled amounted to $9,030,100, a decline of $171,200, and net earnings were $1,306,030, an improvement of $29,600. The surplus available for interest charges, depreciation, and renewals was $1,151,700, an increase of $58,400. The output of manufactured rails during the year was 201,600 tons, an increase of 43,150 tons, while the total shipped—namely, 206,250 tons—was 35,100 tons ahead of the previous year. While the report indicates fair progress, the company must do considerably better before its 5 per cent. first mortgage bonds can be regarded as comfortably secured. Still, at 90 the scrip is perhaps not dear having regard to the fact that there is a surplus margin behind the bonds and that in normal circumstances it should grow. The company's common stock for the present looks high enough.

Egyptian shares have been quietly bought, and the fact that at each of the last two or three accounts scrip has been shipped to Cairo is significant of how the outlook is regarded by those in the best position to judge. An encouraging bulletin upon the cotton crop was published by the Alexandria General Produce Association, in which it was stated that no appearance of worms had yet been reported. The Egyptian Markets, Limited, has just announced an interim dividend at the rate of 7 per cent., against 6 per cent. a year ago.

Among oil shares Shells have fluctuated erratically, and after a spell of weakness finished well over the worst. Talk of differences with the Standard Oil Company was held in some quarters to account for the movement, but to what extent this really explains the fluctuations it is impossible at present to say. The recent fall in the price of petrol is the most obvious reason for the drop. Spies have been bought on the satisfactory developments on the company's outcrops, and in the Maikop group the shares of the Anglo-Maikop Company were a favourite, because of the large cash balance still held by the management, representing, as I pointed out some weeks ago, about the equivalent of the present market price of the ordinary shares.

MISCELLANEOUS NOTES.

Redway, Furness's Latest.

From a number of correspondents I have been favoured in the last few days with copies of circulars inviting subscriptions for shares in a concern called the Anglo-Adriatic Syndicate. The offer emanates from the proprietors of the Financial Outlook, a puffing sheet issued by Redway, Furness and Company, Limited, an outside firm of brokers whose promotions, including the Ceylon Rubber, Tea, and General Produce Company, and the Essequibo Rubber and Tobacco Estates, Limited, have already called forth severe criticism in Truth. The Anglo-Adriatic Syndicate, according to the circular letter inviting subscriptions (no proper prospectus appears to have been issued), is responsible for carrying on the Casino at Corfu, and has a capital of £50,000 in £1 shares. These the Financial Outlook magnanimously offers to sell at 21s. each, stating that they will find a ready market here, that "it is our confident prediction that they will be quoted at least three times their present price in the early future," and that "the first year's earnings are calculated to produce a dividend of 100 per cent." If this estimate is worth the paper it is printed on, all I have to say is that the proprietors of the Financial Outlook, in agreeing to sell the £1 shares at 21s., are the most unbusinesslike people I ever came across. But the estimate of people like Redway, Furness and Co. is scarcely enough. It would help the prospective buyer to have some figures authenticated by responsible and disinterested parties as to the value of the property to be taken over. The company has not apparently begun business, so that the public will have to be satisfied with mere estimates of profits, but what is the hindrance to a little concrete information about the worth of the assets to be taken over? There is nothing in the circular to show that the syndicate acquires a brick or a box of dice, and that being so, the talk about the Casino at Corfu being the only serious rival to that at Monte Carlo (which has a capital of over three millions sterling) is amusing nonsense, and the offer of Anglo-Adriatic shares at a premium becomes sheer impudence.

Snakes!

The interest which the editors of ephemeral City journals take in their subscribers'—or even possible subscribers'—financial affairs is remarkable. One of these philanthropists edits the Investor's Weekly. His name is S. T. N. Hutchings. He is not satisfied with sending his paper free for a few weeks to anybody who writes for it, but anyone who once does so may be assured of being put on to any "good thing" with which the editor may be acquainted. Recently Mr. Hutchings has been anxious for all his readers to make their fortunes out of Cobra Bankets. He sends them telegrams to buy Cobras, and he follows up his telegrams with letter-cards. Here is an example of one of the latter:—

Dear Sir,—Since leaving the office to-day, I have seen a most important private cablegram from Captain Bowler, the Cobra Banket engineer, to a friend, and thought I would drop you this line. Captain Bowler first valued the alluvial deposits on the Cobra Banket at 5s. 6d. per ton on a total of £350,000, on which basis we consider the shares easily worth 50s. in normal markets. (Capital is £100,000.) Instead of 5s. 6d., however, the cable states that the concentrates are showing over 50s. per ton. It means that Cobra Banket shares should be worth at the very least £10, without allowing anything for the undeveloped mine ore. This cable confirms the high opinions we have heard in many other quarters. There is no doubt it is a wonderfully rich property, and anyone who picks up the shares at present prices will do handsomely.—Yours truly, S. T. N. Hutchings.

Cobras were about 27s. 6d. when Mr. Hutchings first started his campaign, and they have dropped to about 17s. 6d. Some cynical observers might imagine that this fact is the explanation of Mr. Hutchings' anxiety to push Cobras. They might ask how it is that he does not take advantage of the present price and purchase at 17s. 6d. all the shares worth £10 upon which he can lay his hand, and if you mentioned to them that most important private cablegram from Captain Bowler their smiles would be "childlike and bland."

Bucket-Shop Valour.

The recipient of one of the circulars of the Mutual Stock and Share Association, Limited, wrote recently to that firm informing them that in view of what had been said about them in Truth he did not care to risk placing his cash in their hands, but would give them an I.O.U. for an option on Exploring Land and Minerals, which would be duly met in case of loss. The reply was that the Mutual Stock and Share Association does not do business on anything but a cash basis. As for the Truth references, the Association loftily declared that they are libellous, have no foundation in fact, and would have formed the subject of legal proceedings long ago but for the trouble and expense involved, and the fact that their business had not been in any way affected by them. The Mutual Stock and Share Association, Limited, was the latest of a series of bucket-shops started by a Mr. D. Sutherland. One of these was a notorious concern with the title of Milne, Son and Hamilton. Sutherland was the proprietor, and about eighteen months ago he made his appearance in the Bankruptcy Court in connection with the concern with £10,000 liabilities and no assets. At the meeting of the creditors Sutherland stated that his business had been taken over by a limited liability company under the same name, which had agreed to set aside 50 per cent. of its profits to pay off his debts. Four months later Milne, Son and Hamilton, Limited, had put its shutters up, and Sutherland announced that he had accepted the management of the Mutual Stock and Share Association, Limited. These circumstances make it easy to understand why the Mutual Stock and Share Association, Limited, would be likely to find legal proceedings "troublesome," and also supply ample reason why no one should entrust them with cash either for options or margins.

A Minor Bucket-Shop Action.

One of the bucket shops of which I have not heard much recently is Basil Aird and Co., of 65, Fenchurch Street, E.C. That the firm is very much alive, however, is proved by particulars of a little case which a correspondent has sent to me. A gentleman in the North who had heard the magic word "rubber," but had never bought a stock or a share in his life, received in April one of Aird's circulars forecasting a sensational rise in Vallambrosas. He was induced to forward the firm £20 to "control" 100 shares. Then by subsequent communications he was persuaded to make additional remittances until he had paid £110. Finally, when settlement day came he was presented with a demand for £69 differences, and upon his demurring to pay an action was brought against him for the amount in the local Sheriff Court. He went to his solicitor, who entered an appearance with the object of fighting the case. It appeared, however, that a representative of the firm had called on the client to press him to advance further sums in addition to those already paid, and when the case came into court a statement was made on behalf of the plaintiffs to the effect that an arrangement had been come to on this occasion for a settlement. But for this statement the case would probably have been summarily disposed of by the Sheriff on the documents placed before him, but the allegation made it necessary for the defendant to go into the witness-box. As he did not wish to let his friends and neighbours know how he had been gulled, a compromise was effected by payment of a further £40. One can quite understand the disinclination of a bucket-shop victim to go into the witness-box and make public confession of his ignorance, and there is no doubt that bucket shops trade to a considerable extent on this very natural trait. I learn, by the way, from this action that Basil Aird and Co. is the trade name of one Walter John Minors.

A Warning from Vancouver.

"Promoting in the City of London seems easy," is the heading to a long article in the Vancouver Daily Province calling attention to the flotation of the First B.C. Goldfield, Canada, Limited. After quoting the statements in the prospectus as to the potential wealth of the mine, the Daily Province remarks that no mining engineer's report is given, and no word said about any work having been done on the claims acquired, and draws the inference that two men have staked some claims and told the man that "grub-staked" them that they are enormously valuable. It seems true that the prospectors brought samples and have had them assayed, but the Province points out that in British Columbia outcroppings are often extraordinarily rich, and until real development work has been done it is impossible to estimate the value of a mine. The correspondent to whom I am indebted for the newspaper tells me that the claim acquired is that known as the "Princess May," and in regard to it he writes:—

It is true it might turn out to be an Eldorado, but it is an absolute absurdity to ask the British public to invest in this district without first inquiring from those who are on the spot the real value of each claim. The Vancouver Stock Exchange Committee has already publicly expressed its willingness to answer all inquiries regarding investments in British Columbia. I would suggest that the public accept no prospectus that is not backed by the "O.K." of the Vancouver Stock Exchange. The men of that exchange are one and all interested in the legitimate development of the province, and would not be prejudiced in any way against any flotation if it were based on a tangibility.

My correspondent is chiefly concerned with the good name and credit of the province, which he considers in peril by reckless company promotion. But his words are worth bearing in mind by British investors. Of course it is difficult to persuade a man who is determined to put his money into the first convenient hole in the ground that he comes across to ask for information as to the probability of his ever getting any of it out again. But if investors generally know that disinterested information is not only available, but will be readily afforded, it ought to do something to stop reckless promotions.

Truth will be sent weekly to any address in the British Islands for 7s. for 3 months; 14s. for 6 months; or £1 9s. 1d. for 12 months (including Christmas Number). ### Railways.

Atlas— The market is so badly out of favour that it is difficult to advise; on the whole, I should not part with the sound dividend-payers at these prices.

J. B.—Very speculative, though possessing possibilities of ultimately turning out all right.

May.—See article last week.

Pooz.—1. Interest none too well covered; better delay a purchase. 2. If you want safety, better stick to fixed interest-bearing stocks.

Saxon.—Better not sell now. The fall can hardly go much further, and meanwhile you have stocks that you can thoroughly depend upon.

Thomond.—Worth holding at present price.

Mines.

A Southern Scot.—Work at the deep leads property has been suspended, and the company has acquired an interest in a Maikop oil venture. Albarada.—Now that they have come down you may as well hold for dividends, providing you recognise that they are somewhat speculative.

Bermondsey.—See reference in my notes of August 3. A further purchase just now would be very much of a gamble.

Headsman.—East Rand Proprietary, Crown Mines, New Kleinfontein, Van Ryn, and Witwatersrand Deep.

Interested B.—1. The company is a New York registration, with a capital of three million dollars in $5 shares, and is interested in properties at Cobalt, Ontario. Several dividends have been paid, but I am not in a position to advise as to prospects. The price is about $9, I believe. 2. See reply to "S.W." Iveragh.—Exchange into something more promising.

Legiolium.—I have no particulars of the concern, but high falutin' talk such as you mention should be enough to keep you from parting with your money.

National.—1 and 2. They may have a small rise when markets generally improve, but are not the best possible selections for your purpose. 3. A hopeful speculative lock-up. North-East.—Some recovery is not unlikely, but whether they will reach the prices you paid in the early future I cannot say.

Pat.—1. An early dividend is unlikely, but I think you will be able to realise to somewhat better advantage later on. 2. Very much of a gamble. 3. A fair speculation. 4-6. They all have lock-up chances, but may not rise much in the near future.

S. W.—I think the shares a hopeful speculative holding. Dividends are expected to commence towards the end of the current year. The offices of the company are at 4, Sun Court, Cornhill, E.C. Ship.—All pretty hopeful from a lock-up point of view. I cannot say which will be the first to rise. Senax.—Cut your loss.

Mixed Securities.

Acetone.—1. Have not heard a price. 2. Hopeful long lock-up. 3. Competition very keen, and company has not yet built up a strong position. Arran.—1. Retain your Kamnas until you see the report upon the property by Mr. Lillingston. 2. Your money could be employed more hopefully than in these just now. 3. A hopeful speculative lock-up.

Bread.—1. I think you will get a better price by keeping them. 2. I should not like to say they will not go lower, but taking the long view a purchase at present price should turn out all right.

Clericus.—1. There is not much of a market in the shares named, and I should prefer to put the money into something more active. 2 and 3. Be content with your present holdings. Chemicus.—I would place them as follows: 5, 3, 2, 4, 1, 7, and 8. No. 6 comes into a different category, as it is not a fixed interest-bearing security. Of its kind it is an excellent share. Coaster.—I doubt if you could do better than spread the money over Kansas City Terminals 4 per cent. bonds, Buenos Ayres and Pacific Railway 4½ per cent. Consolidated debenture stock, and New York Telephone 4½ per cent. bonds.

D., Mrs. (Oxford).—Safe enough; I cannot attempt to say that they have touched bottom, but the scope for a further fall is small. Doubtful Spec.—1. I do not care much for these and would sell. 2. I have never held a good opinion of the concern. The shares may possibly be given a run with better class descriptions in course of the next few months, but holding on that chance would be an absolute gamble.

Glengarry.—1. You might hold in hopes of a moderate recovery. 2 and 3. What do you wish to know about these? I am not a thought reader. Greta.—1. They have lock-up chances. 2. Better hold.

Kersal.—Exchange out of No. 1. Hold 2 and 3.

Labour.—1 and 2. There is a comfortable margin behind them, and I should hold. 3. I will try to help you if you will say what point you desire to be informed upon. Meanwhile see reference to the group in my notes this week. Lena.—1. I do not see any particular attraction in them at this price. 2. A promising speculative lock-up. 3. The present price discounts possibilities some way ahead, but nevertheless the shares are being talked higher still in some quarters.

Mussoorie.—I have not all the quotations by me. Better get your broker to supply you. As regards the question of holding or retaining, I should be inclined to sell b, c, and d, as the company is having to face increasing competition. The others in your list ought not to be disturbed. M. O.—1. No; leave this form of speculation to those who have made a long study of it. 2. They may revive later on in sympathy with the higher-priced descriptions. 3. It all depends upon the yield you are prepared to accept. If you want safety you could hardly beat, say, North-Western Debentures; the yield is only 3½ per cent.

Orient.—1. Very speculative. 2. It has good backing, and may turn out all right later. 3. Prospects still dubious.

Porky.—Both well secured. Peg.—Hold both.

Rabbit.—1. They are 10s. shares, having 6s. paid. Better hold. No. 2 is very speculative, and I would not buy more. Nos. 3 and 5 are good. I do not care for 4, and 6 now looks fairly valued.

Steady.—1-4. I believe the concern named to be efficiently managed, and think the shares a hopeful speculative lock-up. The sum mentioned is approximately correct. 5. If safety be the primary consideration, better select either Consols, India Three-and a Half per Cents. or London County Council Three-and-a Half per Cents.

Rubber.

Anima.—Keep your debentures and await the result of the meeting. Ardee.—They were quoted ex-dividend of 2s. on June 10. You are entitled to this, and should claim it of your broker. I do not care to propose a selling limit just now; wait for more active markets and then write again. August.—I think it is quite possible that the price may improve as you suggest, but when you see a chance of getting out without loss you had better do so. You do not say what the shares cost. Absens.—In the circumstances I should average the Malaccas. Anxious Dick.—This is one of the best of the trust companies, but at present prices you would probably do better by purchasing the shares of some of the good producers.

Bradley.—Your broker ought not to "think" very long about this matter. He ought to know that you are entitled to a dividend of 2s. per share, which he should obtain for you without further delay. If you bought through a member of the Stock Exchange he is responsible to you for the dividend. The shares were quoted ex-dividend on June 10. Boswell.—I should not sell just now. Wait until you can do so without loss. Beverley.—Jong-Landor will probably pay a small dividend next year, and a good one thereafter. At present the price seems high enough. Bantam.—Have nothing to do with the firm in question. Consult last week's Truth, also Truth Cautionary List. Buy any of the shares mentioned in Rubber Notes last week. Budget.—You have broken Rule 2. It is no doubt obvious to you that if you submit questions relating to seventeen companies, which is nearly double the number for which you enclose coupons, my answer must be compressed. The best shares in your list are c, h, j, and n. In the second class I should put b, g, i, m, o, and q; while following a little way behind come a and e. The foregoing will probably turn out all right, but in a class to themselves d, f, k, l, and p will give you a good deal of worry. When markets harden do your best to get rid of these. Bermondsey.—Keep these for a time, but should the price improve before the end of the year you had better exchange into a more marketable share. Bandar.—1. A good share rarely dealt in. 2. This should become a sound investment share. 3. At present there are more desirable purchases than this. You do not state definitely whether you already hold these, but I gather that you do not. Bunks.—1. An undesirable purchase. 2. Very fair prospects.

Calcutta.—1-2. These questions should be addressed to the secretary. 3. In view of the low price I should average. Croquet.—From your letter, I cannot gather whether you have bought the shares or wish to do so. 1. Is in good hands, but there is no market for the shares. I should not buy them. 2 and 3. Will become good Rubber investments. Caution.—It is impossible to say, but the prices of all of them should advance during the next few months. Cannon.—You will lower the quality of your Rubber investments by adding the two shares you suggest. 1. May turn out a fair speculation. 2. I would not touch this. Careful.—Without seeing the table you quote, I do not care to pledge myself to the accuracy of the deduction. I do not quite follow whether "estimated production" refers to next year or the year when the estates are in full bearing; if the latter, the price per lb. is too high. You may, however, safely buy the first-named share. Canturian.—1. These will recover with more market activity, and will pay good dividends. 2. A good company, which should also benefit considerably by a market revival, but the shares are really a lock-up. Chub.—1. From all I can learn, the outlook in the immediate future is satisfactory. 2. I cannot find any such fear exists in the minds of those best qualified to judge, but, of course, it is a question that can only be settled by experience. Conland.—1. Vine and General Trust Shares and Northumberland Rubber and Tea fulfil the conditions you mention. 2. There is no point in waiting until next month before making purchases of Rubber shares. Clyde.—1. I should average. It is said that the company has some highly remunerative business in hand, and that the dividend for the current year will be a good one. 2. Wait for an advance in price; I expect this shortly. 3. The price remains low, as a longer time has been taken for the company to get to work than was originally anticipated. However, everything is perfectly straightforward, and results should be forthcoming in a few months' time. I cannot fix a selling limit at present. Constant Reader.—Yes, hold all these for better markets. Chagford.—I have received your letter, which does not seem to call for any reply. Cranbourne.—1. From the particulars of the concern which you supply, the outlook does not appear to be attractive. The shares were allotted privately, no prospectus being issued. The vendors appropriated cash to the extent of 56 per cent. of the capital to be paid up, the cash taken being fourteen times the amount taken in shares. If, however, the company proves to be a success, the vendors have the right to double the capital by taking additional shares at par. Further, there can be no profit until the year 1913, according to the estimates. For these reasons I advise you to sell your shares if you can. 2. The prospectus was a straightforward document and read very well, but for some reason, which I have been unable to fathom, the market do not seem to have a high opinion of the shares, and I have never recommended them. From your relative, who is so closely identified with the company, I am sure that you will be able to gather a much more reliable opinion of the prospects of the company than I might venture to give, although I shall be pleased to answer any definite question you may care to put.

D. I. C.—I advise you to hold all for a market recovery. Allagars are expected to pay a dividend for the current year. Dunelm.—I still think well of these. As you signed the transfer only three weeks ago, I advise you not to trouble to write to your broker yet regarding the certificate. Wait another month, and then write if you have not received it.

Elysee.—I take it that you want a share, which is quoted at par and paying a good dividend, in a company whose labour is plentiful. I do not know of a share that fulfils all these conditions. Eno (Dublin).—1. I should not sell them. 2. These will ultimately prove a good investment. 3. The rubber which will be produced on this estate is of a low grade. The shares are not a satisfactory investment. Edgar.—I think you would do well to average 1, 2, and 4, but I could not advise you to add to your holdings in any other case. Elasticus.—You may safely add the three shares which you name to your present holdings, and you will then have an exceedingly good rubber trust of your own. If bought at the prices mentioned the three shares should return you considerably more than 7 per cent.

Frinton.—In the circumstances I should advise you to do so. Fawjem.—1. I have no special knowledge regarding this company, but I could not advise you to hold the shares. 2. Brought out under good auspices and should do well. 3. Retain for recovery. May easily reach your price within the next year. F. S. H.—I should not sell any of these at present. Hold for recovery and part with "c" first. Fife.—A and C. I regret that I have no knowledge of these companies. They are not known in London. B. Is not a concern that I care to recommend. Fishergate.—1. Yes; but the directors did not expect a heavy fall. 2. The company ought, I think, to have called the shareholders together before; but the fall is due rather to market dulness than to the drought, and the company is in a strong financial position. 3. Average your Malaccas, and buy Linggi and Johore Rubber Lands—the fully paid issue.

Georgius.—I am interested in learning what you have to say, but I know that my statement regarding shortage of shares is true. Hold your shares for a profit. Girvan.—1. I still think well of them. 2. I should not sell now, but I have a very poor opinion of the future of the company. 3. I should certainly keep these. Grinder.—1. Keep your shares for the meeting. See Rubber Notes. 2. Probably at the end of next year. G. R. K.—If you will read my Notes in the issue of April 6, page 855, you will see that you are under a misapprehension. Gaulus.—I strongly advise you to have nothing to do with the shares which you name, and to avoid dealing with the firm who offer them. Greigite.—1-2. I think it is quite probable that you will get out of both at a profit.

Hat.—1. In usually well-informed quarters it is expected that the rubber market will become active again within the next two months. You had better keep your shares. 2. I do not think that your idea could be marketed. Holdfast.—1. This is a sound concern, and there is no reason for selling below the price which you have fixed, even though you have such an excellent profit. 2-3. Yes, certainly sell both when you can get a small profit.

Ironmond.—1. Worth holding for the guaranteed dividend. 2. Not a concern that I should recommend, but if you hold the shares keep them for the present. Interested.—See first reply to "Hat." I expect to see a substantial rise during September in the first two shares you name. Ilfra.—1. Do not sell yet. See reply to "Interested." 2. Hold for a better profit or for a dividend.

Jimmy Green.—1. You are entitled to the dividend, and you should worry your broker until you get it. 2. Do not be anxious about the certificate; it seems quite hopeless to expect any rubber company to issue a certificate within a reasonable time, but your interests are not prejudiced by the delay. Janus.—1. I consider this to be a fair investment, but at any time when I could see a profit I should take it. 2. I do not think this will prove a profitable investment, and I advise you to sell when you can do so without much loss. J. P. O.—1-3. All these are undoubtedly good companies, and will be certain to prove good lock-ups. 4. I hear good reports of this estate, and, therefore, if you feel disposed to buy I should not dissuade you, although the share is not a favourite of mine.

Kelson.—I think the course you suggest is a wise one. Keep the others for the present, but exchange 1 when you see a favourable opportunity. Kendal.—1. Yes. 2. This is one of the best estates, and the shares from an excellent Rubber investment. 3. At their present reduced price they are not at all dear. Kirkdale.—1. I advise you not to buy this share. 2. Madagascar Ordinary. Kinsa.—A good list. Hold for more active markets. My opinion remains unchanged, but I am continually breaking fresh ground by calling attention to cheap shares. Developments retarded by delay in delivery of machines.

Labour.—Not a share that I am fond of, but I think you would do well to hold for the present. Lock-Up.—1. Sell these at the first favourable opportunity. 2-3. In good hands, and should do well, but I do not suppose that you will get a big dividend in the near future, or that the price will advance substantially. Le Mont.—Hold for the meeting. See Rubber Notes.

Michael.—I expect that all these shares will stand at higher prices during the coming year. No. 1 should pay a dividend before the end of this year, 2 probably before the end of the year, but I am unable to say when you may expect a dividend on 3. Miltonha.—There are several reasons why I do not regard this company as an attractive speculation. Unless you particularly wish to take an interest in the concern I advise you not to do so. Mountaineer.—1. This has been answered by the issue of the report. 2. In October. 3. £10 debenture stock for one share. Muskerry.—1-2. Retain these for the present. Developments are proceeding which should cause a substantial rise in the price within a few weeks. 3. This would be an excellent exchange if the shares you propose to sell were not so low. Wait until next month before selling. Mortlake.—1. The prices of shares in different companies in relation to a fixed rate of dividend (estimated) vary on account of the difference in the amount of capital as compared with output. 2. The great point, of course, is to select a share which will subsequently become active. Probably both the shares you name will be "active" next year. May.—1. The address is 21, Ironmonger Lane, London, E.C.; 5 per cent. is guaranteed until the end of 1913. The secretary will tell you the date when it is payable. 2. A very good rubber investment. The dividend probably will not be paid until the end of the year. Major.—1. This is a very good list. 2-3. I do not suggest any alteration, and I think the shares ought to stand higher next year. It might be worth your while to leave instructions with your broker to sell in the event of their showing a good profit during the autumn or next spring. You could leave behind some transfers signed in blank. Medico.—I do not advise the exchange which you suggest. I think you will do better by keeping the shares now held. M. L. L.—1. Continue to hold them. 2. See first reply to "Arran" under Mixed Securities. 3. Hold these, and see third reply to "Clyde." 4. You are right as to the present price. Please excuse the clerical error. Do not sell these shares, as the company possess large reserves of land, which will probably be sold off to subsidiaries. 5. You must write a separate letter regarding Mines. 6. I should retain these for a recovery. Manx.—1. You have a good trio. They should all pay good dividends in the future. Add a few Vine and General Trust shares. 2. This is one of the best of the wild rubber group. 3. No. Monte.—Keep your shares and see Rubber Notes. Malacca.—1. All speculative shares are out of favour at the moment, but these should pay you increasing dividends from the end of next year onwards. 2. With regard to your Malacca query see my Notes. 3. Worth keeping for the guaranteed dividend. Minden.—1-4. The directors are all respectable, well-known men in the rubber world, but no rubber can be produced until 1912, when, it is estimated, a dividend of 10 per cent. may be earned. The present price is about par. You do not say what you gave for the shares. As you are so far away from civilisation you had better give your broker a transfer signed in blank and ask him to sell, fixing a limit that will give you a small profit. Miranda.—See article to-day, and again after the meeting. Local management is to be strengthened. Rubber good quality, and prices are higher this year. Yes. Your estimate is conservative.

Nowgong.—You may buy them now in the order 3, 2, 1. Novo.—Hold for recovery and appreciation. I do not know the reason for the removal, but will try to find out. New Reader.—I do not think you need be anxious about your rubber shares. 1. Is under a cloud at the moment, but will come right. 2. I think these will also recover. 3 and 4. Both these companies are doing well. North-East.—A good share. Market inactivity only reason.

Old Hand.—What I think you will find is that many of the trees which were incorrectly tapped have already had a long rest, and will come into bearing again in the immediate future. I advise you to wait for the meeting. Omega.—Thanks for kind letter. 1. Exchange into Malacca. 2. Will develop rapidly towards end of year. Look for substantial improvement.

Pulpit.—I do not care to fix selling limits until the trend of markets becomes more settled. Phœnix.—1-3. Keep all for the present, but see reply to "Pulpit." Primus.—1. Unless the sum is too small divide it between the two. If it is a small sum buy the Linggis only. 2. Yes. 3. This is also a good company. Putnam.—1. May be worth keeping for the guaranteed dividend, but I am not at all fond of the company or its sponsors. 2. Best left alone. 3. One of the best in the list of rubbers. Pan.—1. A purchase of these now would probably result in a profit within the next year. 2-3. I could not recommend these. Poor Dick.—1. You had better hold this share for a recovery. 2. I should keep the debenture at all events for a time. 3. Not one that I can recommend. Puzzled (Clifton).—1. You will have to pay the calls as they fall due. 2-3. There is nothing against the directors, but I do not think well of the property they control. 4. Yes. I do not think there is a doubt about it. Pisa.—I would not cut a loss at all. Wait for the meeting.

Queer.—1. All good shares, which will eventually pay you well at the prices given. 2. Average your Crudes. 3. Northumberland Rubber and Tea.

Resi.—1. Hold. See article. 2. Exchange No. 5 into Johore Rubber Lands — the fully-paid issue. Hold the others. Rhino.—I should hold them for the present, as they may have a spurt at any time, but they must be regarded as a speculation. Rights.—I do not think that you need be anxious concerning the two shares which you hold, as I suppose that you have paid for them. They will probably reach your prices again during the coming year. I do not think that the opinion to which you call my attention is so reliable as to give rise to anxiety. Riddy.—I should average now. The price is expected to advance next month. Rhubarb.—If you will try and wait "until September or October" you will probably be in possession of information that will give you more confidence. Rougie.—I think well of this company. You say that you have not yet received the certificate, but have you signed the transfer? R. S. A.—1. Sorry, but I have repeatedly warned readers and correspondents against carrying shares on borrowed money. In the special circumstances, however, if I were you I should protect my shares. 2. Yes; a reasonable limit, but write again after the meeting. 3. I do not care to fix a date until markets revive. See article as to comparative value. £10 per acre is the balance sheet figure only. The property is worth several hundreds per acre.

Seaweed.—1. Hold these, they should turn out well. 2. Are talked very much better. 3. A good company. Hold your shares for recovery or dividends. Staff.—1. See Rubber Notes. 2. I should keep them for a much better profit. 3. They are quite worth holding for the price which you gave, and in the meantime you will get good dividends. Stirling.—1. I do not like the company, but I cannot advise you to cut your loss just now. 2. Worth holding for the guaranteed dividend. 3. I could not advise you to increase your holding. Sandy.—Your good old-fashioned broker evidently knows nothing whatever about rubber shares, and probably cares less, or he would not advise you to cut a loss on these shares at present. Hold all of them for another month or two at least. Shemus (Rathgar).—I expect an improvement in the price within the next two months, but I am unable to say anything about a dividend at present. Senex.—Hold them all for the present, but do not look upon them as a permanent investment. Specular.—1-2. You had now better await the result of the meeting. Shunned.—Developments with regard to subsidiaries are proceeding, and the price should move forward substantially in a few weeks. S. G.—Do not touch any of them with the exception of 1. Seestu.—1. You gave a very high price, and had better average. 2. Will begin to tap next year. Shunter.—Hold both for recovery. Scotia.—All the points you raise are correctly stated, but the general tendency will be for the difference in price to decrease in the future notwithstanding temporary fluctuations. Snooks.—1. Second table allows for increase of capital to bring estate into full bearing. 2. Too early to forecast dividends accurately. See article. 3. Yes, if markets are active. Slainte.—See article.

Tatsfield.—1. I should average now, and if the price again declines buy some more. 2. These might with advantage be averaged. Torphin.—I think your prices should again be reached before long. 2 is good enough to hold, although the company is rather highly capitalised. Terrier.—I should average. Teddy Bear.—You may buy more on any further decline. Tantallon.—If this list comprises the whole of your rubber shares I congratulate you on the profits still shown. The shares are all worth holding for investment, and no doubt will stand much higher in the future.

Ullingswick.—Hold your shares until after the meeting.

Vaughan.—Company is making very large profits, and has a great future. Write again if in any difficulty. Veritas.—1. This is probably the best share in the list of rubbers. 2-3. Yes. Buy the Beverley shares. Vermont.—As you can afford to sit tight that is the correct course for you to adopt. I do not think that the situation, although painful at present, will remain doubtful for long.

W. A. R.—1. If you feel disposed to make this exchange I should not dissuade you beyond pointing out that you are parting with a dividend-paying share for one upon which you will get no dividend for a year or two. Sell the Rubber shares mentioned in your P.S. on a renewal of market activity. William.—Await the result of the meeting. Whittlewella.—1-2. I should be inclined to keep these until the end of the year and then sell. 3. A very well-managed company, although not in the front rank. Wayside.—1. No. Increase your holding. 2. Merlimau at present price would be a better exchange. Winkum.—1. Increase principally in inferior grades, but stocks of Brazilian rubber are low, and consumption shows heavy increase.

Zenophon.—1. You had better stick to them. 2. Hold on to these, they will come all right. 3. Will probably pay a dividend on account of this year. Zenodorus.—1. You might buy a few more to average. Some brokers have a minimum commission of 1½d. per share. 2. See Rubber Notes. 3. I advise you to have nothing to do with these shares. 4. A wild cat. 5. This was explained in the circular recently published. 6. I should not buy this share. The company is in good hands, but is somewhat over-capitalised. Zena.—I should not sell now. Wait for the meeting. See Rubber Notes. Zero (Stockport).—I should not advise a purchase of these shares. I have not seen the notice of the sale, but the estimated production for this year is about 3,000 lbs. Zanzig.—Yes, but only plantation rubber is offered at the sales.

Miscellaneous.

Arkan.—As a speculation I prefer No. 2, but with so small a sum better not speculate at all. Anxious Dick.—1. No. 2. The company has only just commenced business, so that it is impossible to say what the shares are worth, but, judging by the character of the board, a purchase now should eventually turn out well.

Bexhill.—Invention understood to be a good one, but shares necessarily very speculative at this stage. I have not heard a price. Better.—I do not care for either, and would sell.

C. K.—I cannot say whether the lists sent are correct or not. You could check them through Messrs. N. Keizer and Co., 31, Threadneedle Street, E.C. Canny Scot.—I do not advise either. No. 1 has been frequently criticised. There is really no excuse for the public going to second or fifth-rate banks, and banks that are only so in name, when they have the choice of a number of old-established institutions, whose credit is beyond suspicion. C. M.—Province of Buenos Ayres Fives might suit.

Chatsworth.—The company is not very free in supplying information to the Press, and I can add little to what you already know regarding the position.

Dania.—Sorry, but it is against my rules to do as you suggest. Duke.—1. I should prefer to have the money in one of the old-established banks. See reply to "Canny Scot." 2. You might leave the money where it is. Deferred.—1. Impossible to say what the stock will eventually be worth. 2. The coupons have to be lodged for payment, or you have to make arrangements with your banker to regularly cut them off and present them. Apart from this and the other drawback you mention, there is no objection to bonds. D. J. M.—Not a firm that has come under my notice.

E. C. P. (Brough).—Thanks for the circulars.

F. J. B.—Criticised many times in Truth. Advice cannot be regarded as disinterested. Flurito.—Have nothing to do with the shares of the Anglo-Adriatic Syndicate, which are being assiduously puffed by the Financial Outlook. 2. Am afraid you have no option but to pay, unless you are prepared to bring an action for wilful misrepresentation in the prospectus.

Grey.—You stand a fair chance of seeing them higher this autumn.

Holdfast.—No. 1 is worth keeping. I regard 2 and 3 as more doubtful, and would be inclined to sell.

Leon.—1-3. Am afraid you must regard the money as lost. 4. Prospects understood to be good, but not a great deal known here about the concern at present.

Medicus.—It is one of the soundest societies of the kind, and has had a long and excellent record. I think you need have little hesitation in depositing as suggested.

Perplexed.—Sell them. Pan.—There is no market for the shares of the Anglo-Adriatic Syndicate, which are being pushed by the Financial Outlook. I strongly advise you and others to leave the shares alone.

Rails.—1. On January 3 they touched 35 7-16. 2. Many warnings lately in Truth. Roby.—You might as well hold.

Shaftesbury.—As a speculation not unpromising. Sherwood.—1. The profit almost seems worth taking. 2. They seem pretty fairly valued. 3. No; I by no means recommend. Ship.—Sell the Mexican issue; keep the others. Silo.—The shares are worth holding. Swan.—The market talks the shares considerably higher. Better keep them.

Talsfield.—Leave them and all circularising firms alone.

Worthington.—No 2 should be worth keeping. No. 1 is more doubtful, but at the present price I question whether it would be policy to sell. W. S.—The company is of excellent standing; it formerly existed under a charter as the Royal Niger company. The young fellow could hardly do better than consult the company with regard to the details required.

INSURANCE.

THE FIRE AT BRUSSELS—SMALL LOSSES FOR INSURANCE COMPANIES—BIG LOSSES FOR LLOYD'S—SOME INSURANCE PRINCIPLES.

THE fire at the Brussels Exhibition is in many ways instructive from an insurance point of view. It appears that the fire spread with extreme rapidity, and that the fire brigade and fire-extinguishing appliances were very inadequate, if not altogether lacking. The total loss under insurance policies is not yet known with any exactness, but will probably amount to a considerable sum, approximating perhaps to £2,000,000. It seems unlikely that any insurance office in this country will have to pay more than about £5,000, though one or two of the smaller companies, to whom such an amount would be a serious matter, are said to be involved. The loss for the underwriters at Lloyd's is likely to prove a great deal more serious. It is said that they may have to find as much as £500,000, which would not be surprising to people who know the class of risks that the underwriters at Lloyd's are ready to undertake. It must be apparent to the most casual observer that at many, if not most, exhibitions the risk of loss from fire is very considerable—the buildings are of a temporary and flimsy character, and the contents are often of great value. Much property is aggregated in a small compass, and if a fire occurs the loss is apt to be very serious.

These facts are suggestive of an important distinction between the kind of insurance undertaken by first-class insurance offices, and that for which underwriters and some of the smaller offices are willing to make themselves responsible. It is easy enough to see the great difference that exists between the cautious procedure of strong insurance companies at one end of the scale, and the reckless betting of certain underwriters at the other end. Between these two extremes there are endless gradations, and it is impossible to put one's finger down at any point and say that here there is a definite distinction. Insurance properly so called is based upon the law of average, and a knowledge of average results is obtained from extensive experience in the past. Past experience is a trustworthy guide to future happenings; but where experience is scanty there is little or no guide to average results, and consequently little or no indication of the appropriate premium to be charged for any particular risk. The consequence is that the bulk of the insurance transacted by insurance companies is conducted on terms which are based upon knowledge, while many of the exceptional risks undertaken at Lloyd's are carried at rates of premium determined by guesswork. I have often used the argument that insurance is a process of gambling of the kind called "hedging," and is employed to escape the financial uncertainty to which we are all subject through the lack of knowledge as to when we shall die, or whether, or when, a fire will occur.

If an individual remains uninsured he is liable to financial loss from fire or some other cause, and this state of uncertainty constitutes him, for all essential purposes, a gambler. When an insurance company relieves a great many individuals from this uncertainty by issuing policies to them, the company itself does not incur a state of uncertainty, since it can rely upon experiencing average results, in exactly the same way as a man who buys all the tickets in a fair lottery is sure of gaining the prize, and neither wins nor loses by the process.

In order to experience average results it is not necessary that all the risks should be of the same character. An insurance company may have policies on cotton mills, printing works, and private houses. In any one year it may possibly experience bad results with one class of risk, and favourable results with another; so obtaining something like average results over the whole of its business. Especially during a number of years the losses are, for practical purposes, certain to exhibit average results if the business is extensive, and if the rates of premium charged are based upon much more extensive records than are possessed by any one office.

To the more speculative risks frequently undertaken at Lloyd's these considerations do not apply. In the first place, past experience is lacking for future guidance; in the second place, very few risks of each class are undertaken, and the total business of any group of underwriters is extremely limited, as compared with the extensive business of important insurance offices. In these circumstances underwriters relieve individual policy-holders of financial uncertainty so far as the underwriters are financially able to pay the claims, but the underwriters are not themselves free from uncertainty in the way that important insurance offices are. The underwriters, frequently guided only by guesswork, and taking comparatively few risks, are not in the position of the man who buys all the tickets in a fair lottery, and so is sure of winning the prize, but are in the position of a man who buys a few tickets in a lottery without knowing whether a lottery is fair or unfair.

For average results to be obtained the experience must be extensive, either in range or time or both. This condition is fulfilled by insurance companies, but is not so apt to be fulfilled by underwriters, for the reason which is fatal to most, if not all, gambling systems. The resources of an individual being limited, a succession of heavy losses may exhaust the whole of his capital, and make it impossible for him to continue his operations sufficiently long to allow the law of average to assert itself.

Considering the circumstances in which the underwriters at Lloyd's conduct their business it is surprising to find that claims are met so fully and regularly as they are, but on any kind of insurance principles it must, I think, be admitted that much of the business transacted at Lloyd's is gambling commonly so called, and not insurance. In such a case as that of the Brussels Exhibition it is entirely inappropriate that a number of individuals should be far more heavily concerned than wealthy insurance companies, who are much better able to stand a heavy loss without any appreciable inconvenience. There seems little doubt that the underwriters at Lloyd's have become much more venturesome in recent years than they were formerly; they have invaded the field of fire insurance, and have shown themselves willing and eager to write large risks, for which it must be confessed the financial status of individuals entirely unfits them. I quite recognise that Lloyd's has of late imposed conditions on its members calculated to give confidence to the public; but the underwriters have travelled very far from the field of marine insurance, with which they were formerly chiefly concerned, and the working of which is the main object of Lloyd's as an institution. In thus extending their activities, and particularly in taking large risks of a hazardous nature, which strong insurance companies either decline altogether or only accept for quite small amounts, I cannot help thinking that the underwriters are unwise.

Such a development of the business is often convenient to the insuring public for small risks, but I do not see how it can be regarded as a sound development, nor does it seem appropriate to entrust large risks to a number of individuals who are, on any kind of rational principles, inadequately equipped for carrying them with success.

QUEER STORY.

THE GOODWOOD CRAZE.

DURING the last decade this country has been devastated by a constant succession of crazes, short-lived ones for the most part, though one or two of them have lasted for quite an appreciable time. Bridge we still have with us; but bridge is hardly a craze; it would be more aptly described as a disease. Ping-pong raged for a year or more; then there have been limerick writing, diabolo, roller skating, and other forms of killing time.

The question how these various crazes came to live and have their being has often been discussed and debated, and many people, who ought to know better, are probably of the opinion that, like Topsy, they "growed."

They didn't; not a bit of it. They have all of them been artistically engineered by keen-witted gentlemen who saw money in them, and having seen it took steps to annex it as quickly as possible. In some cases these astute persons have sown sovereigns in advertising in order to reap £5 notes in the way of profits.

So it was with the game of "Goodwood," which, it will be remembered, was a sort of race game. The horses were made of cork or some kind of pith, and were forced along narrow channels in a board by means of quicksilver, the flow of which was so ingeniously contrived that it was impossible to be certain of the winner until the race was over. For some months no home was complete without a Goodwood board, and among people who were addicted to gambling it for a time completely ousted Sandown and roulette.

The story of how this game came into vogue is not without interest.

Mr. Robert Batcher was not exactly a millionaire in the literal sense of the word, for he could not have put his hand on seven figures; nevertheless, he had got a long way beyond the six-figure mark, and he had the talent for accumulating money very strongly developed in him. He was, first and foremost, a newspaper proprietor, having large interests in several of the London daily and weekly journals, and in a few provincial ones. He also speculated a little, underwrote loans, and was always open to make a bet, if he saw anything more than an even chance of winning it.

In appearance and manner he was distinctly "loud," and there was a rasping aggressiveness about him, a sort of blatant ponderosity, which made him an excellent advertisement of himself. He rather gloried in the fact that he was a self-made man, and that his father had been a navvy.

Batcher and his stockbroker, Morkin, were one afternoon seated in the smoking-room of the former gentleman's club, discussing matters of high finance, when they were joined by another member of the club, Mr. John Rumble.

Rumble was a financier pure and simple, though many people who had had dealings with him would certainly have queried his simplicity. He was a thin, little rat of a man with a highly Eastern cast of countenance, and a peculiar affection of the eyes which gave him the appearance of being continually engaged in what is known as "looking two ways for Sunday."

Morkin, the broker, remarked that the ping-pong boom was now dead, and wondered what would take its place.

"Why, that depends on the press," said Batcher. "All them things do. If a man likes to spend a few 'undreds on advertising pretty near anythink in reason he can get his money back and a bit more. These crazes have all been worked up by the papers."

"Yes, I suppose they have," said Rumble, reflectively.

"Suppose? There's no supposing about it, I give you my word. It's a sure fact. Now I'll give you an instance in a small way. Not so very long ago a young chap brought me an idea for a parlour game, quite a simple little thing. I gave 'im a fiver for it, and got it properly patented and put on the market. I spent a couple of 'undred in booming it, and got back something like two 'undred per cent. on my money. No flies on that, eh!"

"It sounds all right," said the broker. "Have you done anything else in that line?"

"Bless you, yes. I'm always on the look-out for them sort of things. I'm thinking over one now."

"A parlour game?" inquired Rumble.

"Yes. Sort of race game affair."

"We were talking about popular crazes," Rumble remarked. "Now I don't believe that any race game would ever become a craze like ping-pong did, however much you boomed it in the press."

"Don't you, my lad? Well, you're wrong. If enough money was spent on it, it would be a craze all right enough. I'm open to bet on it if you make it worth my while."

"What sort of a game is it?"

"It's a lot of little cork 'orses pushed along by quicksilver. Real good game it is, too, and none of the 'orses can be 'got at.' If I put it on the market I shall call it 'Goodwood.'"

"You'll never make that into a craze, press or no press."

"Will you back your opinion?"

"I don't mind," replied Rumble, "for a small sum. But how are we going to decide whether it becomes a craze or not?"

"Small sum be sugared! Wot's the good of people like you and me talkin' of small sums? We'll make it a thousand. I'll bet you a thousand pounds that this day year 'Goodwood' is a popular craze. As for deciding it, Mr. Morkin here can be referee. We'll meet here and settle up, and the winner stands a feed. Is it on?"

"What does Mr. Morkin say? I'm quite willing."

"Oh! I'll referee if you like," laughed the broker. "We'd better put the conditions on paper, hadn't we?"

A memorandum of the bet was drawn up on a sheet of club notepaper, and the trio then separated.

Batcher lost no time in getting to work, and wrote at once to the inventor of "Goodwood," making an appointment. The inventor, whose name was Ellison, was a rather seedy-looking clerk. He expressed himself as being highly gratified and delighted when Batcher said that he would finance "Goodwood."

"See 'ere now," Batcher explained. "We'll have to turn the thing into a company. Is the patent fixed up?"

"Oh, yes!"

"Very well, then. We'll call the capital £1,000, and you shall 'ave £300 marked up to you for nothing. How's that?"

To this proposition Ellison demurred. He wanted £450, and was willing to pay for £100 of it in cash. Nothing would move him from this attitude, and negotiations were adjourned till next day. Batcher, during the interval, investigated the patent and found that it was very fully protected. There was absolutely no way of getting over it. Finally he agreed-to Ellison's terms.

Having settled this matter, though not nearly as much to his own advantage as he could have wished, Batcher at once began the business of putting "Good-wood" on the market and booming it. As the making of the boards was quite a simple affair he determined to manufacture them himself, and made arrangements with a cabinet-maker to turn them out. Cheap sets were to be sold at four shillings, and there were more elaborate ones ranging as high as a sovereign. The only expensive item was the quicksilver, and he soon found that the buying of even two or three hundred pounds of that metal was apt to send up the price of it considerably.

When several thousand sets of the game had been made and tested, and the boom was ready for launching, Batcher began to work the press. His own papers were full of paragraphs and advertisements of "Goodwood," and he also spent upwards of £1,000 in other forms of advertising.

In a wonderfully short space of time all the sets which had been made were sold, and the cabinet-maker had to take on half a dozen extra hands in order to cope with the increasing demand. It looked as if Batcher was going to make a very good thing out of it apart from the bet.

Soon, however, the price of quicksilver began to cause him serious anxiety. Since "Goodwood" had been introduced to the public the mercury market had been particularly buoyant. Mercury had gone up no less than two shillings a pound, and was still rising rapidly; so much so, indeed, that Batcher had to raise the prices in order to maintain a profit. The output of mercury that year was rather smaller than usual, and the few people who held a stock of it were not at all inclined to sell. The annual production of mercury all over the world is comparatively small—six or seven thousand tons perhaps—and even the small quantity which Batcher required was enough to upset the market. People began to speculate and gamble in mercury, though it was a one-sided gamble, as the "bulls" seemed to have it all their own way.

When the time for the decision of the bet drew near Batcher had spent considerably more than £1,000 out of his own pocket in advertising, and the price of mercury had very nearly doubled. As against the money spent in advertising, however, he had certainly won his bet, and the profits of the "Goodwood" Company were between £3,000 and £4,000; but for the unforeseen rise in mercury they would have been a great deal more.

On the anniversary of the day on which the bet had been made, Batcher, Rumble, and Morkin met again at the club. There was no need for Morkin to give a formal decision as to who had won, for Rumble had already made out a cheque, which he presented to Batcher with a polite bow.

"You've won," he said. "I won't trouble Mr. Morkin to talk; you've won. I didn't think the press could do half what has been done, and although I knew that the British public were fools, I never imagined they were such big ones."

Batcher winked.

"Many thanks," he said. "As a matter of fact, I've made a bit more than this out of it. Expenses ran to somewhere about £1,500 altogether, and my share of profits out of the game was £3,000 or so. If the chap who invented 'Goodwood' hadn't been so blamed greedy, I'd 'ave 'ad a bit more. He stuck out for nine-twentieths, and I 'ad to give it 'im. However, I'm not complaining, and there's a little more money in it yet, although I've stopped 'puffing' it. See you to-night for the feed. We'll try and make a bit of an 'ole in this cheque."

He hurried away.

"A wonderful man," remarked Morkin. "Fancy making £1,500 out of a silly game like 'Goodwood.'"

Rumble looked at the speaker with an excruciating squint.

"Why not?" he inquired. "I've made a bit out of it myself."

The broker laughed.

"You must have had a good deal to do with it, then," he said, "for you've got a dead loss of £1,000 to start your account on."

Rumble ordered another Marsala and Apollinaris—it was a form of refreshment of which he was particularly fond—and proceeded to explain.

"You see," he said—"you see, Ellison, the chap who invented 'Goodwood,' is one of my clerks. He brought the thing to me first of all, and I thought I saw a way of turning it into money. I gave him £50 down for it, and paid for the patenting. That cost another £25. Then I sent him to Batcher. I knew that Batcher could boom it if he liked, and to make a certainty of it I fixed up that little bet. Batcher turned the thing into a private company, capital £1,000 in one pound shares. Out of that Ellison got four-fifty, for which he paid £100. I let him have fifty for himself. Now my share of the profits on 'Goodwood' is somewhere near £1,500, so, in spite of losing the bet, I'm still a bit in. Besides that, most of the advertising has been done in Batcher's own papers. If I'd had to advertise it myself it would have cost me three times as much."

Morkin looked at him admiringly.

"I'm a fair hand at making money myself," he remarked, "but 'pon my word I'm a child at it compared to some of you people. Why, you were pretty nearly bound to come out on top in any case."

He made a rapid calculation on the back of an old envelope.

"As it is," he continued—"as it is, you've made £300, and more to come."

Rumble squinted at him more diabolically than ever.

"Three hundred? Oh! Only three hundred?"

"That's all I make it. Of course you'll get a little more before the craze dies out altogether."

"If you put a couple of noughts on to that three hundred, Mr. Morkin, you won't be so far off the mark."

"I don't understand."

"You see, it's this way. That silly game was only a small part of the business. I'd been messing about with the metal markets a lot this time last year, and it struck me that it wouldn't take much to send up mercury in the market anyhow. When Ellison brought me that game it just gave me the idea I wanted. I cornered all the mercury I could get hold of—it was cheap then—and got an option of futures in it. 'Goodwood' just gave it the proper fillip. Since Batcher set out to boom 'Goodwood' mercury has gone up over 50 per cent., and I've got rid of what I bought. I dare say I'm £30,000 to the good on it. So you see, I've done well out of old Batcher. First there's the £300 or so out of the game; then there's what I've made out of mercury; and finally there's a dinner to-night. That won't put anything in my pocket, to be sure, but it will do him in another fiver. Here's his health!"

IN looking back upon the past, as in looking down upon the dead, we are always just, and perhaps we have left far enough behind the days of which Mr. Frederick Moir Bussy speaks in his "Irish Conspiracies" (1) to be as dispassionate as we should be if his subject had been "Polish Conspiracies." Well, not quite, since sympathy with the Poles involves condemnation, not of ourselves, but of our natural enemies, the Russians.

> I du believe in Freedom's cause
> Es fur away ez Paris is;
> I love to see her stick her claws
> In them imfarnal Pharisees.

However, the days of which Mr. Moir Bussy treats are sufficiently far behind us for those who are to-day of Mr. Chamberlain's way of thinking to understand that statesman's point of view as he expressed it in the eighties:—"I do not believe that the great majority of Englishmen have the slightest conception of the system under which this free nation attempts to rule the sister country. It is a system which is founded on the bayonets of thirty thousand soldiers encamped permanently as in a hostile country." Perhaps even the Conservatives of to-day have come to recognise the truth of what their leader Mr. Balfour admitted in 1903:—"The Irish land system was intolerable and absurd; the worst in any civilised country in the world." I am taking these two quotations from Mr. Moir Bussy, who, though an Englishman with much of his countrymen's scorn for the Irish, has, as newspaper correspondent of a leading London journal, seen enough of the misery and misgovernment of Ireland in the eighties to understand at least the ferment of discontent which exploded in "Irish Conspiracies." His book opens with these experiences:—

> In Dublin, the capital of "The Sister Isle," within eight hours of the metropolis, I have seen the police smash the heads of the people and kick women and girls on the side-walk of the principal street; I have seen the soldiers of an English regiment bayonet unarmed men and boys by the score. I saw the Royal Irish Constabulary at Glenbeigh assist at the atrocious ceremony of pouring petroleum on the thatched roofs of peasant homesteads and setting light to it. . . . An old woman and a mere girl were done to death, and a posse of lads were peppered in the backs with lead because they had gathered to jeer a demonstration by the armed forces of the British Crown to coerce people in actual want of food to pay poor rates!

You hardly wonder that in those days Ireland was honeycombed with conspiracies; but that with which Mr. Moir Bussy solely concerns himself hatched out a crime which seemed to the English people so absolutely unprovoked as to be devilish—the murder of Lord Frederick Cavendish and Mr. Burke. The assassination of Lord Frederick was, so to say, an accident, as his assassins had no idea who the man was that lost his life in an attempt to defend Mr. Burke; while Mr. Burke himself was marked down for slaughter because he was the Castle.

> No matter how beneficent the personal leanings and the intentions of the Ministers appointed in England, the influence and the powers of persuasion of Mr. Burke were such that the others counted for nothing after the first few weeks of office. Changes of Government and the coming and going of parties made no appreciable difference. The fixed policy of misrule and coercion would continue to flourish.

It must be remembered that it is not an irresponsible newspaper correspondent who is speaking for the most part in this book, but the chief of the Irish detectives, Mr. John Mallon. "Any and every statement the book contains relating to Irish criminology," says Mr. Moir Bussy, "that can offer a semblance of justification for the contents-bill headlines, 'Revelations,' even in the smallest type, is based upon facts supplied to me by John Mallon." The "Invincible" revelations, therefore, are all those of the man who entrapped and hanged the chief assassins, and they seem to be far more reliable than those of Sir Robert Anderson, who is more than once convicted in this very volume of boastful misstatements. The ways of detectives are necessarily foul, as Mr. Moir Bussy had good reason to know. He and a leading London journalist "received the confession of a policeman who, acting on the instructions of a superior official, in arresting a man believed to be a dynamite conspirator, put into his pocket a couple of bombs, so that he should be 'taken red-handed,' and that there should be no mistake about his conviction—which conviction most assuredly followed." Mr. Mallon was at least above such criminal "detection" of crime. But I cannot understand his disavowal at page 150 of the volume of having in no way brought about the Queen's evidence of that despicable miscreant, James Carey, when chapter XI. is devoted to a description of the elaborate and ingenious mental rack devised and personally superintended by Mr. Mallon, on which Carey was stretched till his evidence was extorted from him. The whole story of this conspiracy is distressing, and at times even disgusting reading up to the execution of Kelly—a lad of sixteen—after a third trial. Mr. Mallon, when consulted by Lord Spencer, who was against subjecting the boy to the ordeal of a third trial, gave against him the casting vote which led to his execution. However, there is no doubt that those who enjoyed reading recently in the Strand Magazine the account of Plehve's assassination by one of his assassins will delight in the revelations of Mr. Mallon. Even they, though, may kick occasionally at Mr. Moir Bussy's journalistic style, which occasionally breaks out into such felicities as:—"The possibilities of paragraphs arose to his mental vision with the ponderous import of Babylonian bricks;" or, as "The halo of a patriot has often dissolved into the cap of alien servitude."

Mr. Fenn's "Thirty-five Years in the Divorce Court" (2) confirms my impression that the dreariest of all jokes are those of the Law Courts. Here is really an average specimen of the "good stories" in Mr. Fenn's recollections:—Mr. Justice Bargrave Deane, at an anniversary dinner, said there were two law clerks who on their holiday took the names of two judges, and one was overheard saying to the other, "What shall we do, old chap, to-night?" to which the other replied, "Let's go to the Hall by the Sea!" Where is the point? The best retort recorded in the volume is that of Mr. Dickens to Mr. Willis, who had the bad taste to suggest that the novelist's son had not inherited his father's ability. Mr. Dickens, in reply, said that his learned friend's allusion to his father recalled to him the speech (reversed) of the carrier in "David Copperfield":—"Barkis is willin'"—"Willis is barkin'!" However, the mot which will appeal most to the public was uttered unconsciously by a cabby. "Drive me to the Courts of Justice," cried Lord Coleridge to him. "Courts of Justice? Where be they?" "What! You, a London cabman, don't know where the Law Courts are?" "Oh, the Law Courts; but you said 'Courts of Justice.'"

It is surprising how interesting even to those who, like me, are not interested in gamekeeping Mr. Nicholas Everitt has contrived to make his game-preserver's legal handbook, "Shots from a Lawyer's Gun" (3). He illustrates all his cases by stories apt and interesting, and sometimes as amusing as the admirable drawings with which the Punch artist, Mr. Wallace MacKay, has enlivened the volume. What struck me most in reading it was the democratic progress we have made since the days when a judge contended, not only that man-traps and spring-guns were lawful, but that they could be lawfully laid to shoot or trap mere trespassers without even the warning of a notice-board!

George Meredith's posthumous tale "Celt and Saxon" (4) is as tantalising as Corporal Trim's "King of Bohemia and his Seven Castles," since you are led on for three hundred pages in the hope of a story which never gets under way. It is all talk, and chiefly talk illustrative of the differences between Celt and Saxon—of course, to the disadvantage of John Bull; but then it is Meredithian talk, always brilliant and often bewildering in its brilliance. Sometimes, indeed, in exasperation with your own dull failure to master the meaning of a cryptic Meredithian utterance, you feel inclined to apply to his style the often-quoted epigram on the use of language:—

> Where Nature's end of language is declined
> And men talk only to conceal their mind

Mr. David Bone's "The Brassbounder" (5) is an extraordinarily vivid description of the experiences of an apprentice on board a sailing ship. Mr. Bone takes the ordinary adventures of a sailing ship round the Horn to 'Frisco and home, inventing nothing and exaggerating nothing, but fascinating your interest by the sheer force, fulness, and picturesqueness of his descriptions of characters and incidents. Mr. Bone, if this is his first book, ought to go far indeed. Very different in subject and treatment, though we are still at sea, is Mr. Louis Tracy's "The Stowaway" (6), a heroine who conceals herself on board a ship in order to save it from the wreck to which it was foredoomed by its villainous owner, her uncle. It is, however, when she gets to South America and is swept into the vortex of one of the ever-recurring revolutions on that continent that things begin really to hum. "The Stowaway," in a word, hurries you breathless from scene to scene of wildly melodramatic adventures.

One is uncertain whether to be grateful or the reverse to Mr. George D. Abraham for his "Mountain Adventures at Home and Abroad" (Methuen, 7s. 6d. net), whether the pleasure of reading his spirited account of adventures amidst rocky fastnesses is not more than outweighed by the nostalgia for the pure air of the mountain tops which his narrative awakens. Mr. Abraham is an enthusiast for his own particular sport, as every one who has ever trod the venturesome path with rope and ice-axe seems to become. He has fought with difficulties on the crags of Cumberland, North Wales, and Scotland, as well as in the Alps, and to the question as to whether it is worth the risk, he replies "Yes! a thousand times!" That is the answer which the born mountaineer cannot fail to give, and perhaps the best tribute to Mr. Abraham's book is the fact that after reading it the answer is from him quite inevitable, the only one he could make. Chiefly the book is for those who though they have never undertaken any actual climbing yet realise its fascinations and take an interest in the sport; but all the same there is much useful information garnered in its pages, and Mr. Abraham's fellow mountaineers will thoroughly enjoy the stories of his personal experiences under all sorts of conditions of weather, and on all kinds of ascents.

There can be no question as to the gratitude which will be felt towards another adventurer amongst the mountains. Mr. C. L. Freeston, in providing a motoring guide to a hundred mountain passes in "The High-Roads of the Alps" (Kegan Paul, 10s. 6d. net) has performed a very useful service indeed. "The science of touring in any country, but pre-eminently in Alpine regions," says Mr. Freeston, "is to know as much as may be in advance where practical data are concerned, and to leave as little as possible to chance in that respect." Mr. Freeston has collected the data necessary, the book indeed represents the sum of seventeen years' experience of the Alps, and it should prove invaluable to those who wish to explore the mountain roads of France, Italy, Switzerland, and Tyrol. Particularly does Mr. Freeston call attention to the latter country and its excellent motoring roads. After a motoring experience of eleven countries he has no hesitation in saying that Tyrol should be the objective of every automobilist who travels on the Continent at all. What with its itineraries, maps, and many photographs, in fact in its detail in every essential point, the book should make the way easy for many a motorist who has not yet realised the delight of touring on the really high roads.

To the always interesting "Wisdom of the East" series of little books, edited by Mr. Cranmer-Byng and Dr. Kapadia, volume after volume is being added with accession of interest. One of the latest is "The Singing Caravan," by Henry Baerlein (Murray, 2s. net). Modestly it only claims to contain some echoes of Arabian poetry. In effect it is a poet's analysis of the birth and growth of the poetry of a race rather than of a nation. It is individual, as everything Mr. Baerlein writes, and those who remember the author's "Divan of Abu'l-ala" will not fail to add this volume to their collection. Arabian literature promises, by the way, to be strongly represented in this series, for Mr. Murray announces the addition to it of a translation of Al Ghazzali's masterpiece, "The Alchemy of Happiness." Renan has credited Al Ghazzali with "the most original mind among Arabian philosophers," but his work is practically unknown to English readers.

Another item of interest which Mr. Murray announces is that the Life of Lord Beaconsfield, upon which Mr. W. F. Monypenny has been for some years past at work, has now reached a stage that justifies publication of the first volume. This will cover the period from Disraeli's birth in 1804 to his entry into Parliament in 1837, and will be published in the autumn, to be followed at short and regular intervals by the remaining volumes.

Another volume of striking political interest promised for the forthcoming autumn is a monograph of John Bright, by Mr. R. Barry O'Brien. The book is divided into sections, each being devoted to the story of Bright's action on some particular subject, though the personal traits and characteristics with which Mr. O'Brien is so well qualified to deal owing to his acquaintance with the great commoner are by no means overlooked. The book is also to have an "appreciation" by Mr. Birrell, and will be published by Messrs. Smith, Elder and Co. Another biography of interest announced by the same firm is that of Mario, the great singer, by her daughter, Mrs. Godfrey Pearse, and Mr. Frank Hird.

In spite of the fact that it is for its unwritten things that Paris is chiefly beloved, each season never fails to produce a book which lays claim to be considered a book of revelations. Messrs. Constable announce the latest. "Pages from the Book of Paris," by Claude C. Washburn and Lester G. Hornby, we are told may be described as "the soul of Paris in word and picture," while "the charming whimsical style of the author, together with the forty etchings and drawings by the artist, whose delicate interpretative art has earned him the name of "the successor of Whistler," it is claimed, reproduce the personality of Paris as it has never been done before. As author and artist are Americans, and also youthful, the latter claims may possibly be justified.

ART.

EXHIBITION WEAKNESSES.

THE recent fire at the Brussels Exhibition brings home very strongly the fact that the customary thanks to lenders of works of art, and particularly of pictures, are no idle compliments but are very really merited. It is indeed only a complete lack of imagination, a desire for public appreciation or a very genuine public spirit which can be the cause of the readiness to lend priceless works to the average exhibition. For pictures, while more easily destroyed perhaps than almost any other commodity, are equally irreplaceable in case of accident. To potential sellers of a Rokeby Venus or a Duchess of Milan, insurance money is no doubt some compensation for damage incurred; to those, however, who do not think of pictures in pounds-per-square-inch—and I am not referring only to the private collector—damage to a great picture can never be made good, and something has been lost for ever both to the collector and to the world generally.

To shut the stable door after the steed is stolen is of little use unless there are other steeds to be protected. As this is fortunately the case after the Brussels fire, I think both private and public collectors will think twice before again exposing their treasures, not only to the ordinary risks, but also to the dangers of transport by sea and land. At the same time, no collection—and the greater the collection the greater the possibility of damage—can be entirely secured against risk, even if it never leaves the spot upon which it is centralised. The present fire-proofing of the National Gallery, for instance, and the presumably complete organisation of the fire arrangements probably make the collection as safe as is mortally possible of any public collection. At the same time, the very gathering together upon the same spot of so many treasures almost invites wholesale disaster, whether by fire, water, invasion, revolution. The only way, indeed, to secure a maximum of safety for any public collection is by its decentralisation—that is, by its dispersal over the whole country instead of its segregation in Trafalgar Square or elsewhere.

The advantages of such a scheme indeed are not merely those of safety. At present those who profit by the institution of the National Gallery are chiefly copyists, foreigners, and loafers, none of whom have very much connection with the nation's art. The pictures, moreover, are bought theoretically for the public, with public money for public enjoyment. Now the average man who has spent the regulation day at the National Gallery will, an he speak the truth, hardly declare his enjoyment to be purely artistic. First and foremost is the pleasurable sense that he has achieved a headache in the cause of duty; secondly, perhaps, that of all the galleries through which he has passed he can still remember one or two special pictures; thirdly and finally, that if he has not understood much of what he has seen, his day's work will probably and eventually in some magical or mysterious way have a good effect upon him. Such form of appreciation is hardly the purpose and ideal of the average picture gallery. But really to enjoy pictures in a gallery is little short of impossible. For a picture, like a jewel, demands a setting which is impossible in the average gallery. Half the great Belgian pictures are to be seen, a few or even one at a time in church, monastery, or public building. And no one who has thus visited them will deny the difference between his impressions and those gleaned from the rows and rows of masterpieces torn from their surroundings and detracting from each other's qualities, which are to be seen in the public gallery. Enjoyment of pictures should be more or less spontaneous, and not wholly dependent upon a knowledge of history or technique. The fact that the average man does not in his heart enjoy pictures is due largely to the modern idea of culture, which is not to have enjoyed, but to have seen as many pictures as possible.

There seems to me no reason why, given certain conditions of safety, every place in England should not have a claim to some or one of the treasures now centralised in London. Nor would the greater difficulties of seeing them militate to their disadvantage, for it is notorious that you value most that which has put you to some trouble. The presence of a good picture or two in any of the smaller towns would make that town well worth a pilgrimage, and the very fact of the pilgrimage would conduce towards a proper study and appreciation of the picture. At the little town of Abingdon, in Berkshire, for instance, the presence of a Gainsborough and other pictures in the council chamber is a constant source of attraction; and in the stately room, with its panelled walls, I have rarely seen pictures to greater advantage. Further, as I have said, the material risks of centralisation would be avoided, or at least greatly minimised.

All these are considerations, which will certainly not appeal to the official or even to the Londoner himself. The joy of acquisition and accumulation is apt to prejudice against the public good, while no monopolist really enjoys abandoning his monopoly. At the same time there is much to be said for it from the point of view of all the rest of these islands, if only that it would completely obviate such catastrophes as nearly happened at the Brussels fire.

MUSIC.

SHOULD CRITICS BE EXPERTS?

SHOULD a critic be a trained musician? It is a question which is often asked, and to find the right answer is not quite so easy as might be supposed. "Of course he should be," will be the reply probably of most composers and other professional musicians. Yet reflection suggests that expert musicianship of the sort assumed may easily prove a delusion and a snare. Naturally, a critic must possess a certain amount of knowledge of this kind, and in particular his acquaintance with musical literature—meaning, of course, music itself, not books about music—can hardly be too extensive. But apart from this, he can easily know too much in the way of pure technique and theory. Doubtless this ought not to be the case. Nothing sounds more reasonable than that the critic cannot know too much about his own subject. The difficulty is, unfortunately, that expert knowledge and the critical faculty do not necessarily go together—nay, are even in a sense antagonistic.

Granted this need not be so. Wagner, Schumann, and Berlioz were none the less excellent as critics because they were also great composers. But they were all musical revolutionaries, and as such were in no danger of having their judgments warped by an overweening regard for rules and precedents. In the case of smaller men, however, too much expert knowledge may easily be an absolute hindrance to sound criticism, since it almost inevitably tends to set up a purely artificial standard of judgment based on the observance of the accepted rules rather than one resulting from independent and unbiassed consideration of the music itself. Illustrations of this are writ large in the history of music. Nearly every great composer has found his bitterest opponents at the outset not so much among the public at large as among the cognoscenti. It was the quidnuncs rather than the multitude who failed to appreciate Wagner at first. They saw merely that what they had been taught to regard as the accepted rules had been broken, and it was enough to damn him in their eyes. The multitude, less learned, were bothered in no such way, so had much less difficulty in arriving at a right conclusion.

James Davison, the famous critic of the Times, was quite a good musician, but it was precisely for this reason that he made such appalling blunders where new and unfamiliar music was concerned. On this account it was that he wrote of Chopin: "The entire works of Chopin present a motley series of ranting hyperbole and excruciating cacophony." His opinion of Schumann was equally unfavourable, and that of Wagner even more so. All he could see in each of these cases was that the established laws had been broken, and such being the case only one verdict was possible. Here is the danger, therefore, of knowing too much, and this is why the critic, possessed of the requisite knowledge of the art in the widest sense, but unhampered by purely technical learning, will often arrive at sounder judgments than one who looks at matters from the standpoint of the pedagogue.

Of course, there must be technical knowledge up to a point. One does not want precisely what Mr. Bernard Shaw has called the "Rosherville view of the Beethoven symphony"—though experience teaches that even absolutely uncultivated listeners are far more capable of appreciating the good things of music than is generally supposed. In all the arts it is much the same. Whether in painting, literature, or music the "expert" and the obscurantist are too often convertible terms. "Where's your brown tree?" was the old art critic's watchword; and if the brown tree was not there the picture was condemned forthwith. Of somewhat the same type was the famous master at Eton who rejoiced the heart of Herbert Spencer by his exhortation to the youth committed to his care: "If you do not take more pains, how can you ever expect to write good longs and shorts? If you do not write good longs and shorts, how can you ever become a man of taste? If you are not a man of taste, how can you ever hope to be of use in the world?" This was the rule of the brown tree applied in the field of education—as others misguidedly seek to apply it still in the field of music. Are there not purists to this day who shake their heads over the errors of Bach's fugues, as there are literary critics of a certain school who deplore the looseness of Shakespeare's blank verse? So true it is that the letter killeth.

The most enjoyable concerts given in London—I refer, of course, to the Promenades—are now in full swing once more, and the musical amateur confined to the metropolis in the dog days may find consolation. Programmes and performances alike are substantially the same as in former years, which is tantamount to saying that both are about as good as the most exacting could desire. Wagner, as usual, looms large, and at present there is small sign of that great master's popularity waning—still less of any successor arising to dispute his claims. Strauss gets a curiously poor show in this year's scheme, and one may be forgiven, perhaps, for wishing that he had been a little more generously represented. But Mr. Wood doubtless knows best what his faithful straw-hatted supporters require. Possibly, also, financial considerations enter into the matter to some extent. Still, it would be pleasant if one could hear all of the symphonic poems at least once in the course of the season. Elgar's symphony is another work whose absence from this year's prospectus will be regretted by many. As regards novelties, sixteen new works are included in the scheme, and of these no fewer than twelve are from native pens.

The full prospectus of Mr. Beecham's autumn season at Covent Garden, which has now been issued, makes mention of even a greater number of works than were originally announced. True to his faith in novelties, he promises any number of works unfamiliar to Londoners, of which Strauss's "Salome" will doubtless prove the most sensational (the Censor permitting); many will be glad to make acquaintance also with "Guntram," from the same pen, while D'Albert's "Tiefland," Tchaikowsky's "Pique Dame," Dukas' "Ariane et Barbe-Bleu," Leroux' "Le Chemineau," and "Les Troyens" of Berlioz will all have their interest also. Then Mr. Clutsam's "A Summer Night" is to be repeated, while other native works promised are Delius' "Koanga" and Holbroke's "Dylan." Older masters represented in the list range from Mozart to Wagner (the works promised including those two sadly neglected masterpieces "The Magic Flute" and "Fidelio"), the singers comprise some very eminent names, native and foreign, while the prices will be little above those of ordinary theatre rates.

The success of the Sunday evening concerts initiated by the Amalgamated Musicians' Union at the Coliseum two years ago has induced the union to give a similar series of concerts during the forthcoming season at the Queen's Hall. The season will open on September 4, when Mr. Coleridge-Taylor will conduct his "Hiawatha's Wedding Feast" with the British Symphony Orchestra and Choir. During the season, which extends to June, 1911, many interesting and novel works are to be produced. The management make a point of the fact that these Sunday concerts are arranged so as not to necessitate the performers working seven days a week. The musicians are paid a fixed fee for their services. Every member is free to please himself whether he plays or not. Any profit realised at the end of the season goes to the union's benevolent fund.

Mr. Manners is not alone with his little scheme, recently so widely noticed, for encouraging opera in the provinces. Mr. Walter van Noorden, the very capable managing director of the Carl Rosa organisation, has his plan, like General Trochu, too. This is less ambitious than Mr. Manners', but possibly more easy to carry out:—

> I propose to distribute in every town I go to 150 free seats, the condition being that the applicant must be over 17 years of age and have never seen a grand opera. After witnessing the performance I shall ask for an honest impression of it and whether it was enjoyed. We may by these means succeed in creating a little interest amongst the youthful classes who usually patronise music halls, melodrama or picture shows, and I shall be very thankful if we can gradually succeed in inculcating a love of music in this class.

The idea seems quite a good one. The Carl Rosa company, by the way, opens a three weeks metropolitan tour at the Kennington Theatre on Monday next, in the course of which they will give Goldmark's opera, "The Queen of Sheba," for the first time in London, and also Verdi's "La Forza del Destino."

THE THEATRES.

DANCING AND THE PALACE.

THE Palace Theatre is full of memories to me. It does not seem so very long since it was opened, with a great flourish of trumpets, as the Royal English Opera House, and we crowded there to hear Sir Arthur Sullivan's "Ivanhoe." Then when that splendidly ambitious operatic scheme came to grief how well I remember walking by it with a friend, who remarked, sapiently, "I wonder how many years it will be before that place is a music hall." Well, it was not so many years as even he imagined before it became transmogrified, but it was a long while before it occupied the proud position among variety theatres that it holds now. For some considerable time it was rather a melancholy place in which to spend a happy evening, but now, I suppose, there is no house in London which is more constantly full, and this, too, with an audience which is not to be distinguished from that at any other first-class West End theatre. And when one comes to reflect what it is, apart from admirable management, that has made the Palace a society resort, I should be inclined to say that it is dancing. There has been a tremendous boom in dancing lately, and in consequence the best talent from all parts of the world has been put before us. Some time since London bowed down before Spanish dancers. Carmencita was the idol we all worshipped. She was fêted at private functions, and I recollect dancing with her. Artists went mad over her. Sargent painted her, and her followers were many. They were all much alike. They attitudinised, postured, clacked their castanets, and stamped their feet, and were undoubtedly picturesque; but Spanish dancing, however effective, is not the last word in the art, as we have seen lately. The change in taste, I should think, began with Mlle. Genée, whose radiant little personality fascinated audiences at the Empire for so long. She is a consummate artist, and let us hope she may soon return. But the Palace management was quick to see that the public was ready for something new in dancing, and so electrified London with Maud Allan.

I am far from suggesting that Miss Allan was, or is, a great dancer, or even a dancer at all in the correct sense of the word, but she was something new. She lent herself to the interpretation of music in a novel way, and her curious individuality made her the rage, although Miss Isadora Duncan, who had been doing practically the same thing with far greater technical skill for years, had left audiences cold. Of some of Miss Allan's successors it is kinder to say nothing. They occasionally fell into the error of imagining that nudity symbolised genius. When Society went to the Palace to see Lady Constance Stewart-Richardson, for instance, it did not go to see dancing, but to see Lady Constance. By this time, however, audiences had learned too much to be quite so easily taken in, and Lady Constance fell rather flat. To succeed this we had a taste of French quality. All the wild Apache dances emanated originally from Paris, and in these, however brutal, barbarous, and sometimes disgusting they may have been, you had great technical skill. La Polaire, lithe, sinuous, and to me rather repulsive, is yet a great little dancer. There was an abandon about her which possibly shocked some staid English people who are, or pretend to be, a little horrified occasionally at seeing anything which they consider "too French," but I should like to see a few English dancers with as great a mastery of their art as Polaire. Then there came the Russian wave, which emanated in Anna Pavlova and Michael Mordkin. We have had Russian dancers of sorts before—mostly gentlemen in top boots, who were amazingly agile—but I wonder why we were so long in discovering that it is in Russia apparently that dancing has reached its highest development. In Russia the art of dancing, I gather, stands on a par with the arts of singing, acting, and playing. It is an honoured profession and an Anna Pavlova stands on a par with a Sarah Bernhardt or a Caruso. And why not? I can scarcely imagine any one deriving greater pleasure from hearing or seeing any of the three named than from seeing Mlle. Pavlova. On the last night of her appearance I was watching her with Ellen Terry, and I am sure from what she said that the greatest English actress of our time realised that she was watching as great an artist in another line as herself. Now Mlle. Pavlova has departed, and I am wondering what Mr. Butt is going to give us next. Is there any other country which can produce another such genius? Russia, Denmark, and France have all given us wonderful dancers, but I suppose it is too much to expect that England could produce one, and I wonder why? Little Miss Phyllis Bedells at the Empire is charming, but will she ever become a Pavlova? What is that we lack? Is it temperament or training?

For the moment we have to be content at the Palace with another Frenchwoman, Mlle. Regina Badet, but she leaves me ill-content. She acts a pretty story, in which the figure of a young dancer on a broken bas-relief comes to life and woos a stony, and stony-hearted, Apollo on a pedestal; but Mlle. Badet is not a great dancer, and the whole thing is meretricious. Though she poses well, and is handsome to look upon, I was most entertained by the synopsis of her little act which was given away in the programme. I always wonder who writes these beautifully poetic effusions. Surely, says this slip, Myrto—that is the name of the lady in the bas-relief—will attain her love by the charm of her dances, "by their various and strange graces, alternately happy, languishing, and lascivious." She holds up flowers in a chalice as if to say "See! these purple flowers are the bloom of my heart, I poured it out for you, and it is to you I dedicate this libation." And then, as I said before, when she finds that the god is not taking any bloom she subsides into her bas-relief once more, broken-hearted, and our scribe finishes his commentary with these beautiful lines: "It is the phantasy of a poet's brain. It is a human story, too. For have not women loved men who have forgotten how to love?" Quite so.

For another item in the programme, namely, the diving Venus "Myrma," the stage has been very ingeniously arranged. A huge tank has been let into it, and the surroundings show a pretty country riverside scene with a rustic bridge. It is from this that Miss Myrma dives, showing you a dozen different ways of sploshing into a pool. A mirror let into the stage at the back enables you to see exactly what is happening. The lady is quite attractive and graceful, but there is nothing very exhilarating in watching a comely young woman perpetually tumbling into a tank and climbing out again, while I rather question the taste of showing her undressing in a transparent tent. The new American tramp comedian, however, is a very diverting person, while particularly worth hearing is the famous Victor Abaza Balalaika Orchestra. These mandolin players are really remarkable, and the effect is delightful. What has become, by the way, of the Kinemacolor "From Bud to Blossom" pictures? I went to see them again the other night and found them missing.

I am very glad to hear that Miss Julia Neilson has now entirely recovered from her recent serious illness, and a splendid reception awaited her and Mr. Fred Terry on the opening night of their tour at Leeds. Mr. William Devereux's capital romance, "Henry of Navarre," was the play chosen, and both popular favourites played with all their old skill and charm. After this tour Mr. Terry and Miss Neilson go to America.

SPORT.

THE official list of fixtures for 1911 has been severely criticised as to several of the arrangements which the Stewards of the Jockey Club have sanctioned. Liverpool is allowed ten days, which appears to be considered too much. I believe that the Liverpool Summer Meeting would really benefit by being cut down to two days, as the fields are not such as to justify its being dragged over three days. Liverpool, however, is not a meeting to be interfered with, as the principal events (both weight-for-age stakes and handicaps) are most generously endowed, and everything possible has been done to improve the character of the racing. Nine days are given to Manchester, and the class of the racing at this meeting has greatly deteriorated. The Whitsuntide fixture ought long ago to have been cut down to three days. There are very few meetings indeed which can now be extended over four days with satisfactory results. The strangest feature in the list is the appropriation of nine days to such a paltry meeting as Ayr, for half that number would have amply sufficed. Sandown Park and Kempton Park have each nine days, and then come Hurst Park, Newbury, Derby, and Windsor each with eight. I do not know why Newbury should not be allowed the same number of days as Liverpool and Manchester. There is no meeting in the country which is better managed in all respects, but it has never been granted either a bank holiday fixture or a three days' meeting. The fact is that the arrangement of the annual list of fixtures is largely tainted with jobbery and favouritism. The Sandown Park meeting can command powerful interest, so it has this year obtained the coveted fixture on the August Bank Holiday, which had previously been given to Hurst Park and Kempton Park alternately. The new practice of having a meeting at some popular place on Saturdays in the heavy weeks of the season (Epsom, Ascot, Goodwood, Doncaster, etc.) is odious to all concerned, as it is most inconvenient to trainers and jockeys. One would suppose that after four days of racing at a big meeting, most reasonable people would be glad to find the Saturdays left free.

The late Duke of Westminster would have been horrified at the very idea of his colours being seen in £100 plates, but his grandson has been running several horses in these trumpery races of late. It shows the nonsense of "systems" of breeding when some of the best-bred racers in England are found to be of no use except in such events. The two-year-old The Cellarer, by St. Simon out of Beaker, was beaten for a £100 plate at Birmingham; and another event of the same class was won by Mangalmi (3 yrs.), half-sister, by William the Third, to Flying Fox. A Maiden Plate of £100 was carried off by Matiyela (3 yrs.), by Chaleureux out of the famous Throstle, winner of the St. Leger, and dam of Missel Thrush. The Duke of Westminster would be better advised to get rid of all his racers which are below a certain standard of form. The late Duke and the late Lord Falmouth followed the sound system of unsparingly weeding their racing studs, keeping in training only animals which were able to win weight-for-age races of a certain class, and this is a policy which saves a deal of trouble, besides being economical in the long run. Bad horses are just as expensive as good ones to keep in training—a fact which many owners fail to realise.

It is generally rumoured that Winkipop will be withdrawn from the St. Leger in order that she may be kept fresh for the Park Hill Stakes two days later. I do not expect that Winkipop will be struck out of the St. Leger, as it will obviously be prudent to leave the filly in until the last moment in case of anything happening to the favourites. I do not believe in any case that Winkipop could stay the St. Leger course. Mr. Astor's filly has three engagements at Newmarket in the autumn —the Triennial, the Oaks, and the Royal Stakes, and she appears likely to win two of these races. Some exceedingly foolish comments have been made upon Winkipop's race at Stockton. The distance was one mile and a-quarter, and I would vastly like to know how any rational being can suppose that anything more has been discovered concerning Winkipop's stamina than was known a week ago. An animal defeats a few wretched crocks in a race of ten furlongs, and the public are at once assured that "she is bound to finish in the first flight" in one of the great races of the year, the distance being an extra half-mile, with a much more severe course, and opponents of incomparably superior class.

There is a general wish that the present arrangements as to breeding allowances should be reformed in accordance with common sense. It is preposterous that a horse which has won large sums in stakes should still be permitted to claim a breeding allowance, the result being that the race in which the animal is engaged is usually spoilt. Rock Sand enjoyed the benefit of an allowance of 6 lb. or 9 lb. after he had won the classic stakes of his year. If Bayardo had been left in for the Jockey Club Stakes he would have been allowed 6 lb., and this horse has taken an allowance in several races. Several years ago it was proposed in Truth that a horse which had won an adequate sum in stakes (say £2,000) should ipso facto be deprived of any breeding allowance which may have been claimed for him, and a winner of £1,000 allowed only half his original allowance. The suggestion was adopted at Sandown Park with most salutary results. This clause will prevent Lemberg from claiming a 4 lb. allowance if he starts for the Sandown Foal Stakes at the Autumn Meeting, and Sunder could actually have claimed 17 lb., Yellow Slave would have been allowed 12 lb., and Charles O'Malley 15 lb. The Stewards of the Jockey Club would do well to propose a similar rule for all stakes in which there are breeding allowances, and the passing of it would have the wholesome result of putting an end to any tricks in connection with the advertising of stallion's fees, as to which there has been some angry complaints during the last few years.

I see that 20 to 1 is considered by some sporting writers to be a fair price to accept about Bronzino for the St. Leger. This must certainly be written by doodles for noodles. The fact is that if there were any genuine market on the St. Leger the proper odds against Bronzino would be about 40 to 1; whilst Greenback and Swynford would stand at a considerably longer price than is stated to have been accepted about them. If Neil Gow, who has met with an accident, and Lemberg are fit and well at Doncaster on the day of the race the followers of any of the other starters will be able to invest on very much more profitable terms than now appears likely. Charles O'Malley can certainly stay the course, as he easily achieved the severe two miles at Ascot, and the performances at that meeting of Greenback and Swynford indicated stamina. All the St. Leger horses appear to be undergoing very easy training, and not one of them has been galloping over the distance of the race. When certain of them have been sent really fast gallops over one mile and three-quarters it is probable that a lack of stamina will be discovered.

If Cargill gets through a preparation all right it is very likely that he will win a handicap during the "back-end" period of the season, and he must not be overlooked if he is started for any race of this class in November.

Electra is looking well and going well, and she has evidently benefited very much by the long rest which she has enjoyed since the Newmarket First July Meeting. Electra ought to win a good race before the season is over, but the Cambridgeshire, or the Prince Edward Handicap, or the Duke of York Stakes will suit her much better than the Cesarewitch, although she has been entered for that handicap.

I was amused to read recently in one of the papers the complacent announcement that the two-year-olds of the season are considered to be an unusually good lot. This opinion must come from some old apple woman, for all persons with any practical knowledge of the subject are of the opinion that the two-year-olds, with two or three exceptions, are an exceedingly moderate lot. They seem to be all heads and tails together. Seaforth has not been beaten, and he may prove himself a flier, but there are good judges who expect that Mr. McCalmont's colt will be defeated by Pietri if the pair meet in the Middle Park Plate, and quite probably by Cellini also. Manwolf is a smart colt, but no importance can be attached to his defeat of Nerestan at Manchester, as the Newmarket colt was left at the post. If Seaforth wins the Middle Park Plate we shall have the best two-year-old of the season without an engagement in the Derby. One hears nothing of any dark animals which are likely to create a surprise at Newmarket in the autumn. Some good judges assert that Manwolf is the best two-year-old of the season, but very often the northern form comes out badly when the Yorkshire fliers come to meet the southern cracks. Manwolf's most important engagement as a three-year-old is the North Derby at Newcastle, and he is racing at Derby and at Stockton. If this colt turns out a stayer his owner can go for the Ascot Vase and the Gold Cup, and if he is deficient in stamina he will have a chance of meeting some good horses in the Coronation Cup at Epsom.

There is said to have been a "record" attendance at Stockton, but the racing was of very little interest. There were thirty acceptances for the Wynyard Plate, the most important two-year-old stake at the meeting, but there were only three starters, and odds of 6 to 1 were betted on Canvas Back, for which the race was considered the certainty which it turned out to be. A very poor lot of two-year-olds came out for the Hardwicke Stakes. The winner was the filly by Melton out of Spiteful, who had been beaten the other day at Haydock Park by Dutch China. The best race at the meeting was the Great Northern Leger, for which Willonyx was a very hot favourite, and Charlemont claimed a lot of money. There was a most exciting finish, and Cardinal Beaufort won by a neck from Willonyx, who had appeared to have the race in hand, and he was thought to have been unlucky to lose. The most valuable race at Stockton was the Durham County Produce Plate of £1,000, for which thirty horses had been left in, but there were only four starters, and there was no interest in the event, as odds of 10 to 1 were laid on Winkipop, who won in a canter from her dreadfully common opponents.

Waterwillow and Dutch China were both well backed for the August Plate at Hurst Park on Friday. Mr. A. Bailey's colt won in a canter, although he was giving a lot of weight to all the other starters. He is evidently a smart colt, and he will win plenty of races if he is judiciously placed. There were twenty-five acceptances for the Lennox Plate of £1,500, and the race was apparently a certainty for Charles O'Malley, who had a breeding allowance of 6 lbs., but he did not start. It is somewhat ominous that the Netheravon colt should have missed this good engagement, as the race was at his mercy. Maid of Corinth was a general tip, and odds of 5 to 2 were betted on her in a field of four, but Sir William Bass's mare was very cleverly beaten by Merry Jack, whose price was 6 to 1. Maid of Corinth is altogether unworthy of her grand pedigree—by Cyllene out of Sceptre—and she is another example of the truth that breeding is a pure lottery.

Next week there will be racing at Bath, Derby, and Kempton Park. There was a huge acceptance for the Champion Breeders' Foal Stakes at Derby, including Seaforth, Manwolf, Prince Palatine, Lindoiya, St. Anton, filly by Grey Leg out of Spinning Jenny, Night Rider, Persephone, and Mary Carmichael. There are the materials for a race of the very highest interest, and I expect that Seaforth will win if he starts. There is a large list for the Breeders' St. Leger, including Charles O'Malley, Ulster King, Placidus, and Greenback, but this race cannot be touched pending the York running. Dutch China may win the Hairington Plate. There are twenty-one acceptances for the Peveril of the Peak Plate, of £1,000, which is the first of the autumn handicaps. General's Pride may win. The acceptances have not yet been declared for the Devonshire Nursery of £500, for which race there are fifty-eighty entries. Courage may win if he "goes for" this race.

THE TRAINING OF POLO PONIES.

It is satisfactory to know that the America Cup Recovery Fund is buying some of the best ponies that can be procured, but it is very doubtful whether the supreme importance—in fact, the absolute necessity—of bringing their mounts to the utmost perfection of handiness is fully realised as yet by English polo players. Everybody knows that Mr. Whitney's magnificent team practised unremittingly for many weary months before they considered themselves sufficiently perfect to start for England. Endless columns have been written in praise of their splendid combination and their accurate hitting, and there is no denying that they did excel the English teams in these respects. But there is another department of the game—and that the most important of all—in which they were equally superior—namely, the training of their ponies. Not only was the American stud first-class in speed and quality, but in point of training it was far above the English standard. It is to this branch of the game, even more than the acquisition of the best possible mounts, that attention should be devoted during the winter months if a British team is to turn the tables upon the Americans.

After watching all the principal matches and tournaments this year one is forced to the conclusion that many and many a match is lost solely because the players are mounted on imperfectly trained animals. Our first-class ponies are not generally wanting on the score of pluck and willingness. They bump one another gallantly, gallop straight as a die on the ball, and are quite indifferent to the waving of sticks or the noisy scramble of the game. But that is the limit of their efficiency in the majority of cases. As soon as they are called upon for a sudden stop or a sharp turn they are defeated, and one observes with consternation the hope of his side galloping in a circle to get to the ball, while his opponent, whose nimble mount has stopped on his hocks, whipped round like a knife, and jumped off again, canters away at his ease, and strikes a goal. It is obvious that when the ball, after travelling in one direction, is suddenly hit back in another, the pony which pulls up dead on his haunches in a couple of lengths, nips round, and is into his stride again immediately, must gain many yards on his inadequately educated adversary, whose only method of turning is to gallop round in a circle. Until a team leaves for America mounted on ponies schooled to perfection in this respect it is impossible to view with much hope any effort to re-establish England as the leading polo country.

On off-hunting days one is often at a loss for an occupation, and what more enjoyable way of spending the morning than in the improvement of one's ponies—especially with such an object in view as the recovery of the International Cup? Half an hour on each of these days would be quite sufficient. All that is wanted is a sharp canter to take the first freshness out of them, half a dozen sudden stops from the gallop, followed each time by a short "reinback" to bring the hocks right underneath them, then a sharp turn still on the hocks (to right and left alternately to ensure equal handiness on either side), and jump them off again into a gallop. Repeat these movements until the "reinback" can be omitted, and the whole feat performed with the utmost rapidity, and our ponies will come up at the beginning of the season next April as quick and handy as any America can produce. The importance of teaching ponies to turn on their hocks—that is to say using their hindlegs as a pivot—cannot be too strongly insisted upon. Not only does it ensure their being absolutely collected on completion of a turn, and therefore in a position to strike off into a gallop at once; but, as can be seen in a moment, a pony turning on his hocks gains a whole length over one which turns on his forehand—i.e., by pivoting on his forelegs. It is remarkable what a large percentage of ponies playing in first-class polo are addicted to the latter fault; although no animal should be considered up to tournament form until he instinctively turns on his hocks. Here, then, is a task for keen polo players during the winter. And if the instruction be carefully carried out, and a team so mounted visits America next summer, our friends across "the pond" will have all their work cut out to beat it.

THE ZAMBESI—CRICKET—YACHTING.

And so Arnst, the New Zealander, has beaten Barry, the Londoner, for the sculling championship of the world on the waters of the Zambesi. The event fascinated me. I confess I did not care a rap which won. Naturally I should have preferred to see the Thames man win. But here was a race cleanly managed all through, rowed on a stretch of water practically flumen incognitum a generation ago. Within the last ten years our Imperial enterprise with train and telegraph has opened up the country to civilisation. A sport—professional sculling—that badly needed revivifying and cleansed was brought to life again and purified on the waters of equatorial Africa, where met the scullers, men of the same Empire, from the island homes of the Northern and Southern hemispheres. If this race had been held under such circumstances after such dramatic developments by pioneers of civilisation from any other nation our press would have preached on the wake-up text through the silly season ad nauseam. But, ruled as we are by a hysterical press that loves to shock the nerves of mindless folk with scares of war and tales of natural decrepitude and decay, we see nothing in the lesson of the Zambesi. The men who rule there we know not. How the country is policed, how it is administered, how law and order is maintained we care not. The president of this year's Cambridge crew has gone out there to an administrative office. No one knew or heeded his departure. He has turned up to coach a colonial crew on the Zambesi and to judge in the sculling match. What a nation we should think ourselves if we were not ourselves. How we should admire ourselves and strenuously try to copy ourselves. And we are told by these cheap-jack shockers of the new press to imitate another nation. That nation could not have developed Central Africa or held a sculling match on the Zambesi.

With regard to the race, Arnst, who is a stone heavier than Barry, seems to have had the pace of his opponent, and to have rowed him to a standstill. Barry sculled with pluck. Those who say Barry would have won on the Thames had better back their opinions by putting up the money. It is an ungenerous comment, and is as though one should say that if they had sculled in the mid-Atlantic the result would have been different. Arnst would probably win anywhere. But Barry has helped to rehabilitate English sculling. There are, I feel confident, men in this country who can be picked out and trained to wrest the sculling championship from the Colonials and bring it back once again to the Thames if funds and opportunity are provided. But those who were interested in the sport became disgusted with those who competed, and their support is not easily recovered. Yet, thanks to Barry, a brighter era is coming for the professional sculler. The old atmosphere of suspicion has been dispelled.

Mr. A. J. Balfour never reads the papers. At all events he said so, and presumably he had no time to do so when he was Prime Minister. During the last few years he has had more time at his disposal. He may have contracted the vile habit so valuable to a journal's circulation during that period. Yet it were well that umpires of cricket matches followed his practice—on cricket questions, at all events. Apparently they do not do so, wherefore they would appear to be liable to be led away by that claptrap journalistic logic that passes amongst the ordinarily educated for erudition. Only the other day, at Maidstone, the bowler sent down a no-ball, and the Northampton batsman ran out and was stumped and was given not out. At once clever folk in the press said he ought to have been given run out. But why? He was not running. Apparently an umpire has been captivated by this twaddle, and so at Bath, under similar circumstances, Cox, of Sussex, was given run out. On precisely the same principle, if a bowler sends down a no-ball, the batsman runs out of his crease and misses it, and the ball hits his stumps, he is run out. Likewise also if he is out of his crease and plays on. In fact, the no-ball becomes a sacred thing. It had best be left alone. It may be that the umpire has argued from the ridiculous decision of the M.C.C. that the batsman at whom the bowler is bowling may have his wicket thrown down by the bowler and be run out if he is out of his crease. But surely the duty of the umpire is under such circumstances to call "no ball." The batsman may stand where he likes to the bowling. There is no rule which says he must stand in his crease. If he leaves his crease he may be liable to penalties, but under no conceivable rule of cricket are his stumps, when he is meeting the bowling, converted into cocoanuts or Aunt Sallies, to be chucked at. The M.C.C. had better exercise its intelligence and revise the ruling, or cricket will be going to Bath or blazes with a vengeance.

Dr. W. G. Grace has retired to the pleasant ways of suburban cricket. Last Saturday week he was playing against Blackheath for Eltham at the Rectory Field. There was a good crowd present to see him play, and play he did. The light was wretched. In first-class cricket there would have been an appeal against the light. But Saturday afternoon players are made of sterner stuff. They have not to think of averages or percentages in county championship tables. Wherefore old W. G. stayed on. He started slowly, but as the light got worse he hit freely. Just on the stroke of seven Eltham won, and W. G. was not out 62, and he got a reception from the spectators and players of both teams which was as enthusiastic as any he got for his big scores in his younger days.

On the day before W. G.'s performance at Catford another veteran had played finely. Mr. W. L. Lagden is in his seventieth year. For fifty years he has been in Glyn's Bank. He was playing for Glyn's Bank against the Birkbeck team, for whom E. C. Kirk, the Surrey player, was playing. He stopped in for over an hour and made 22 runs, playing Kirk's bowling admirably. He is the uncle of R. O. Lagden, the Oxford blue. Cricket is their pleasant family failing. In the London banks are to be found many men who, if they had had the time and means, would have developed into first-class cricketers. Amongst their numbers are men who as youngsters are drafted off from good public schools, owing to dire necessity, into banks without prospects or hopes of advancement. In America such youngsters would not hesitate to turn professional baseball players. They would not lose caste. They would make some capital and start in business. But in this country such a youngster would be morally and socially lost. We are so very particular, especially in the middle class. And a bank is so respectable, so certain in payment, and to a certain class of persons offers attractions that are almost aristocratic. The parents of such folk are tradesmen, and—well, trade is so bourgeois. It is far better to aspire to be a manager of a provincial bank than to run the emporium of the neighbourhood. The one can play in local cricket, tennis, and golf, and the other cannot do so. Sport and respectability control the situation.

Jessop scored a fairly merry century for Gloucestershire against Surrey. Smith was not so much in evidence as a wicket-taker, and one wonders what the Surrey Committee will do. However, before they decide to discard him they had better look at his analysis, and see how he kept Jessop quiet. Hitch took several wickets, and as a hitter out-Jessoped Jessop. The last 43 runs were made in a quarter of an hour, Hitch making 32 of them. In an innings of 48 not out he hit six fours and two sixes. It looks as though he will be the necessary hitter in the next England team, and he can field. Kent has secured the championship, and certainly has the finest selection and variety of cricketers in any county. Last week they added to their list F. H. Knott, who has just left Tonbridge, and goes up to B.N.C., where Hooman, Carr, and Rashleigh came from, next term. He promptly made a century against Worcester. Clearly Kent has all the luck of the game. Last week, at Dover, they won the toss in both matches. The rain came and gave them all the advantage of the pitch. In their last nine matches only that against Somerset lasted into the third day. At Dover the receipts for the Hants and Worcester matches each reached £300. What a lesson to Brighton and the Hove ground! Somerset does play a plucky game. Against Sussex P. R. Johnson, who is captaining the team, was not out in both innings with scores of 98 and 96. An Old Etonian, he plays the game and bats in the traditional Eton style. Rain upset Middlesex and then defeated Yorkshire at Sheffield. The scores were peculiar. Middlesex made 72 and 311, and Yorkshire 199 and 61. The aged J. T. Hearne took twelve wickets for 65 runs, but the bowling record of the week goes to J. Iremonger for Notts against Essex. He found a worn-out patch, and he was unplayable. Essex tumbled out for 44 runs, and he bowled ninety balls for 7 runs and six wickets. Prodigious!

weather, and some fine racing. Unfortunately, White Heather met with another mishap. She broke her mainsheet racing, and the steel boom buckled against the rigging. The repairs made her miss the first race at Plymouth, and while being towed into the Sound she collided with a target and damaged her keel. At Weymouth Gauntlet and Bloodhound collided badly, and the latter was disabled. The ordinary rules of navigation should preclude such collisions, and without casting any reflections on the skippers in this race, one cannot help feeling that there is a lot of solid sense in the observations of the Field's correspondent on the necessity of obeying the customs of the sea and resorting to a protest rather than risk collision because one yacht may have violated those customs.

BEFORE AND AFTER.

(A Golfer's Idyll.)

I met her on the links at Rye;
  Her swing was free, her aim was true;
  She had as good a follow-through
As ever gladdened golfer's eye;
  She "downed" the writer "three and two."
I met her on the links at Rye.

I met her on the links at Rye.
  She drove a straight and lengthy ball;
  She never sliced or hooked at all,
Or sent her brassie shots awry;
  Nor once she topped the globule small,
However cuppy was the lie.

I met her on the links at Rye;
  My handicap is four from scratch;
  And yet the damsel won the match,
For off the ball I took my eye
  In frequent efforts hers to catch.
I met her on the links at Rye.

I met her on the links at Rye.
  With me there often still she plays;
  Now on the ball I fix my gaze;
It thrills me not to catch her eye,
  As in those blessed single days
I met her on the links at Rye.

MOTORS AND MOTORING.

A TRIAL OF RESILIENT WHEELS?

An R.A.C. trial of resilient wheels has been suggested, and the notion is quite a good one. Any number of wheels of this type have been invented, but the difficulty is to know exactly how they answer in practice. The makers proclaim them all that could be desired, and users even testify in glowing terms to their merits; yet experts are not usually encouraging on the subject. "I wouldn't touch them if I were you," is generally their attitude. Car manufacturers and the trade in general lean the same way, and hint at increased wear and tear and consequent enhanced repair bills. Tyre firms say ditto still more emphatically, and beseech the owner to stick to the pneumatic by all that he holds dear. On top of all is the high price of all of these wheels and the cost of converting. What wonder, therefore, that they are not more widely adopted? Yet a really efficient resilient wheel would be a boon of the first magnitude. Good as pneumatic tyres are today, they are still the bane of motoring. A non-punctureable tyre which was equally efficient, or nearly so, would be an unspeakable gain. Of course, a wheel of this type could never give quite the same results as pneumatics, for no conceivable mechanical arrangement can hope to provide the same resiliency as compressed air. But many would cheerfully make a little sacrifice in this respect in exchange for absolute immunity from possible trouble on the road. Many resilient wheels at present on the market claim to meet all reasonable requirements.

One of the best-known wheels of the type in question is the Lynton, the principle of which is decidedly ingenious. Briefly, the invention is a metal wheel composed of two discs, one rigidly attached to the hub while the other by means of a form of ball joint is allowed to rock to a certain extent upon the hub. As a result the outer disc is continuously in play to a slight extent in correspondence with the inequalities of the road. The actual tread of the wheel consists of solid rubber blocks held in place between the beads of the two discs, and as this rubber tread is depressed it is enabled to expand laterally by means of the rocking motion of the movable disc. It is maintained, indeed, that the construction of the wheel not only allows for more displacement than the usual solid tyre, but that the combined movement of tyre and rim laterally is greater even than that of most pneumatics, and consequently that the largest obstructions can be absorbed without causing any vertical lift of the wheel. At the same time the rocking action of the rim in saving the tyre from "pounding" naturally lengthens the life of the rubber. It is important to bear in mind in this connection that rubber is only to a very slight extent compressible. The cushioning effect obtained from it is caused, that is to say, mainly by displacement, and not by actual compression. Hence, therefore, the limited amount of yield afforded in the case of an ordinary solid tyre.

A wheel of another order which may be classed as resilient, though the principle is quite different, is that known as the "K.T." This has at first sight the appearance of an ordinary metal rim covered with large cylindrical studs or knobs of solid rubber. In reality, however, the said studs are not solid, but hollow. As a consequence when they take the weight of the car the air within them, ordinarily at atmospheric pressure, is much further compressed—to the extent of several atmospheres, it is declared—thus affording a pneumatic effect and giving an amount of resiliency almost equal to that of ordinary pneumatics. At the same time the possibility of punctures and breakdowns is completely done away with, they require no more attention than solid tyres, and at the same time, it is said, are practically proof against skidding and side-slipping. The method by which the studs are fastened to the wheel is very ingenious, and the whole device is well worth attention.

Then there is Pfleumatic, a new kind of tyre filling which has attracted much attention of late. Though it is solid in the sense that it may be punctured with impunity, it affords at the same time a remarkable amount of resiliency owing to the fact that some three-fifths of its bulk consist of innumerable air-cells, which furnish, under pressure, all the elasticity of compressed air. It has the advantage, too, over previous compositions of the same order in being introduced direct into the ordinary cover without the use of tubes, the cost of which is thus saved. In the result the appearance of the tyre is indistinguishable from that of the pneumatics. This was the substance which recently underwent a very successful R.A.C. test. The certificate declared that so far as comfort went it was impossible to tell the difference between pfleumatics and pneumatics —a very remarkable tribute

Another interesting tyre claiming similar advantages is that which has been brought out more recently by Captain H. H. P. Deasy. In this case a three-ribbed solid rubber tread is supported at both sides on a series of solid rubber circular elastic cushions. Between the bottom of the rubber tread and the wheel rim there is a large amount of clearance, permitting, therefore, considerable give in the tyre itself under pressure resulting from inequalities of the road. In the case of this, however, and all other devices of the same order, the only means of ascertaining definitely its value is a practical test on the road, and for this reason, therefore, such a trial as that which has been suggested under R.A.C. auspices would certainly be useful.

Those who have been frightened by the alarmist predictions as to American competition and American dumping which have been put forth so freely of late may be advised to read some sensible remarks on this subject of Mr. F. R. Simms, as reported in last week's Autocar. Mr. Simms has recently returned from an extensive tour throughout the States, one of the chief objects of which was to ascertain the real facts of the case, and he has come to the conclusion that the American manufacturers will have all their work cut out for years to come in supplying the home market. Among other things he remarks:—

> Every farmer possesses, or did possess, a buggy, and it is the ambition of almost every farmer to displace his buggy by a motor car. Now, there are 1,400,000 buggies sold every year in America, and it will be clear to you that to overtake this market, even in part, will keep the American motor-car manufacturer busy for some time to come.

This is a time of the year when, touring in unfamiliar districts, one is brought up at every turn by sign-posting vagaries and shortcomings. Certainly, they manage these things better abroad. The French and German direction posts are very different from ours. Since the local authorities are apparently hopeless, perhaps the Road Board may see its way to give a little attention to the matter and work out a uniform system for general adoption. It could hardly undertake a more useful piece of work.

WOMAN.

THE BLESSED GIFT OF HUMOUR.

THAT women have no sense of humour is a notion which is very widely spread in universities, bachelor clubs, and other places where women do not enter. Like many notions of the sort—although, according to facts, it is out of date—it persists in general credence, perhaps owing to the respect due to its old age. When dealing with such a complicated machine as humanity it is highly convenient to be able to find a label which applies to a large section of the world, and we are very loth to take the label off, even when circumstances have changed, just as parents are loth to realise that their children are grown up.

The humourless man or woman is usually one who has never observed the world objectively, nor visualised it apart from his or her position in it. Undiluted domesticity could never evoke humour in the same way that life does in broader paths. In the days of the extremely domestic woman—the woman who was a perfect housewife but could not see that there was anything else that she might be in addition—it was very rare to find a woman with humour. Such women never saw life; it was hidden from them. If they had glimpses of it they were shocked. All their qualities became nervous and exaggerated till their modesty verged on immodesty and their refinement on vulgarity. One may study them and their curious mixture of characteristics in all Miss Austen's novels. Miss Austen was an outstanding exception to the rule she portrayed. But a harder life has induced a robuster sense of proportion, and ladies do not now swoon in Bath because they hear of a crime in London.

An innate sense of the humorous is a blessing for which we can never be too thankful. It is a defence to the sensitive and a weapon to the earnest; it is a sword in the hand of the reformer, and an extremely efficient walking-stick, umbrella, and sunshade rolled in one to the everyday worker. There are very few people without it, but there are numbers in whom it has not yet been aroused, and these unfortunates ought to be taken in hand by a Committee for the Salvation of the Unenlightened. To go into a big woman's club to-day and watch the faces of the members as they talk is instructive. There is a gleam in nearly all of them which can only come from humour. It is the duty of every modern woman, like Merlin, to follow this gleam, for, in itself a delight, it is a beneficent power, and will give what women still frequently lack—a sense of proportion.

It is best cultivated in youth, and forms a valuable inheritance for any child, though too many smileless specimens of infancy seem to prove that parents neglect this portion of their education. I have seen a modern mother immensely amused at the precocious solemnity of her offspring. It certainly was amusing, but it was tragic, too. A child ought to be taught to laugh at itself before the world has a chance to teach it that lesson more roughly. Humour is a part of tragedy, and we ought to train ourselves to detect it. For it is a talisman as magical as any in a fairy story. And where so many are acquiring it almost necessarily from the nature of the lives they are living, it becomes still more a duty to arm ourselves and those dependent on us with the weapon which is already in the hands of the majority. To have lived and loved is not enough; we must also have laughed.

THE PREPARATORY SCHOOL.

In consequence of the modern view that the small boy is not necessarily a nerveless and hardened sinner, with no feelings beyond the dictates of his stomach, there is perhaps an over-inclination towards sentimentality in his education to-day. To send away a child of eight or nine from the care of those who most have his welfare at heart seems at first sight to savour somewhat of brutality. It may be asked also whether those who know him best should not, at that early age, have the opportunity of instilling into him the precepts supposed to be essential to his future well-being. Further, it may be argued, the foreigner by no means feels bound to adopt such drastic methods, and the majority of the well-educated French and Germans of to-day have been educated at a day-school, and thus under the additional supervision of their parents.

The chief point to consider in a boy's education is the particular educational ideal you wish to set before him. In this country, where the tie between husband and wife is perhaps on the whole stronger than that between parents and children, the parent is able to take a more unprejudiced view than is the case in either France or Germany. First and foremost he wishes his boy to be manly and independent; secondly, he wishes him to be exactly as are all other boys. Whereas his daughter may, up to a certain age, take almost any liberties with infantile conventions, "good form" or "bad form" rules a boy's life almost from the moment he can walk. It is this mania for uniformity which causes so many parents, even if unwillingly, to send away a boy at so early an age as eight or nine. It is the desire that he shall be just like other boys which causes them to forgo a good many of the advantages he might have gained at home by sending him to a preparatory school. It is the result of such training which in later life makes all-important the number of waistcoat buttons he does up, or guides him as to putting his hands in his pockets or leaving them out.

Now there is no doubt that a good many sensitive little boys suffer a good deal by being sent away thus early from home. A boy of any originality moreover is bound to find stiff and unyielding the scholastic and social mould for which his parents pay a hundred or so a year. Many parents also suffer a good deal of heart-searching in deciding in favour of so drastic a step, and sigh when they see their offspring "losing all the originality" which was presumed to be his. At the same time most of such parents have the public school ideal firmly ensconced in their hearts. Very often, too, the boy who has not been sent to a public school regrets it bitterly himself in later life. Rightly or wrongly, if a boy is to go to a public school, there is no doubt that the preparatory school is almost essential. I have known little boys who were prepared by a governess or by any school that happened to be handy so that they might enjoy for a little longer the advantages of the parental roof. But though, as a rule, they knew more than did the rest of their class, they did not know the right things; or, if they knew the right things, they did not know them in the right way. Latin taught at a preparatory school may be of the most limited quantity—it very often is; but Latin taught by a governess, however well, is not public-school Latin. As I have said, form is everything in a public school.

I am not at all sure that one of the chief advantages of the preparatory school is not the fact that the boys go there for most things beside work. This usually implies a greater attention to the domestic side—a by no means despicable asset—for instance, to such details as clean hands and faces, a certain standard of manners, and other such cub-licking. Then, too, from the very beginning a boy finds his level, and since, with present-day competition, preparatory schools are more often than not limited in size, he finds it under close supervision, which is likely to prevent some of the greater troubles of boys' schools. Finally, competition usually implies a good deal of attention to food, and excellent games also dazzle critical parents who would not, however, venture to criticise a public school, however bad.

The weak point of the preparatory school is usually the junior master. Questions of fees and competition combine to reduce his salary, with the result that he is not very often a first-class man. And to my mind a first-class man is as important for little boys as for big ones. At the same time, as the teaching is usually what is just sufficient for public school purposes, this is less serious than might otherwise be the case. And as long as the public school ideal persists both over the day-school or the co-ed. school, so long, indeed, will the preparatory school be almost a necessity.

MRS. A.'S DIARY.

Wednesday.—There is something very rotten in the state of commercial London. Oh, cursed spite, that I was not born to set it right! Perhaps a little carefully considered criticism may serve to ameliorate the condition of the rich and misguided, who might imagine that this is the time of year when the travelling coat would be deemed worthy of the consideration of the authorities.

Joan, in despair this morning, and with some tact, engaged me as an experienced cicerone who might be relied upon to guide her towards some comfortable, blue serge or tweed ready-to-wear elegance while en route for Etretat.

We wandered through the length and breadth of the metropolis in vain, though one or two miserable examples of the ulster family, relics of the July sacrifices, were offered to us in alpaca. The only alternatives were some fearsome black and white checked garments, hemmed with vivid emerald green, and the nondescript tweed Raglan definitely labelled for the sportswoman, which Joan is not. Why does not some intelligent person supply the wants of others in August with long satin-lined serge coats with braid on the collar and some braided buttons, and sleeves cut in one with the shoulder seam, and big pockets? Not a ghost of such a luxury was to be discovered, while the assistants seemed to resent the demand, explaining with a vexatious unanimity and a superfluousness to match that the sales were over, and the autumn stock was not in. They were not at all repentant of their fashionable failings, but definitely hurt that we should expect to find any modes of merit at this season.

Nita's brown hat.

Of course, Joan called me unreasonable when I diatribed violently against these sins of the English costume caterer, while she consoled herself by deciding that the far, far better way was to buy her coat in Paris.

Thursday.—More hurried shopping with Joan, who, like Gilbert's policemen, does not go. Travelling-hat purveyors we found not quite so wanting in a sense of duty as the coat-buyers. The newest model—and this we met at Jay's—might be dedicated to the service of the motor, train, or boat. It has a folded crown of raven blue soft satin and a kilted rim of white petersham. Very new is that white petersham! But the idiosyncrasy of the moment is to have velvet-trimmed hats with linen frocks. We interviewed with some satisfaction an example labelled "for casino wear," bearing a small transparent white lace brim curved to turn up at one side and a full crown of black velvet. However, the completest novelty is a crazy brimmed crinoline decked with a small cluster of woollen flowers, and a woollen lancer plume. This produced a prompt return to my usual placidity of temper, so that I permitted Joan to take me into a deserted palm garden to tea in company with her daughter, just returned from school.

Alas! the poor child—and her poor aunt! She threatens to become a poet. My family affection, great as it is, will not be able to endure the fulfilment of this tragedy. I found Joan even proud of her progeny's achievements, and I had to feign a terrible headache and an incipient toothache and many other physical miseries before I could escape a recitation on the spot. When I had successfully averted this danger I fell in with her proposition that I should help to buy the girl a bathing dress; and after all she does not swim very well.

Bathing-dresses have charms this season, the latest notion being to make them of cashmere with soutache embroidery, a good exception to the rule being in blue alpaca trimmed with a black and white diagonal stripe with a red braid badge of courage intervening in narrow lines. We encountered coquettish specimens in black satin and black taffetas, new plaid silk caps with rosettes over each ear, and other caps of mignonette green, and some worthy wraps of towelling dyed to match these with borders of contrasting hues, contrived to the decorative degree in the kimono shape of our insatiable desire.

Later I was lured to the Palace and a subsequent supper, which interested me the more because I was pledged to conceal its component parts.

It was one-thirty of the clock to-morrow morning when I came home to realise that my dwelling bears a dismantled and a melancholy air; locked trunks are on two of the landings, holland covers are on the best chairs, and newspapers embrace my favourite pictures. It appears I am bound to start on a holiday I am not needing to improve my health, which is completely satisfactory.

Saturday.—Joan has really gone, and a postcard announces her safe conduct, and that she approves Etretat because it is so foreign, so full of English and Americans. She proposes to talk of golf and bathing and to play cards at the casino; she finds the clothes more sporting than elegant, and she has met an old friend who insisted upon introducing her to a few resident French. These expect her to be interested in local topics, of which she is ignorant, vehemently discussed in a language she does not understand. Even Joan's Paradise may have its serpent—or perhaps only its Adam. She was looking very young and quite nice when we parted on Thursday.

Monday.—I am duly settled at Felixstowe, accompanied by Nita, just now wearing a new brown serge skirt and Russian coat, belted with patent leather, and crowned with a dome-shaped brown hat outspread with shaded wings enmeshed with brown chiffon. The wind is blowing in its wild old East Coast way; the feminine world is enwrapped in knitted coats and caps, the grey variety being especially noticeable. I am enraged by the receipt of a few lines from an itinerant intimate who has sought the Scilly Isles, and found the sun there. He writes from St. Mary's: "This is the most ideal, unique, fascinating archipelago I know, and the Atlantic is quite a dear."

If I only knew the name of the sad grey waters in front of me just now I'd enthusiastically anathematise them for their melancholy sluggishness.

The croquet players have come in their numbers, and Nita threatens to compete in the tournament. Her pluck is more remarkable than her prowess, and I must see to it that her skirts and her hat at least can bear defeat with becoming grace. Mallets are no longer worn over the left shoulder, and from games I have witnessed I glean that there is many a slip between a hoop and its clip.

The hotel contains only three women deeply imbued with the importance of being well dressed. A mulberry-hued ninon tunic dress, hemmed with soft satin, transparently "chiffoned" over cream lace up to a slender throat, is a conspicuous evening success. A black satin bathing dress, completed with black satin double-rosetted cap, silk stockings, and satin boots, is a morning triumph; and a young matron reveals the advantage of simplicity in a black, closely fitted cachemire de soie, which she wears nightly with an emerald-green scarf bound neatly round her guinea-gold locks. The multitude golfs; the minority sits on the beach and bathes from tents.

The children shrink
On the briny brink,

and the futility of parental authority (sic) is paramount to the idlest observer.

In the hall we suffer music gladly, though an old friend I re-welcomed here confides to me he knows no difference between "God save the weasel" and "pop goes the King."

Jane B.—Small hats with high crowns draped round with soft ribbon, and bearing kilted brims, could be worn either for travelling or motoring, and these are very light in weight. The veil is a most useful addition, and should be of chiffon for choice. Dark blue or brown veils are becoming, and mole-grey may also be placed on the same list.

Elixi.—You could alter the coat by a narrow long collar of Paisley cotton bordered with the grey braid. Face the fronts right the way down with this Paisley, and wear beneath it a Paisley blouse veiled with grey ninon. If the coat be very long cut it to reach well below the hips, and I guarantee the general effect will be new and unrecognisable.

Grey Ladies.—There are three kinds of knitted coats popular—wool, mercerised silk, and real silk; the last cost about five guineas in the best quality. Purple and light grey are the best colours for wear.

WORK AND PLAY.

The funeral service for Florence Nightingale in St. Paul's was particularly impressive by reason of the colour provided by the uniforms of the nurses in the congregation. It gave an air of hope to what is usually a mournful sight, and a scarlet cape here and there was absolutely triumphant in effect. The grateful brightness was carried out by the singing of Miss Nightingale's favourite hymn—that sweet and cheery melody, "The King of Love my Shepherd is." It was impossible not to think how much these serried ranks of nurses meant, assembled at this lady's funeral. But for her they would not be in existence.

Florence Nightingale was the remarkable daughter of a remarkable father. She was born in 1820, long before any one had suggested that women ought to be educated, or were even educatable, to coin a word. Yet her father gave her the same education he had had himself, differing in no particular from his own University curriculum. Thus she was a classical scholar, a mathematician, a linguist, and a woman accustomed to think for herself. At a time when Darwin was considered almost as an emissary of the powers of darkness she examined and adopted his theories. Her education could not give her the wonderful native power of organisation she possessed, but it undoubtedly gave her the mental poise through which she was able to exercise it to the full.

It is significant of our age that the Lady Chapel of the new Liverpool Cathedral should be a memorial of the ministry of women. The subjects of the windows of the apse are the Annunciation, the Mother and the Child with the Magi, and the Presentation. Through the other windows run the words of the Magnificat, and in the apsidal windows are also portrayed Eve tempted, Eve in adoration, Eve as the mother of mankind, while below are some of the holy women of the Old and New Testaments—Hannah, Ruth, Sarah, Elizabeth, the prophetess Anna, and Mary of Bethany. The windows on the north side contain the women saints of England, Scotland, Ireland, and Wales, and those on the south side the female saints of the Prayer Book Calendar. The roll is completed with the names of twenty-one women of the present times who have loyally striven to follow in the footsteps of the women of blessed memory, these windows being given by members of the Girls' Friendly Society in the diocese. The idea is as beautiful in conception as it is nobly carried out.

* * * * * *

The employment of girl telegraphists instead of men by the Great Central Railway has caused some stir, particularly in Manchester, where the Clerks' Association is strongly objecting, on the ground that the change is made in the cause of economy, and simply to cut down salaries. A girl operator begins at 5s. a week, and the maximum she earns is £1 a week. This is a matter for the women's trade unions to look into. There does not seem to be much in the contention that these women work for pocket-money, because the work is hard and involves physical strain; but 5s. a week is less than any woman ought to receive for her whole time, and £1 is not a very handsome maximum for an expert. Some day women will understand the absolute necessity for a firm stand on the subject of payment, but till they take co-operative action the evil will continue.

* * * * * *

In reference to the discontinuance of the Englishwoman's Review, there was mentioned in this column recently a proposal to supply the gap with a yearly record of women's work. Surely those who contemplate the issue of the new volume must have momentarily lost sight of the fact that this field is pretty adequately covered by the "Englishwoman's Year-Book," edited by Miss Mitton, and published for many years by Messrs. A. and C. Black at the moderate price of 2s. 6d. If all women interested in the "things that matter" were to support the already existing book, it would probably be possible to secure further expansion and would be far better than starting a new publication.

* * * * * *

The achievement of Mrs. E. W. Chapman in regaining at Bisley the world's rifle record for women should greatly inspire the women's rifle clubs, which have become so numerous. Mrs. Chapman held the record from April 8 until August 6 with a score of 99, when Miss Ellen Seaton scored 100 out of a possible 105. Mrs. Chapman has now come to her own again with the fine score of 103 out of a possible 105—a score which included 19 bull's-eyes. Mrs. Chapman shot under the usual conditions for the King's Prize. Miss Ellen Seaton, although defeated, compiled a score of 99—the score which held the record until she herself eclipsed it a few weeks ago.

At this season of the year one has frequent opportunities of noticing how few women have the slightest knowledge of the art of swimming. There are, of course, exceptions to the rule, but they are few in number. The hopeless floundering of the majority of women who bathe in public at the seaside is a ludicrous spectacle, but at the same time rather sad. One cannot help thinking what a pity it is that swimming does not receive as much attention at girls' schools as hockey. Such a healthy and beautiful exercise deserves to be encouraged at every opportunity, whether girls are at school or at home. It comes very easily to girls, perhaps more so than to boys, and as a sport and a pastime it is one in which women can reach quite as high a degree of proficiency as men.

LETTER FROM MADGE.

Dearest Amy,—We were present at a very pleasant and interesting little function at the Botanic Gardens on Saturday, the inauguration of the Caravan Health Crusade, which is intended to convert the nation from the many errors of its way in matters hygienic. There were some doctors and many nurses assembled, and a very conspicuous object was the caravan itself, a real showman's cart painted black. Why black? was the first question that arose. Black looks funereal, or like a prison van (commonly called Black Maria), and black shows every speck of mud. Black attracts the heat of the sun and looks abject when tear-marked by a shower. Then why on earth black?

To that caravan behold us enter and view the two bunks for the crusading gentlemen who are to promulgate the gospel of health and shed light upon the problems of sanitation throughout the land. We peered into everything, into the fittings disposed round the walls for the economising of space, into the locker filled with brand-new saucepans and frying-pans, and we looked at the cooking-stove (oil) on which the crusaders are to prepare their meals. A Primus stood by, and we recognised it as a friend to tea in the open, but one of the caravaneers had formed a very different opinion, and gave it us in flaming words. A tent is part of the equipment, and also a cinematograph wherewith to illustrate the lectures on wrong ways and right ways of doing things. Two horses draw the van, and the two gentlemen who are to perform the initial journey are each to tend one horse and compete in the effort to bring back his special animal the better of the two.

In a room of the Botanic Gardens Club we were shown some of the biograph pictures, and listened to a short explanation by Dr Murray Leslie. It was all very interesting. We were shown a baby being washed, and felt very sorry for the baby. It was kicking and screaming all the time. It had hated it very much, and evidently the nurse had been rushed in time by the necessities of the films which were recording her movements. The baby was not even powdered, and it seemed to be invested in a superfluous number of clothes, its wretched head hanging down all the time. Yes, we felt very sorry for that baby, and I have no doubt that many of the mothers to be instructed could show a far better way of washing and dressing an infant.

Miss Lena Ashwell baptised the caravan, breaking a decanter of water against the side, and christening it Aurora. Immediately a Union Jack was run up and very cleverly unfurled and the undertaking was all ready for a start. If it does but one-hundredth part of what it hopes to do it will even then be well worth while. It is to preach open windows, fresh air, and cleanliness, the gospel according to Hygeia.

Is there anything more convenient in a small way than a pen that is always ready for use, takes up hardly any room, and makes the best of the user's caligraphy? I have often envied the persons who, when wishing to make a note of an address or some other bit of information, whip out a pen in a moment from some hiding-place, unmuzzle it, jot down what they want to remember, muzzle it again, and stow it away, all in less time than it takes to describe the process. The self-filling stylo and the fountain pen have now replaced the pencil and the pencil-case almost completely. It looks quite dowdy to produce one, even if the little bit of lead be lodged in a golden case.

Realising these facts in my own slow way, I determined to supersede mine own familiar pencil (it seldom possessed a satisfactory point, always either too fine or too blunt) by something better up to date; so, with Jim for my guide (there could not be a better), acquired two separate treasures, with which, used alternately, in order that you may judge of both, I am writing this letter to you. One is the W H S self-filling stylo pen, the other the W H S self-filling fountain pen. I cannot decide as yet which I like better. With both the pace is delightfully easy, and for those who like to skim swiftly over the paper and indite the thoughts as fast as they frame themselves in words this is a very fine quality in a pen. The process of filling is perfectly simple, and there is not the smallest risk of leakage. The price of both stylo and pen is astonishingly low as compared with others. It is but 3s. 9d., and Jim says he paid half-a-guinea for his, and does not like it so well. W H S, by the way, stands for W. H. Smith and Son, of bookstall fame.

Sosia has just run in to tell me of a delightful tour in Syria, Palestine, and Egypt she and Arthur are going to have. It really sounds ideal. It is under the management of Thos. Cook and Son. The tour includes visits to Paris, Naples, Athens, Constantinople, Damascus, Nazareth, Jerusalem (where the visitors will have an opportunity of attending the consecration service of the enlargement of St. George's Collegiate Church on All Saints' Day), Cairo, the Pyramids, and many other very interesting places. The itinerary starts with October 4, concluding on November 17, when the conductor returns to London. Autumn tours in the East are growing in favour. They form such an attractive supplement to the usual Continental trip, and in the coming tour arrangements have been made to accomplish the whole distance by rail or private carriages, horse-riding having been found very fatiguing by members of former trips unaccustomed to this form of locomotion. There is to be no camping, either, hotels having been arranged for. The members of the party ought to have a very good time. They will not have to rough it in any way. The fare is £100 each person, and this includes first-class fares, good hotel accommodation, and food on board Mediterranean steamers and all landing and re-embarking expenses, transfers between stations and hotels, etc., also all carriage drives mentioned in the itinerary, and free conveyance of 60 lbs. of baggage for each person.

Sosia brought a little book of the tour with her, and I see by it that for wearing in the East moderately light Scotch tweed is recommended for men, and for women warm woollen costumes and strong boots or shoes, also a strong umbrella. Every one is advised to take a waterproof.

Clare sends me the following from Dublin:—

Dearest Madge,—Only next week, owing to circumstances, can you hear of the glories of the Horse Show Week. As these same glories are such long-standing traditions, we have no reason to fear a change for the worse in them, but quite otherwise. However, like the weather prophets of this season, it is well to practise reticence in prophecy.

Crowds of arriving visitors were the feature, last week, throughout the country, and a general influx of guests into the big houses, not only in the neighbourhood of Dublin, but in the distant counties, which motors have brought within reach of the capital. Lord and Lady Iveagh settled at Farmleigh in the beginning of the week, Lord and Lady Ardilaun have been at St. Anne's, Clontarf, for some months. Lord Ardilaun has a busy time at this season, as he is the President of the Royal Dublin Society and takes the position actively. There is usually a large "house party" at St. Anne's, as at Farmleigh, for the week. Unlike so many wealthy property owners in the country, the Guinnesses have never neglected their duties as Irishmen to Ireland.

Sir Horace Plunkett, in the midst of his industrial activities, and the controversies and difficulties inseparable from them in Ireland, has been, throughout the month, dispensing hospitality in old Irish fashion at Kilteragh, Foxrock. The house, a piled building of decidedly irregular architecture, was built by Sir Horace when head of "the Department." It dominates Foxrock and the adjoining Leopardstown, suggesting in its glaring whiteness the "White House" of the "President." Amongst the visitors at Kilteragh this week are Mr. Gerald and Lady Betty Balfour. Mr. G. Balfour's Chief Secretaryship is almost forgotten here now; he is chiefly remembered as the Chief Secretary who did not "kill Home Rule by kindness." A system which might be likened to that of bestowing pretty smiles on a hungry man who is entitled to a solid meal.

Lady Betty Balfour attended a Woman's Suffrage meeting under Lady Arnott's presidency during the week, and was the chief speaker. As a believer in heredity would expect, she is very eloquent, and puts the women's case forward with much power. She has a nice sense of humour, too, which brightens her speeches most pleasantly.

Sir Neville and Lady Lyttelton arrived at the Royal Hospital during the week, Sir Neville paying a short visit to England to attend his cousin's—Lord Spencer—funeral. Sir Neville was for some years on Lord Spencer's Viceregal staff.

Apropos of much of the writing regarding the late Lord Spencer, we were struck, over here, by the shortness of political memories, and the little that is known about Irish Viceroys on your side of the water. To what are commonly called the people the Lord Lieutenant is an "abstraction," an English—North and South Briton are not differentiated over here—"abstraction," into which no question of personality comes. The popularity or unpopularity of an Irish Viceroy is a mere matter of organisation. With those who went to his Court Lord Spencer's personal charm and perfect "gentlemanism" made him very popular. He was every inch a Viceroy, too. "Even I did not do the thing better," the late Duke of Abercorn pronounced when revisiting Dublin Castle during Lord Spencer's Viceroyalty. As for Lady Spencer, those who knew her still talk enthusiastically of the beautiful and gracious lady in the fashion of the times, before "smartness" had cast its blight over society and manners.

Colonel Forster, whose death occurred at nearly ninety years last week, was for perhaps half a century in the Viceregal household, under successive Viceroys. He was an "institution," as it were of Dublin Castle. Most popular and ornamental as Master of the Horse, distinguished for urbanity and courteousness; in fact, what might be called an "expert" courtier in his graceful suavity of manner and serene composure. Lord Carlisle, the first Viceroy who appointed him, notes in his journal, privately published many years ago, in chronicling a wedding, that "Frank" Forster was the "best man," adding with warm appreciation, "And when is he not the best man wherever he is?" or words to that effect.—Yours ever,

Clare.

I have only two or three recipes for you this week, but you will find them very satisfactory:—

Fillets of Trout à la Vosges.—Cut the fillets of a fresh salmon trout into neat pieces, trim them to about half an inch thick, arrange them in a buttered sautépan, season them with salt and pepper and a glass of white wine. Cover them with buttered paper and cook them twenty minutes in the oven. When the fillets are cold mask them with chopped capers and chopped parsley, yolk of egg and red lobster coral, using sufficient cold liquid aspic to bind them. Set a border mould with aspic on which to dress the fillets, garnish the centre with picked hearts of lettuces mixed with mayonnaise sauce. Round the border put alternately groups of chopped aspic and cucumber turned into convolvulus-shaped pieces with a pinch of red coral in the centre to represent the petals. Put sprigs of chervil at the summit with a tiny red tomato farced with cucumber mayonnaise in the centre.

Petits Pois au Beurre.—Put a quart of green peas into a stewpan, cover them with cold water, rub them with about 2 ozs. of butter so that the peas are all coated with it, pour off the water, make a bouquet of two sprigs of mint, two of parsley, and a small bunch of spring onions, and place it in the centre of the peas. Sprinkle them with caster sugar and salt, and cook them on a moderately hot stove about three-quarters of an hour. Mix 1 oz. of butter on a plate with as much flour as it will take up. Mix it carefully with the peas, allow them to get sufficiently hot to cook the flour, then dish them en pyramide, garnished with crescent-shaped croûtons of fried bread.

You must try this very delicious pouding à la duchesse:—

Beat the weight of three eggs in butter and sugar together in a basin until creamy, beat in three eggs, each one separately, add the grated peel of half a fresh lemon, 2 oz. of sultanas, 1 oz. of very finely chopped candied peel, 2 oz. of stoned brandy cherries and the weight of the three eggs in flour, put it in a well-buttered mould (one with a cover), and steam it continuously for four hours. Serve it with the following sauce round it Rub the peel of half a lemon on 4 oz. of sugar, dissolve it in the strained juice of the lemon, and whisk it with the yolks of two eggs on the stove until foamy.

Italian Wine Cream.—Use as many yolks of eggs as you have guests and as many glasses of raisin or any sweet wine, and half as many tablespoonfuls of crushed and sifted lump sugar. Put the whole into a chocolate pot, which place upon a hot plate or low gas. Then beat it with a whisk until it becomes the consistence of nicely whipped cream. Pour the mixture into custard glasses. Serve wafer biscuits with it.

Ever your loving Cousin, MADGE.

THE RAJAH'S PEOPLE.

By I. A. R. WYLIE.

Crown 8vo, 6s. Sixth Edition rapidly selling.

"'The Rajah's People' is the best Indian novel that we have read since 'On the Face of the Waters.' It is powerful and thrilling, yet throughout there is a restraint and grasp of the situation that suggest the practised hand rather than that of the novice. Mr. Wylie must write other novels, which we hope it will be our good fortune to review."—Daily Chronicle.

"I. A. R. Wylie has made in 'The Rajah's People' a very noticeable addition to the excellent fiction written by those who have heard 'The East a-callin'' to some purpose."—World.

"Quite one of the best and certainly one of the most entertaining stories of Indian life published for some time. 'The Rajah's People' is a remarkable first novel."
—Liverpool Daily Post.

TWO MEN AND GWENDA.

By MABEL BARNES-GRUNDY, Author of "Hilary on Her Own."

"A Novel of laughter and tears."

"Contains both sparkle and thought; character, scenery, and society, as well as the deeper emotions, are touched with a sure hand; in short, the author has produced a successful novel."—Scotsman.

"This unusual and notable book."—Morning Leader.

WRITTEN IN THE RAIN.

By JOHN TREVENA, Author of "Granite."

"These tales are very remarkable."—Manchester Guardian.

THE ENEMY OF WOMAN.

By WINIFRED GRAHAM, Author of "Mary."

A powerful Anti-Suffrage novel.
"Essentially a novel of to-day. Both because it is so thoroughly topical and because the incidents are so well portrayed the story can be cordially recommended."—Newcastle Daily Chronicle.
"Comes most opportunely with the introduction of the measure for the enfranchisement of women, for it is an endeavour—and a forceful one—to set forward the sinister side of that movement. No one who reads 'The Enemy of Woman' is likely to find it dull. There is not a slow or insipid paragraph from first to last; the characters are splendidly delineated; the action is strong throughout; but the book will certainly not please the suffragettes, and shows up the darker side of the militant crusade in a style that leaves nothing whatever to be desired."—Western Mail.

A FINE NOVEL.

REBECCA DREW.

By EDITH DART. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"There is no way of telling whether this is one of the many 'first novels' that Messrs. Mills & Boon have introduced to the public. If it is, it is one in which to feel much hope. The book has quality, and treats a limited subject with a largeness of outlook and a lack of the catchpenny emotions that give it distinction. The whole thing is more suggestion than fact. But it is a large suggestion. It rouses. It interests. It touches the imagination."—Daily News.
"Grips and holds the attention."—Scotsman.

THE GIRL FROM HIS TOWN.

By MARIE VAN VORST, Author of "First Love," "In Ambush."

"Worth reading."—Times.
"Graphically told, and holds the reader's interest right through."
—Daily Mirror.
"Miss Van Vorst's large circle of admirers will have no reason to be disappointed with her latest effort. . . . Told with real spirit."
—Newcastle Chronicle.

THE HONOURABLE DEREK.

By R. A. WOOD-SEYS (Paul Cushing). Crown 8vo, 6s.

"An amusing comedy."—Daily Chronicle.
"The writer has a very pretty wit."—Pall Mall Gazette.
"Has a highly original plot, distinctly clever."—Morning Leader.
"Sparkling dialogue. . . the conversation of his characters is spirited and witty."—Scotsman.

"TRUTH" PUZZLES.

"TRUTH" DOLL AND TOY SHOW.

PRELIMINARY NOTICE.

It seems early days yet to be reminding my readers of an event which is still four months ahead. But the fact that some 4,000 of dolls have already arrived from the manufacturers, and are crying aloud for clothes, impels me to direct the attention of TRUTH'S lady friends to their condition, and to the fact that they will be required for exhibition at the Albert Hall in the middle of December, prior to distribution among the London Poor Law Schools and Hospitals.

I hope that many ladies will take pity on the poor dolls, and forward their applications as soon as possible. The usual prizes for the dressing of the dolls will, of course, be awarded after the Show.

HOME-MADE TOYS.

The exhibits in this class last year did not come up to expectations. This year special efforts will be made to stimulate amateur toy-makers to take part in the Competition. With that object in view the Editor of TRUTH has decided (assuming the entries warrant it) to give a Special Prize for

HOME-MADE DOLLS' HOUSES,

in addition to the usual Prizes offered in the Home-Made Toys Class.

He desires me now to direct particular notice to this, as he is of opinion that the making of Dolls' Houses is an art in which amateur talent is likely to find congenial scope for its exercise. Moreover, a Dolls' House is a peculiarly serviceable sort of plaything for children, both because it is one in the delights of which several can share simultaneously, and also because it is better able to withstand the wear and tear of daily use than smaller and more fragile toys.

A further and more detailed announcement of the Show will appear in due course. Meanwhile, let readers of TRUTH make a careful note of the date, which is Wednesday and Thursday, December 14 and 15, 1910.

"TRUTH" PRIZE No. 1,634.

SPECIAL PLAY-OFF.

The author's solution of this special play-off acrostic (which, by the way, seems to have stumped competitors badly) is as follows:—

Mere kudos doth the better please
For being reinforced by these.

(TWO GUINEAS.)

(i.) What have we here? Tack on a tail
At least, you can't be said to fail.
T I (E)

(ii.) Decapitate this worthy's name,
Yet have him, strange to say, the same.
W ODI N

[Or, in the alternative, Odin, the Jupiter of Scandinavian mythology.]

(iii.) The victim of a tyrant's raid,
For which that tyrant dearly paid.
O RANG E

[The raid made by Louis XIV. on the principality of Orange provoked the bitter hostility of William of that ilk—afterwards William III. of England—and so led up to the reverses and disasters subsequently suffered by le grand monarque.]

(iv.) Once one, but now more often it
In two unequal parts is split.
G UINE A

(v.) Their meaning's source is hid from sight,
Until you add the present light.
U PS (and DOWNS)

["Downs," in the sense of undulating hills, the full original form of which is said to have been "ups-and-downs."]

Now as to the award:—

Only three competitors have succeeded in giving the uprights correctly, viz., CUTHBERT, ECA, and PRAK.

CUTHBERT has two lights absolutely correct; ECA and PRAK have each one absolutely correct.

I have decided to award CUTHBERT £1 1s., and ECA and PRAK each 10s. 6d.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE No. 1,645.

The first of September is now close at hand—a day held sacred by all sportsmen as the Feast of St. Partridge.

Having a laudable desire to keep these competitions, as far as may be, topical, I now invite my readers (with the offer of the usual Prize of Two Guineas)

TO CELEBRATE THE FIRST DAY OF PARTRIDGE SHOOTING IN A RHYMED ODE OF TEN LINES—SUCH LINES TO BEGIN RESPECTIVELY WITH THE LETTERS P-A-R-T-R-I-D-G-E-S, IN THAT ORDER.

I think the character of the competition is clear enough to render any explanations on my part superfluous.

I have only to say that every line in the ode, besides beginning with the requisite letter, must rhyme with at least one other line. Further, that all Odes must reach TRUTH Office not later than by the first post on Monday, September 5.

CONDENSED RULES.

All answers to the current Puzzle must be sent in on or before the morning of the Monday week following the date of that Puzzle's publication to the PUZZLE EDITOR, TRUTH Buildings, Carteret Street, Queen Anne's Gate, London, S.W. The answers must be signed by a nom-de-plume of not more than twelve letters, and must not be sent on postcards, nor by telegraph, nor by hand, whilst in the case of new competitors the real name and address must be forwarded with the first reply sent.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

 The real name, with the address, of JOWLER, winner of one-fourth of TRUTH Prize No. 1,637, is B. L. Jenkinson, Esq., Roslin, 122, Palace Road, Tulse Hill, S.W.

SPECIAL ADVERTISEMENT COMPETITION.

I hope to be in a position to announce the Prize award in above at an early date.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE No. 1642.—ASSORTED SPECIMENS—GOOD AND OTHERWISE.

STANZAS OF SIX RHYMED LINES IN WHICH THE LETTERS M, A, N ARE USED IN A GIVEN ORDER.

The wise man is not always wise,
Though he assume a solemn air;
Nor yet can make-believe disguise
His make-up in an ample stare.
'Tis but comedian may by voice or pen
Proclaim, "I am not as the rest of men."

Sir G. L.

The Manchurian said, in accents bland,
"I'm native born of the 'flowery land.'
In many plots I take a share,
My name is a terror everywhere.
I can make lives brief by various means,
Then amnesties buy from high Mandarines."

Roumanian.

THE EXPERT WHIST PLAYER.

The man who thinks he's good at whist,
Who'll damn all round when "calls" are missed,
And yet, when making a finesse,
Will lead his partner in a mess,
Can make me feel distinctly small—
But then I am no good at all.

Sapper.

A DEVONSHIRE DITTY.

Oh! a melancholy ditty of a maiden and a man;
A few bad words—a tantrum—(nay, so the story ran)—
When Mary sought her lover he was nowheres to be found,
Till one day his corpse lay floatin' in a mire off Plymouth Sound.
His ghost frequents the ocean, moanin' the live-long day.
I am not so sure 'bout Mary, but 'ers maz'd, the folks do say.

Noodle.

In ages past, when man in caves did dwell,
And traversed nameless tracks in search of game,
Affairs at home his wife then manag'd well,
And did not roam nor thought of seeking fame;
But women now from Nature's work rebel,
And equal rights with man most keenly claim.

Arcadic.

When noisy Suffragettes assert that man is good for nought,
They then condemn as worthless trash what they full oft have sought;
Thus, too, in matters politic they soon may change their note,
And in amazing fashion state they do not want a vote;
For they, who can't get what they crave, can much relieve their pain
By saying: "Damn the beastly grapes, they're sour once again!"

Redder.

The Commons now seem—and it's high time they say—
To rest from their labours. Now solemn and gay
Debater and worker in matters of State
Can amply enjoy their holiday late,
And feel it is better than muddling at "Bills,"
To roam near some golf links or tramp moors and hills.

Bel Demonio.

No man should e'er—the facts unknown—
Condemn an erring brother;
Unmanly sneers—aspersions thrown,
These, in a moment, smother.
In truth, such statement I can make,
But am not sure TRUTH'S prize to take.

Ballantrae.

As sparks upward fly man is born unto trouble
From natal-day's dawn till the end of life's bubble.
Through wintry December or the bright days in May,
Sorrows seem to be strewn in a merciless way;
Yet courage and hope can make the rugged path plain,
And Faith says, "I am nearing the Heav'n I would gain."

O. P. Q.

'Tis hoped mankind, in future days,
Will not contemn a meed of praise
To those great schemes that man may frame
To glorify his country's name.
It is no more than merit asks;
Bless, not damn, its arduous tasks.

C. S. P.

This foe of man had followed me
From narrow streets to moorland heather;
The inmates of my hostelry
Its mystic name discussed together;
At length their talk ran madly free:
"Oh, damn!" they cried, "this summer weather."

Northlander.

"The proper study of mankind is man,"
Thus in Pope's hymn a line oft quoted ran.
In many attributes the "Lord of all
Creation," and thus named before his fall.
He was man master, but says woman now,
"Am not I equal Votes I'll have, I vow!"

Clapa.

O, gentle Suffragette, shall man
Thy solemn accents hush?
And in amendments, if he can,
Unmanly movements crush?
Slam not the open door, ye Fates!
Woman may hurry. Asquith waits!

Erina.

When man of old invented wings of wax,
Lo! from him Nature claimed in blood her tax.*
Now in majestic flight he cleaves the skies,
Now, in a moment dashed to earth, he dies.
Can mortal daring on to victory press?
Cease Sphinx! I am no Œdipus to guess.

*Icarus.

Chris.

I am a poor man well acquainted with grief,
For I'm native of Ireland's Isle;
But an M.A. of Dublin will seek for relief,
And in running will gain soon a mile.
So if I can marry then all will be well,
For being a beau I am next to a belle.

Nemo.

Man—God's masterpiece is he,
A problem acknowledged by every "Eve,"
In making them "one" she fails to see
Wherein a "male," who lacketh the "fee,"
Can more be called any greater than she.
And Adam, now tutored, inclines to agree.

Phil Tytus.

A man and wife, not long ago,
In amity did dwell.
Than most, they lived more happily;
In him naught broke the spell.
But madam now's on Suffrage mad;
To scorn mankind's her latest fad.

Bponth.

A DEDICATION.

Great man, please read these lines below—
You do not need your name to know;
Do not condemn a humble friend
(I am not sorry to be so),
Or pass unmarked the book I send—
I can my work to you commend.

Trot.

With visage grim and wrinkled he leaned against a boat,
And told of many ocean monsters he had fought;
Then his voice grew strangely solemn as he recounted o'er
The terror-striking names these awful creatures bore:
"No dream nor nightmare this what I am telling you,"
Cried the weather-beaten mariner as we handed him a chew.

Hypatia.

For no high command I sigh, for no wealth I crave,
From Nature's breast inspired I aim at no floral grave.
Unmask ambition, and behold vanity and pride,
Names that crystallise in misery far and wide.
I can make the simple life in its pure glory shine;
I am no slave to fashion, and crucifixion I decline.

Mary.

A young man of fashion
In a motor did dash on
At a speed which no p'leeceman may ever permit,
So one of them nabbed him,
And then many grabbed him,
And he said, "I am now at the end of my wit!"

Hibernia.

The long-suffering of "man" is passing strange;
Him Nature appointed as Boss
In matters none better than he could arrange
Nor control—namely, "Profit and Loss."
Yet "woman" may now all profits rake in
And damn her old man—at a loss

Orang.

One man will grope his way, half-blind, perplext,
Along dim, narrow paths that chill him, and the next
Can meditate at liberty all day,
And dream not of the troubles of the way.
One man may murmur in the sunniest hour,
And one discern a mercy in a shower.

Aunt Jane.

No chessman who the "Royal game" has played
Will, o'er the chequers, e'er contemn a maid.
She may learn manly moves, he woman's wiles;
To win a match the other each beguiles,
While mimic strife they gravely can maintain.
"Check," "mate," and amnesty will end their pain.

Knémis.

A man of few words, sir, am I—
Am not used to juggling with words—
But I have an ambition to try
In your penmanship world to cross swords.
There are many more able than mine, without doubt,
But am naturally hoping you'll give me—"not out"!

F. F. Brooks.

Man wants but little here below
In many different ways,
But in a monetary sense he says,
"I am naturally full of woes."
Though while I can my bills square up,
I'm named the man whose credit's good enough.

Scriba.

Happy indeed, and blest by Fate that man,
Whom nature teaches love of country life,
A telegram ne'er comes his calm to ban;
The postman merely calls to please his wife.
His home a haven; many books his joy—
A nameless peace his guerdon, bliss without alloy.

Piers Peniles.

TRUTH, if a naval man may, for a time
From naval matters turns his thoughts and eyes,
And write, albeit in manner crude, a rhyme
To try to win a much desired prize,
Accept the best verse I can make, 'neath frowning 12-inch muzzles,
And bear in mind the fact that I am not much good at puzzles!

R. N.

A REMINISCENCE OF A RECENT EVENT.

A man, o'er-run by Devon motor-car,
Must not say "damn"—this fearsome word doth jar.
And magisterial condemnation bring;
No "names" should pass the mangled wretch's lips,
The while his gore in mad profusion drips—
A pæan meet of thanks he blithe should sing

Crescendo.

In the earth's first Creation, the Lord of all was man,
Looking to him Nature bowed to his rule and plan.
He can make subservient and gentle to his will
An amphibious monster. Has he this power still?
Can majesty so powerful, so great, and master yet
An amnesty declare to a kicking Suffragette?

Mrs. Jellyby.

To the man in the moon, a bold Suffragette sped,
"Gracious madam, name how I may serve you!" he said.
Then the woman made answer: "I'm here, for I've heard,
In the moon, a man still reigns supreme—how absurd!
I am now come to say that we women below,
Have decided a woman must reign—you can go!"

Broken Gate.

Woman may swear she never will be bound
By foolish man-made laws, and think it sound
To hint at nameless methods only just begun;
But when she does unmask her secret plan,
I am not sure she'll quite dumbfound mere man,
But rather damn a cause she might have wisely won.

Amuinn.

Man is the ruler of the world,
Whom nature doth invite,
In manner unmistakable,
All things to name aright.
Woman may help in many ways,
But "madam" never gets the praise.

Cygnet.

Man and maid, through a wood, to spoon,
Wandered one autumn afternoon.
"More happy none can make," he cried;
"O, take my name and be my bride!
No human mind could love thee so."
"I am not free," she whispered low

Petruchio.

This August, as many an August before,
In mackintosh swathed I unfurled my old gamp.
The ocean may heave, but it tempts me no more,
For my pants and my towel seem nasty and damp.
When to eloquence goaded (as I often am),
The aptest remark I can think of is "D——."

Dobbin.

Come, sing the praises of the being, Man;
Erect a column and enhance his fame.
The ocean main he measures with a span
And all creation bows before his name.
Damn not the mortal fashioned from a sod:
In man applaud the highest gift of God.

Tityrus.

What a complex and wonderful creature is man,
Whom Nature endows with talents so rare
That even a maiden may fail in the plan
His name, fame, and glory to equally share.
A man may decide on affairs of the State,
"Adam" now has a vote while poor "Eve" has to wait.

Cygne.

We've had too many days of rain;
Warm Nature's sun we've sought in vain
When making holiday, for shame,
With every morn, a mist the same.
What words can match the weather's claim?
Why, damn it, and say damn again.

J-pen

ANALYSIS OF MAN.

What is man? A complex riddle;
Adam-natured mix'd with Eve.
Damned to play a second fiddle,
Satan makes him to deceive.
Born a mortal, but a clod,
Man-materialised and God.

Malignant.

"Young man," said I, "'tis but a sorry game;
Man, married, is no longer free to roam.
Marriage, for woman, means but change of name,
A new experience, freedom, natty home;
Bondage for you! Shun marriage; love's a sham."
He scoffed, and I—pray pardon me—said, "Damn!"

Quilp.

A man a-fishing goes, to catch 'em bent,
But Fortune brings him naught but time misspent.
Comes home disgusted, then makes obvious tries
To screen his failures in a mist of lies!
Why lame excuses, O, Waltonian make?
No one believes them, they're a d——d mistake!

Amnis.

A man becoming tired of love
Could not with brain gymnastics prove.
His wife unmanned him with demurs.
She named his lot not no worse than hers.
"Give him branmash," the Judge said,
"hot!"
An amnesty soon wifey got.

Reg. Carrington.

I hope I shall manage to make a good verse,
That's not namby-pamby or weak.
I often make verses, for better or worse,
I can make 'em expressly unique.
Oh! do not condemn a smart effort, I say,
I am not disposed to deny it's O.K.

Cercuell.

By cruel fate a peer, yet still a man,
From every platform I am nagged at, scorned,
By labourer, grim navvy, roughly warned
That inmates of our House are under ban,
So crude a foeman may a peer withstand,
Rather court exile in a more servile land.

Hardy Annual.

The man of the hour is Crippen,
Who in a sham name did ship in
A steamer, with "son" in male's dress,
Expecting to outrun "a mess."
But captain saw man making love on deck;
So sham now is duly exposed in Quebec.

Carnation.

"WHEN MY SHIP COMES HOME."

My ship sails magic seas that no man knows
In moonlit calm. Naught stirs, no faint wind blows
Round dreaming isles, where white foam never breaks,
But wan mists cling, until the dawn awakes
On wings of storm. Torn sails and broken mast,
Wreckage unnamed the waves toss home at last.

ENTRE NOUS.

QUEEN ALEXANDRA has prolonged her stay at Sandringham, and she has been taking daily drives in the neighbourhood with Princess Victoria and Prince Christopher of Greece, who has been on a visit at the Hall since the 15th. Her Majesty drove on Friday to Cromer, when she drank tea at the Leylands with Sir Richard and Lady Musgrave, of Edenhall. Queen Alexandra paid a visit last week to her seaside bungalow at Snettisham, on the shore of the Wash, and she also drove one afternoon to Castle Rising. This is Queen Alexandra's first stay at Sandringham during this summer, except for merely flying visits.

There is no foundation whatever for the statement that Mr. Lloyd George "first suggested" to the King the investiture of the Prince of Wales in the Principality, nor is it true that his Majesty "at once assented," and left the place of the ceremonial to be settled by a committee. The whole story is a farrago of fictions, and equally baseless is the announcement that the Chancellor of the Exchequer's "visit to the King at Balmoral" is connected with the proposed investiture. Mr. Lloyd George is going to Balmoral for a week officially as Minister in attendance. It was stated in Truth last week that the King will probably decide to arrange for two ceremonials of investiture, the one for North Wales and the other for South Wales, but nothing is likely to be definitely settled for some time to come. The investiture will not take place in any case until after June 23, 1912, when the Prince of Wales will attain his legal majority.

It has been stated in the press during the last week that King Edward "abandoned the practice of having a member of the Cabinet always in attendance while the Sovereign was out of London." This is all stuff and nonsense. This "practice" ceased early in the fifties so far as Windsor Castle was concerned, and early in the sixties at Osborne. For nearly forty years Queen Victoria required the attendance of a Cabinet Minister only at Balmoral or when she was abroad. King Edward was always attended by a Minister when staying at Balmoral, and King George will follow his father's custom. During the earlier part of Queen Victoria's reign there was much trouble in fixing the rota of attendance for Ministers, as her Majesty would not allow the names of those whom she disliked to be placed on it. Mr. Disraeli was carefully excluded in 1852, and in 1853 the permission to allow Lord Palmerston to be in attendance for the day at Balmoral was regarded by Lord Aberdeen and Lord Clarendon as a triumph of domestic diplomacy.

---

A morning paper, referring to the arrival of the Court on Deeside, states that Queen Victoria and Prince Albert purchased Balmoral from "the Farquharsons." The place was purchased from the trustees of the Earldom of Fife estates. Balmoral had been let on a life lease to Sir Robert Gordon, brother of Lord Aberdeen, the Minister, and when the property reverted to the trustees they sold it to Queen Victoria. The only portion of the Royal domain which belonged to "the Farquharsons" is the deer forest and woods of Ballochbuie, on the Dee, which Queen Victoria bought about 1878 from the late Colonel Farquharson of Invercauld for £10,000. The Birkhall estate and portions of the Royal deer forest were purchased from the Gordons of Abergeldie.

TO THE KAISER.

(By a Grateful Press-Poet.)

Welcome! welcome! Willie, dear!
I with joy could shout.
Silent for a whole long year,
Now you've broken out.

In the Silly Season, too—
Just the time to spout—
Very thoughtful 'twas of you
To start breaking out.

Lately in a horrid fix,
Naught to write about,
Straw for making rhythmic bricks
I was quite without.

Now I am a happy bard;
Smile succeeds to pout;
I've material by the yard
Since you've broken out.

Pressmen poets' hearts are light;
Cares are put to rout;
In the Silly Season's height
Wilhelm's broken out.

The Duke and Duchess of Connaught and Princess Patricia spent last week in Arran, when they were the guests of Lord Vernon at Dougarie, the late Duke of Hamilton's shooting lodge on the west side of the island. Lord and Lady Graham have let the western part of the Arran deer forest and grouse moors (about 45,000 acres) to Lord Vernon for this season. There was grouse shooting over Kilpatrick Hill moors on Tuesday, but sport was stopped early in the afternoon by heavy rain. On Wednesday there were grouse drives over the northern beats, and a deer drive in the forest on Thursday. The Duchess and Princess Patricia paid some visits to the Shiskine golf course, and they made several excursions about the island, and lunched at Brodick Castle with Lord and Lady Graham.

Commodore Rosslyn E. Wemyss, commanding the R.N. Barracks, Devonport, has been selected for the command of the Union-Castle liner Balmoral Castle, which is to carry the Duke and Duchess of Connaught from Southampton to Cape Town and back. During the absence of Commodore Wemyss the R.N. Barracks will be in charge of Captain Lionel Tufnell, of the R.N.E. College. The Balmoral Castle is to sail on Monday, October 10, and she will return to England early in January.

The cruiser Defence is to go into dockyard hands at Devonport to prepare to act as escort to the Duke of Connaught. She was the last armoured cruiser, strictly so classified, to be completed, having been more than four years under construction at Pembroke. She is still in her maiden commission, having hoisted the pennant of Captain Cecil F. Dampier on February 9, 1909.

---

The King and Queen of the Belgians are to pay a state visit to the Court of the Netherlands during the week after next. Their Majesties will be the guests of Queen Wilhelmina and the Prince Consort at the Royal Palace, Amsterdam. On Friday, September 16, they will pay a visit to the Queen Dowager at the Château of Soestdijk, where there are fine gardens and an extensive and picturesque beech forest.

---

The Empress Eugénie has returned to Farnborough Hill, after an absence of nearly eight months. The Empress went for a long cruise in her yacht Thistle when she left the Riviera in May, and visited several of the ports of the Levant. She landed from the yacht at Venice, and then went to Paris for a fortnight, proceeding thence to Cowes, where the Thistle had previously arrived from the Mediterranean. The Empress will now be in residence at Farnborough Hill until about Christmas, when she intends going to the Riviera. It is quite likely that she may pay a visit to either Bath or Buxton during the autumn, for the purpose of taking a course of waters.

---

The Duke of Sparta has left London for Frankfort, whence he will proceed to Venice on his return to Athens. He has been absent from Greece for more than a year. The Duke is to act as Regent during the absence of King George, who is going to Aix-les-Bains, Paris, Copenhagen, Frankfort, and Vienna, and he will be away until about the middle of November. The Duchess of Sparta, who has been in England for more than two months, is on a visit to her sister, Princess Frederick Charles of Hesse, at Friedrichshof, near Homburg, and she will not return to Greece until late in the autumn.

THE KAISER AGAIN.

(From Another Point of View.)

"O Willy, you silly," writes Suffragette Milly,
"To preach to us women the lex
Maternal. Infernal! You've earned the eternal
Contempt of the feminine sex.

"The caring and bearing of babies? What daring!
They shouldn't allow you to speak.
Clothes-mending and tending small strangers unending?
I like your Imperial cheek!

"Pooh! Mating and waiting on infants I'm hating;
I view 'em with loathing profound.
What, nurse 'em? Oh, curse 'em! I'd much sooner hearse 'em,
And bury 'em all in the ground.

"And toiling and moiling at roasting or boiling,
In order that husband may dine?
Orating and prating and gesticulating
On platforms are more in my line.

"Come, Kaiser! Be wiser, you self-advertiser,
You bane of your Chancellor's life!
Nous-lacking and clacking, you merit a smacking,
And you'd get it, if I were your wife!"

Prince Louis of Battenberg has gone to Germany on leave for thirty days. He will spend his holiday at Heiligenberg, where Princess Louis has been residing since she left England. Prince Louis' flagship, the Prince of Wales, is to await his return at Portsmouth.

---

Prince Alfonso de Bourbon-Orleans and his wife (Princess Beatrice of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha) were on a visit last week to Princess Henry of Battenberg at Osborne Cottage. They have since returned to Germany, and are to join the Dowager Duchess of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha (Grand Duchess Marie Alexandrovna) at Tegernsee.

---

Sir Arthur Bigge is to arrive at Balmoral Castle to-day, and he will resume his duties as assistant private secretary to the King, which has been undertaken during his absence from Court by Colonel Sir Frederick Ponsonby, who leaves Balmoral to-morrow (Thursday).

THE KAISER ONCE AGAIN.

(This Time from His Own Point of View.)

O list, ye little mortals, list!
Your groundless fears put by;
Despite my somewhat maily fist,
A kindly soul am I.

Secure the peace of Europe stands.
Let panic's bogeys fly.
We've got that matter in our hands,
Have Providence and I.

We gaze benignly on mankind
Down from our throne on high;
We keep their welfare in our mind,
Do Providence and I.

You see, I walk in modest ways,
Am p'rhaps unduly shy.
For manners' sake I use the phrase
Of "Providence and I."

But, bating that polite pretence,
You'll easily descry
It should run "I and Providence,"
Not "Providence and I."

---

Lord and Lady Aberdeen, contrary to general expectation in Dublin, had no Viceregal party for the Horse Show week. It was a disappointment in the capital, which, like greater capitals, takes an industrial interest in the promoting of social festivity. The society "Industry" is one on which the prosperity of countless other industries depends.

The Commander of the Forces and Lady Lyttelton had a large house party at the Royal Hospital for the Horse Show week which included Lord and Lady Leitrim, Lord and Lady Dunluce, Lords Donoughmore and John Cavendish, Miss Diana Bulteel, Hon. H. Guest, M.P., and Captain Fairfax. The chief ball of the "week" given at the Royal Hospital, Kilmainham, in the great dining hall, was very largely attended. Sir Neville and Lady Lyttelton were not host and hostess on the occasion, the ball being for the benefit of military charities.

Mr. Asquith arrived in town on Thursday from Easton Grey, near Malmesbury, where he had been staying since his visit to Mr. and Mrs. Harcourt at Nuneham Park. Mr. Asquith went to Aberdeen on Thursday night, and he was the guest of Mr. and Mrs. H. J. Tennant at Edinglassie House, in Strathdon, until Monday, when he proceeded to Balmoral as Minister in attendance on the King. Mr. Asquith goes next Monday to Archerfield House, Haddingtonshire, for a stay of several weeks.

The Duke of Bedford and Lord Tavistock returned to Woburn Abbey on leaving Endsleigh, and they have gone, with the Duchess, to Scotland, to spend a few weeks at Lanfine House, Mr. Mackinnon's place near Kilmarnock, which his Grace has rented for the month. The Lanfine grouse moor, which comprises 10,000 acres, is one of the best in Ayrshire. On leaving Lanfine the Duke and Duchess will go to Cairnsmore House, Kirkcudbrightshire, for a few weeks before returning to Woburn Abbey for the winter.

Lord and Lady Breadalbane have left Taymouth Castle for Black Mount Forest, where they will stay until the beginning of October. The deer forest of Black Mount, which was rented for over twenty years by the late Lord Dudley, comprises about 80,000 acres, and it is generally considered to be the best shooting of this description in Scotland. The stags are remarkable for size and quality, and the forest carries a very heavy stock of red deer. The fishing is also very good.

---

The Duke and Duchess of Norfolk, who have been spending a month at Filey, are now settled for a few weeks at Kinharvie, the late Lord Herries' place near Dumfries. There are excellent grouse and low ground shootings on the Herries' estates in Kirkcudbrightshire. The stately and picturesque ruins of Caerlaverock Castle are on this property. It was one of the finest strongholds in Scotland until the great siege of 1640. Scott described Caerlaverock in "Guy Mannering" as "Ellangowan."

---

Colonel and Lady Sarah Wilson have given up the Stud House, Hampton Court, which was lent to them by King Edward about four years ago, when the place was vacated by the late Sir Alfred and Lady Egerton. The Stud House is one of the best of the Crown residences, being a large and well-arranged Georgian mansion, with fine gardens. The place is now at the disposal of the King. It was occupied many years during the Regency and early in the reign of George IV. by Sir Benjamin (afterwards Lord) Blomfield.

moral." There is no such village, and Craig Gowan is a house in the Balmoral grounds which was built by Queen Victoria.

Lord and Lady Ripon had a small shooting party last week at Studley Royal to meet Prince Francis of Teck, who has just returned from Marienbad. Heavy bags of grouse were obtained on the Dallowgill moors, in Nidderdale, which will not be again driven this season.

Captain Hamilton, of Pinmore, who died the other day, was the owner of a large estate in South Ayrshire, and he belonged to a very old family. He served for some years in the 1st (King's) Dragoon Guards, and in 1852 he was aide-de-camp to the late Lord Eglinton when Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland. After retiring from the Army, Captain Hamilton served for seven years in the Ayrshire Yeomanry Cavalry. He was very popular in the county.

A correspondent writes:—

During the last fortnight a great deal has been printed about the Crimean nurses, and the whole credit of the good work which they accomplished is given to Miss Nightingale. The fact is that nearly as much credit is fairly due to Miss Mary Stanley —the daughter of Bishop Stanley and sister of the Dean—who worked with untiring zeal and conspicuous success, although she was by no means warmly welcomed by Miss Nightingale, who cared only for assistants who would be her obedient servants.

---

A weekly contemporary prints a strange farrago of nonsense about Lady Guendolen Ramsden, who is stated to have come into Bulstrode Park "on the death of her brother, the thirteenth Duke of Somerset." Lady Guendolen inherited Bulstrode from her father, the twelfth duke, who died in 1885, and the thirteenth Duke of Somerset was her uncle. Her two brothers died in the sixties, the younger one (Lord Edward St. Maur) having been killed while on a hunting tour in India, while the elder one's death excited much sensation at the time owing to an angry controversy which arose between his mother, the Duchess of Somerset, and the physician who had attended him in his last illness.

---

Bulstrode was formerly a seat of the Dukes of Portland, and the place was very frequently visited by George III. and Queen Charlotte when residing at Windsor Castle. The grounds and park at Bulstrode are described as "Armine" in "Henrietta Temple," but Lord Beaconsfield exaggerated the extent and beauty of the domain, and glorified the place generally out of all recognition.

The celebrated portrait of Burns by Archibald Skirving has been purchased for £500 by the Trustees of the Scottish National Portrait Gallery from the executors of the late Sir Theodore Martin. It is a life-size drawing in red chalk of Burns's head, with the neck and shoulders merely indicated. It is by far the best portrait of the poet. Sir Theodore Martin picked it up in 1881 at a London sale for only £40. He had expressed his intention of leaving the picture to the Scottish National Portrait Gallery, but it was not mentioned in his will. The national collection at Edinburgh already contains the Nasmyth small portrait of Burns, which was a bequest from the poet's son, and the Nasmyth full-length, which was left to this gallery by the late Sir Hugh Hume Campbell, of Marchmont.

It gave me a nasty shock the other day, after perusing a page of honeyed compliments from an American reader of Truth, to come to a big "But," followed by this:—

With a presumptuous disregard for the reverence due to a people, and snobbishly ignoring the prophetic warning of the immortal Edmund Burke against condemning [Wasn't it indicting?—Ed.] a whole nation, you persistently insult me and ninety millions of my countrymen by referring to us and ours as "Yankees." The term is admitted by us, and by you Englishmen, to be obnoxious and insulting to us. Why this insult? . . .

And so on, through two pages.

Wondering what had provoked this outburst, I have had the files of Truth for several months carefully searched, but without discovering the cause. The word "Yankee" is, I should consider, simply a nickname, and its use only open to objection on the score of politeness. But even if it were an epithet bearing some opprobrious and insulting signification I doubt whether the ninety millions my correspondent speaks of ever have been dubbed with it in the last thirty years in the pages of Truth. Wherever my researches have brought it to light it is used in reference to one or other of the American exiles who come among us for the purpose of living by their wits, or others who are engaged in a similar occupation in their own great country. In about 99 per cent. of the cases I find that it occurs in connection with the term "flat-traps."

---

I don't know why any honest citizen of the United States should feel hurt when what he considers an opprobrious epithet is applied to the baser sort of his fellow-countrymen, and I credit the majority of Americans with too much sense to take offence at such a trifle. Heaven forbid that I should indict a nation, in defiance of the warning of the immortal prophet; but if in some rare instance a blemish could be discovered in the American character, I should say it would be an overthinness of the skin. In England, at any rate, we grow thicker hides, and no doubt we need them.

ODE ON A DISTANT PROSPECT OF THE CITY.

Jagged cliffs and golden sands,
  Where the sea-spray splashes;
Rocks where one tall lighthouse stands,
Trained by hourly trial to keep Vigil o'er the vasty deep,
  While the wild wave dashes.

Fairest bowers where Flora reigns,
  And the sun's rays meet her;
Fields where tanned and stalwart swains
Heap upon the heavy trucks
Fruitful August's harvest shucks,
  Offering to Demeter.

Velvet lawns of richest green,
  Where with tight-strung racket,
Clad in flannels light and clean,
Oft we hit the rubber pill,
Just as oft through lack of skill
  Tried in vain to track it.

Moonlit nights upon the peak,
  Where we'd sit and sigh an Old, old tale, cheek meeting cheek;
Dreaming, too, of days long gone,
When the fair Endymion
  Dallied with his Dian.

Fare ye well both one and all,
  Lawns and hills and billows,
For I hear the City's call;
Therefore soothe my aching brow,
As you see me, sitting now
  Weeping 'neath the willows.

The King has approved of the presentation of the Rev. R. P. Waugh, curate of St. Philip's, Stepney, and assistant chaplain at the London Hospital, to the Crown living of Stonehouse, Gloucestershire, which is of the net value of about £300 a year, with house, and vacant by the preferment of the late vicar.

The Deanery of Lincoln is worth £2,000 a year, with an excellent modern residence. When this preferment became vacant early in the forties it was offered by Sir Robert Peel to Mr. Ward, rector of St. James', Piccadilly, who was expected to refuse it, in which case it would have been offered to F. D. Maurice. Sir Robert Peel informed the Queen that Archbishop Howley was of the opinion that Mr. Maurice's appointment would greatly please the King of Prussia. Mr. Ward, however, accepted it. Dean Jeremie, who died early in the seventies, divided his time between Lincoln and Cambridge, where he held a well-endowed Chair of Divinity. He took little interest in the Cathedral or its affairs, and the services were then most slovenly. He was a man of great learning, with a keen love of art and literature, and a noted bon vivant. Archbishop Benson (then at Wellington College) was charmed with the Deanery when he visited Lincoln in 1869, and he particularly praised Dr. Jeremie's "plain but perfect table." On the death of Dean Jeremie the Deanery was offered by Mr. Gladstone to Dr. Lightfoot (afterwards Bishop of Durham), who refused it, and an attempt was then made to obtain the appointment of Dr. Benson. Dean Wickham's predecessor was "Butler of Wantage," who carried out all kinds of valuable improvements and reforms at the Cathedral.

The Prime Minister has presented the Rev. W. J. Carr Smith to the important living of Grantham, vacant by the preferment of Bishop MacCarthy, which is worth about £700 a year, with house. Mr. Smith worked for some years in the diocese of Lichfield, and he afterwards went to Australia as incumbent of a large church at Sydney. The appointment has not been well received in the diocese, for it is thought that the living of Grantham (which is one of the "plums" of the Bishop of Lincoln's patronage, though the presentation has passed on this occasion to the Crown owing to the vacancy in the see) should have been given to one of the Lincolnshire clergy, and there are several who have well earned such preferment. When Mr. Carr Smith received the offer of the Rectory of Grantham he had just been presented to the living of Madresfield, Worcestershire, by Lord Beauchamp, who made his acquaintance in Australia.

The Bishop of Salisbury leaves England for the United States on Wednesday, September 14, and he will be away until November 9, when he expects to return to his diocese. He is to deliver the course of Hale lectures, and he will fulfil several preaching and other engagements.

Bishop Edwards has appointed Archdeacon Wynne Jones to the Deanery of St. Asaph, which will become vacant in November by the resignation of Dean Shadrach Pryce, who has held this office for eleven years. The stipend is £700 a year, with residence. Canon Fletcher, Rector of Marchwiel, succeeds the new Dean as Archdeacon of Wrexham, with canonry in the cathedral annexed. The residentiary stall vacated by Canon Fletcher's preferment is to be filled by the Rev. Daniel Davies, vicar of Wrexham. The stipend of a canon of St. Asaph is £350 a year, with house.

Canon Holland is to be the canon in residence and Sunday afternoon preacher at St. Paul's Cathedral during September, replacing Chancellor Newbolt.

A good deal has been heard recently of the grievance which young men and young women trained to become elementary school-teachers have against the London County Council. Of the last batch of nearly 1,000 who passed out of the L.C.C. Training Colleges only 100 received appointments in London County Council provided schools, the remaining 850 being turned adrift to find berths for themselves as best they may. Yet at the same time the L.C.C. advertises that teachers outside the London service are eligible for appointment in the Council's schools. In other words, the L.C.C. takes boys and girls, dangles before them and their parents the prospect of a career, induces them to spend seven years of their lives in fitting themselves for a profession, and when the training is complete tells nine out of ten of them that it has no employment to offer them. Were a private firm to embark in such a business, sooner or later it would find a place in Truth Cautionary List, and deservedly so.

But apart from the scandalous injustice of this procedure to the students themselves there is the public point of view to be considered. The cost of the training of a public elementary school teacher is approximately £300. A considerable portion of this is borne by the unfortunate ratepayers, who groan under the systematic increase of the rates. According to the latest showing each teacher produced by the L.C.C. Training Colleges for service in an L.C.C. school represents an expenditure of somewhere about £3,000. If this is the best the L.C.C. can do with the ratepayers' money in training teachers it will be well for them to get out of the business as speedily as possible. A more hopelessly extravagant system for its purpose could not be devised, and it is a pretty commentary upon the capacity of those who devised it for gauging the relationship between supply and demand.

The command of the Northern Army in India will be vacant next month by the resignation (through ill-health) of Lieutenant-General Sir Josceline Wodehouse, who has held this post since November, 1908. He is to leave Bombay on his return to England on Saturday, October 8.

Captain Lord Frederick Blackwood is to vacate the adjutancy of the South Notts Hussar Yeomanry in a few days, and in December he will rejoin his regiment, the 9th Lancers, which will then arrive from South Africa at Canterbury, to replace the 21st Lancers, who are going to Egypt.

The time has come when the Army Council might act with advantage upon the hint given by a correspondent in a recent issue of Truth, namely, that councillors should be out and about among the troops during manœuvres. Much of the present unpopularity of the Army Council is due to its members shutting themselves up in their rooms and burying themselves in minute papers and statistical returns. This effacement was never intended by the Esher Committee, and is a departure from traditional practice. What the Army Council do not understand is that the Commander-in-Chief's mantle must be worn by members both inside and outside the War Office. The King's Regulations recognise this by giving the Council a flag and a salute of nineteen guns on arrival at and departure from a military station. The flag has never yet been flown, and the salute never fired. It is a complete mistake to regard these things as ceremonial formalities devoid of meaning and utility.

---

The Army is a human institution, and must not be treated as a lifeless machine. Technical and routine inspections by the Inspector-General of the Forces cannot take the place of special occasion visits by the Army Council. The German Army is well provided with inspectors, but the German Emperor as Commander-in-Chief is always going about and seeing for himself. Our Admiralty Commissioners do the same, being constant visitors in their corporate capacity to dockyards, victualling depôts, and naval bases.

---

Mr. Haldane is the only member of the Army Council who ever takes the field, and when he does so he invites his political colleagues, but never his military advisers, to accompany him. After all, autumn manœuvres are meant for business, and not to provide Cabinet Ministers with outings in agreeable company. Both the Adjutant-General and Quartermaster-General should be constantly at the elbow of the Secretary of State, not in order to interfere with the conduct of the manœuvres, but to inform their chief and themselves as to what is going on, and to show their faces to the troops whom they govern.

The Indian Pioneer asks how and from where Truth gets information about the Indian Army. The answer is, Not from the reports of inquisitive scribes nor from inspired official sources, but from members of the Service, who regard it as the best channel for making things known which ought to be known. The independent evidence of such witnesses is more representative of military public opinion than that of manufactured communiqués sent down from Simla.

According to the Allahabad journal, the Indian Army is pleased at Sir O'Moore Creagh's change of front in the matter of selection for promotion. On the day when this expression of opinion appeared in print a certain major, whom I have no wish to pillory, but who, during the Kitchener régime, had been several times passed over for the post of second-in-command, was appointed to command his regiment, being at the same time gazetted as second-in-command in order to give him colourable qualification for the higher office of commandant. The appointment astonished the whole Army, as it would astonish the public were all the circumstances connected with it made known.

---

Since the Pioneer now wears the Commander-in-Chief's livery, I suggest that it should obtain from his excellency a return showing the number of failures in the examinations of officers for tactical fitness to command now and five years ago. The return would interest the public as indicating the differing views of Sir O'Moore Creagh and Lord Kitchener in regard to qualifications for regimental commands. According to my information the examinations are now a farce.

---

Lord Kitchener was a prejudiced but not weak commander-in-chief. Often unjust to a good officer, he was never lenient to a bad one. His ruthless methods of selection and rejection did more than [illegible] organising ability to make the Indian Army the efficient fighting machine which he left behind him in India. There was grumbling then, but it came from the inefficient; there is grumbling now, but it comes from those who were promoted by Lord Kitchener for their worth, and are now being passed over by men whom they formerly superseded for incompetence. It is time that Sir O'Moore Creagh had a senior officer at his elbow instead of a young cavalry major of thirteen years' service to advise him in regard to appointments and promotions.

---

The question of their pay is not the only cause of the discontent which is rife among the military assistant surgeons of the Indian Subordinate Medical Department. Many resent quite as keenly the obstacles that are placed in the way of their professional advancement. Their Government certificates entitle them to practise medicine, surgery, and midwifery in India, but not in the United Kingdom or elsewhere. The service is chiefly recruited from the domiciled British community, and not a few of the men are eager to improve their status by securing a British degree. For the sake of the efficiency of the service, as well as in the interests of officers desiring to practise their profession after their retirement on a meagre pension, one would think that they would be encouraged to do this. On the contrary, I am told, their superiors in India made it increasingly difficult for them to come to England on leave for that purpose, whilst the medical education authorities here no longer offer them the facilities they formerly enjoyed. Not unnaturally the members of the I.S.M.D. ascribe this policy to a jealous determination of the I.M.S. to maintain their own supremacy.

A soldier thinks the following experience of the provision of work by the Government for its own men is worthy of record, and I quite agree. He completed twenty-one years' service with the colours towards the end of last year, leaving with the rank of colour-sergeant. In January he registered for employment at the new torpedo factory at Greenock when it should be opened. No result followed till July 28, when he was told to report himself at the factory for employment, and learned that he could have a job as a labourer at 21s. a week. He declined this attractive offer, knowing, as he says, that he could get a labourer's job elsewhere at higher wages. His discharge certificate testifies that he is "a very good clerk," character "very good," "temperate in his habits," and has a first-class certificate of education. Yet the Government which gives this testimonial after twenty-one years' service can do nothing better for the man than make him a labourer at 21s. a week!

---

Captain Neumann, Director of the School of Aeronautics at Friedrichshafen, has just published a useful book ("Die internationalen Luftschiffe") which gives an up-to-date account of international progress in the matter of dirigible airships. Germany leads the way with twenty-one airships built, building, and projected, France coming second with nine. The French, however, have forty-two aeroplanes equipped and manned for military service, whereas this side of aviation has been ignored by the German General Staff, whose aerial energies have hitherto been wholly directed to the development of dirigibles.

---

It is truly amusing to learn from the halfpenny papers that Germany is suffering from a "British Spy Scare." It is but a few months ago since these journals were recording visions of German airships all over the United Kingdom, and it must have been just about this time last year that a troop of mounted German officers was reported to have ridden through England and Scotland taking notes and photographs. Perhaps one of these days some power will the giftie gie us to see ourselves as we see others, when we shall be a wiser as well as a happier people. The Germans seem to have this advantage of us, that they have really caught Englishmen at work with cameras. We have never got as far as that. We only know of the German spies among us through what somebody has told a newspaper about what he heard from somebody else who had a friend or relative who saw the dread apparition in the flesh.

---

What may be the truth about the "British spies" now awaiting trial in Germany I do not know. But assuming, for the sake of argument, that they were in pursuit of information, whether "on spec." or on order, for our Government, it seems desirable to impress on our German friends, equally with ignorant people at home, that all European Governments are more or less engaged in spying on the military and naval preparations of their neighbours. It is part of the recognised business of every military and naval administration to inform itself about what its foreign rivals are doing. As long, therefore, as civilised nations choose to live in a state of perpetual suspicion and intermittent panic about the designs of their neighbours, the spy will be a necessity of the situation. His presence in a country is no more a proof of hostile intentions than the building of warships or the drilling of troops. His work is part of the business of preparing for war, by which we are all engaged—William II. among the rest—in securing the maintenance of peace.

My meaning trace;

I caught it first from you!"

In spite of the perfection of their spy system during the Russian War, the Japanese Intelligence Department got most of their information from the Russian press, which was more reliable than the reports of local spies. An interesting account of how this was done appears in a recent number of the Razvyedchik. A Japanese agent established at Copenhagen received the Russian papers within three days of their publication, and telegraphed all useful extracts direct to the Chief of the Intelligence Department in the field. At a critical period of the campaign, when the Japanese General Staff were nonplussed as to the whereabouts of the 53rd Russian Division, which was known to have arrived at the seat of war, but could not be located, the following notice, which appeared one morning in the Novoe Vremya, was telegraphed to Army headquarters in Manchuria:—"Nursing Sister Maria Kisliakova informs her friends that her address is: 1st Army, 53rd Division, Hospital No. 116, at Kai-lung-cheng." In future campaigns Russian nursing sisters will doubtless be told to keep their addresses to themselves till the war is over.

TRUTH CAUTIONARY LIST for 1910, 128 pages bound in cloth, price 1s. net, by post 1s. 2d., is now ready, and may be obtained from all booksellers and railway bookstalls.

THE R.M.S. "DUNOTTAR CASTLE," of the Union-Castle Line (the only large steamer 100 A1 at Lloyd's entirely devoted to Pleasure Cruises), is chartered for:—£12 12s.—Oporto, Lisbon, Cadiz (for Seville), Gibraltar, Tangier, September 16-30. £18 18s.—Naples, Montenegro, Dalmatia, Venice. Corfu, October 1-20. Also later cruises Palestine and Egypt.—Cruising Co., Ltd., 5, Endsleigh Gardens, London, N.W.

The appointment of Rear-Admiral Sir Douglas Gamble, K.C.V.O., to a signal course and a war course, to which I referred in last week's Truth, has been followed by his appointment to succeed Sir Henry Jackson in the command of the First Cruiser Squadron. This selection comes as a little surprise to the Service, for it had been generally understood that Sir George Warrender would get this post.

Captain W. J. S. Alderson has been gazetted to recommission the cruiser Isis, undated. Until recently he has been borne in the President for service with the Royal Naval Reserves. Captain Alderson went through the Egyptian war as a cadet in the Agincourt, and as a lieutenant in the Melita took an active part in the Dongola expedition of 1896.

The Greenwich Hospital living of Greystead, Northumberland, vacant by the resignation of the Rev. C F. Miles, has been given to the Rev. C. J. Harper, who has been a naval chaplain for nearly fourteen years, and is now serving on board the battleship Agamemnon in the Home Fleet.

A point worth attention, apropos of last week's observations on the treatment of a corporal of Marines at Stonehouse, is the defective provision for the defence of prisoners before naval courts-martial. The "prisoner's friend" permitted by the rules is invariably a junior officer—either an assistant-paymaster or an engineer-lieutenant. However conscientious he may be, he is at a disadvantage. Against him is arrayed a tribunal composed of officers much senior to himself. He has to fight the traditional prejudice which takes it for granted that no man is sent for court-martial unless he is guilty of the offence with which he is charged, and holds him so until he is proved innocent. The men of the lower-deck know this so well that unless they can afford the cost of employing a lawyer to defend them they will accept summary punishment under any circumstances rather than demand a court-martial.

---

A report has gained currency in Service circles to the effect that the high rate of pay to submarine officers and ratings is to be reduced, the reason alleged being that scientific progress has eliminated much of the special danger of submarine service. I have it on the best authority that, whilst it has been under consideration to revise the scale of special allowances, the alteration would not affect those already serving. Possibly the extra pay has become somewhat disproportionate to the risk under improved conditions. Setting aside danger, the routine of a submarine is pretty easy work, and the attraction of double pay is found to bring volunteers enough and to spare, so I suppose the Admiralty have awakened to the possibility of saving some of their money.

---

That phantom perennial, the funnelless battleship, was set afloat again last week by a Portsmouth evening paper, and received with acclamation by the London press. Journalistically she is quite as good as the big gooseberry, and offers more points for assertion and contradiction. The best possible use was made of the opportunity, and we were assured that the Admiralty had here a design that was going to render all the Dreadnoughts obsolete. As a matter of fact, since the Rattler experiments with internal-combustion engines nothing of particular note has been done in this direction, although the subject is engaging the attention of the Admiralty. But in the name of common sense is it to be supposed that such a very experimental innovation will make its first appearance in a big and costly battleship?

---

I have learned with much regret that a paragraph which appeared in Truth a fortnight ago with reference to the Navy Employment Agency has given grave offence to certain gallant officers connected with that institution. The gist of the paragraph was the suggestion that the establishment of the Government labour bureaux has deprived the Agency of its raison d'être, and that the Admiralty is no longer justified in making it a grant of £1,000 a year. But the paragraph went on to criticise the advertisement of the Agency as "purely philanthropic," asking who were the holders of the 5 per cent. debentures, and how the salaries of over £1,000 a year are allocated. From an interview which I have had with the hon. treasurer and a member of the committee it appears that this has been taken to imply some insinuation against the bona fides of the institution and its managers, if not a suggestion that they deserve to be included among the bogus charity-mongers who figure from time to time in the columns of Truth. I am bound to say that I do not consider that the language used was fairly open to any such defamatory interpretation. As, however, that is the feeling of some of the gentlemen concerned, I beg to disclaim the intention of imputing anything dishonourable to anybody. To this I may add that the representatives of the Agency have promptly furnished information on the points on which it was suggested that information was desirable.

---

It seems that the Agency not long since started a motor school—I think at Portsmouth—for the purpose of training ex-Navy men as chauffeurs, etc., which has been done with highly satisfactory results. Capital necessarily had to be found for this purpose, and £2,000 was advanced by various officers interested in the scheme, most of them being already subscribers to the society. Debentures were given to them as security for their loan, and, judging from the accounts, the security is by no means excessive; in fact, it may be doubted whether the necessary money could have been raised elsewhere upon the security. There is obviously nothing here which disentitles the Agency to describe itself as "purely philanthropic." As regards the salaries, I have seen the whole list, and they are certainly not excessive. If the total looks rather high, the fact is explained by the necessary cost of the staff at the motor school.

---

So much for the question of "philanthropy." In view, however, of what was said in Truth about the Admiralty grant, I feel also bound to mention that this grant was made for the first time in August last, that it was only made on the express understanding that it was expended on certain extensions of the work of the Agency which the Admiralty desired to see carried out, and that a special account in respect of the grant appears in the report, showing how the money has been expended. As the Agency has been at work for some fifteen years, it cannot be said to be dependent on the Government grant for its existence, and I gather from the gentlemen who came to see me that they do not consider that the grant has been of unmixed advantage to their work, and that if the grant were withdrawn they would carry on business as before. They are of opinion that they can do much better for the men than any Government bureau, and that the men will never patronise freely a Government institution of that kind.

Possibly there is something in their view of the case. At any rate, it is obvious that an institution like the motor school is something quite beyond the scheme of the official labour bureaux, and it is not surprising to hear that it supplies a want among employers as well as among the men. I should think that any one wanting a thoroughly efficient and trustworthy chauffeur could not do better than apply to the Navy Employment Agency.

A traveller related to me the other day that on a broken box of cigarettes, containing about seven dozen, and bought in London at 7s. 6d. per 100, he was charged nine francs duty by the French Customs. This was at the examination of registered baggage in Paris. I can't say that I know exactly how the French duty on cigarettes works out, never having been under the unfortunate necessity of paying it myself. But it can hardly amount to 100 per cent. It strikes me that foreign Custom-house officers must sometimes make a bit for themselves as well as their Government when they are dealing with the helpless tourist.

There has lately been an instructive correspondence in the Times of Ceylon on the sweating of superintendents of tea and rubber estates, and I have myself received some letters suggesting that the matter should be pressed upon the attention of shareholders here. It is represented that one rupee per cultivated acre per mensem forms a fair general basis for a superintendent's salary, but many estates pay somewhat less than this, and there are a considerable number which only give about half that amount, and even then allow no commission on profits. My Colombo contemporary observes that the planters who accept these small salaries are wanting in a proper appreciation of their market value. It has certainly been understood that one of the difficulties in connection with the rapid development of the rubber industry in the Middle East is the dearth of qualified managers, and if really efficient superintendents are working for inadequate remuneration in Ceylon it must be largely owing to their own lack of enterprise.

No doubt it is the moral duty of shareholders in companies to see that the men they employ are paid a fair wage. I am afraid, however, that it is hopeless for employees, especially when they are in distant lands, to expect that this duty will be discharged spontaneously. The average shareholder probably considers that he has done all that is required when he has joined in the customary vote of thanks to the staff, and if the latter require some more substantial recognition of their labours they must take care to make their claims known.

As its promotion by the Royal Institute of British Architects suggests, the forthcoming International Town-Planning Conference will be mainly concerned with the artistic side of the question, which has hitherto received less attention than its legal and sanitary aspects. Mr. Burns's Act of 1909 has for the first time empowered local authorities to give a proper regard to æsthetic considerations, as well as to the health and convenience of the community, in the construction of new towns and suburbs or the improvement of old ones; but as to the lines upon which such works should be carried out there is still much room for discussion. A conference at which many distinguished experts from many countries will be able to collate their views and experiences ought to be extremely helpful, and its value and interest will be enhanced by the exhibition of designs and illustrations of town-planning and remodelling at Burlington House.

The Post Office authorities have finally decided not to issue the twopenny stamp of a new design which had just been completed when King Edward died. The entire stock of these new stamps is to be destroyed, except a very few copies which will be kept for the Post Office Museum and the British Museum. This stamp will be regarded as the very scarcest of all British issues.

The Norwich Corporation has turned a deaf ear to the complaint of Postwick at being made into a dumping ground for the city's sewage. Meanwhile the weather has had a suggestion of summer about it, and the plague of flies and the plague of smells have made the lives of the inhabitants of Postwick a burden to them. They have even no one to whom to complain, for the Norwich Corporation Sewage Committee is taking its holiday. I would advise the Postwick sufferers to try Mr. John Burns. He is not so fond of holidays as Corporation Committees, and I do not suppose that he will find the health of Postwick a matter of indifference.

The Standing Joint Committee of the County of Haddington last week considered the question of holidays for the police. The chief constable reported that the proposed scheme would entail the addition of four policemen to the county force and an outlay of £288. The thrifty Scots were horrified. They came to the conclusion that the policemen had all the holidays they needed. Mr. Gilbert's contrast between the joyous leisure of the enterprising burglar and the hard lot of the policeman must appeal strongly to the Haddington constabulary.

---

The way in which members of public bodies view the holiday question when it applies to their servants and not to themselves was also illustrated at Okehampton last week when a member of the board of guardians pointed out that no arrangements were ever made for giving the officers any holidays. One relieving officer present remarked that he had been in their service eleven years without a holiday. This statement at once incited another guardian to reply that the relieving officers often went to the lunatic asylums and got 5s. for refreshments, and to ask what more they wanted. It was an interesting revelation of what in Bumble's mind constitutes a real holiday.

The one material fact remains—

A bankrupt's estate that has just been administered in the County Court of Durham realised £473, out of which the creditors got £330. That over one-third of the assets should disappear in the shape of costs is nothing out of the common, though it looks specially scandalous in this case, where the only expenses in connection with realisation seem to have been the collection of debts valued at £130 and producing £80. A creditor, in calling attention to the case, protests specially against the trustee getting 12½ per cent. on the amount realised and another 12½ per cent. on the dividends. It seems to me that the scandalous thing is, not that the trustee should be paid for his work at this rate, but that the creditors should have to bear this expense on the top of all the other costs; for example, after the Court and the Board of Trade have grabbed a still greater amount—in this case £65 against the trustee's £49. I wonder whether Mr. Churchill has realised yet what a field for beneficent work lies before him in the reform of the bankruptcy laws.

I presume that the Vagrancy Act in Ireland is the same as that in force in England, and under these circumstances I beg to call the attention of the Irish Secretary to the illegal imprisonment of Patrick M'Caffrey last week by the Clones magistrates. M'Caffrey is an itinerant melodeon player. He was charged with sleeping out, but as he had 16s. in silver and a considerable quantity of coppers in his possession besides the melodeon he could by no possibility be described as without visible means of subsistence. Further, as he is a teetotaler and non-smoker not even the usual excuse of his being a public danger can be offered for locking him up.

The Clones magistrates, and a good many other benches, might very well follow the example of Mr. Plowden, who last week had an Irishman named Jeremiah O'Leary before him charged with sleeping in the open air without visible means of subsistence. "The most wicked man is harmless when he's asleep," remarked the West London Police Court sage, and he dismissed the charge.

It is very rarely, however, that the vagrant obtains any more consideration from Shallow than from Bumble, though occasionally a bench does realise that Bumble's way with a tramp is instinct with neither humanity nor reason. Last week at Retford, for instance, a labourer on the road from Mansfield to Tuxford, where he had been promised a job, had to put up for the night at Retford workhouse. He had been caught in a heavy thunderstorm and arrived soaked to the skin. The workhouse authorities make no provision for drying tramps' clothes, so the man refused to do his task. He was brought the next morning before the Retford bench, who thought his excuse a reasonable one, and dismissed the case, commenting severely upon the callousness of the workhouse authorities.

One of the bogus patent-agent fraternity, a Mr. A. H. E. Holman, was summoned recently before Mr. Hutton at Woolwich Police Court for describing himself as a patent agent, not being so registered under the Act. With a childlike simplicity possible resulting from frequent contact with inventors, he had thought to save himself from proceedings by describing himself as "member of the Society, Patent Agents," but Mr. Hutton told him that he thought this was a fraud and fined him £5 2s., inclusive of costs. He had also described himself as B.Sc. on the strength of having passed a preliminary examination for the degree, and also attached a string of other letters to his name. Unfortunately, most of Mr. Holman's kind are too astute to get a gratuitous advertisement of the true value of their qualifications in the police court.

A couple of severe sentences on poachers have been brought to my notice during the past week. One was at Runcorn, where a man got four months' hard labour for the offence, which he heightened by stealing a rabbit trap. He might have half-killed his wife in almost any part of the United Kingdom without being called on to pay more than a quarter of the penalty. The other case was at Dundee Sheriff Court, where a sixty-year-old labourer was sentenced to a month's imprisonment. In this case a previous conviction no doubt added to the weight of the sentence. The previous conviction took place just twenty-seven years ago, and the Hon. Sheriff-Substitute asked the Fiscal if he was entitled to bring it up. The Fiscal replied in the affirmative, but the Sheriff-Substitute was equally entitled to disregard it, and he would have done so if he had exercised an ordinary modicum of common sense.

The "Rev." W. Browne (No. 7 Truth Cautionary List) has apparently found the "Larger Hope Society" a failure and degenerated into a peripatetic beggar. At any rate, when he appeared before the Manchester magistrates last week on a charge of neglecting his child, whereby it had become chargeable to the Poor-Law authorities, his recent career, as stated in court, shows him to be the same dissolute old rascal he has been for many years past. He made his appearance in Manchester last October and sponged for a while on local charity. Next he went to Glasgow, leaving his wife behind him, and there he also imposed on local benevolence until his drunken habits betrayed him. When he returned to Manchester it was not to his wife, but to another woman, and he was arrested at her house in a low quarter of the town. This is the gentleman who, a couple of years ago, called at this office and appealed to me for assistance on the ground that I had ruined his charitable "work" by making known the fact that he had received seven years' penal servitude for a particularly heartless bigamy. He is now doing a month's hard labour for a change.

A couple of begging letters which have come into my possession would seem to show that the "repentant sinner" lay has its attractions as a money getter. One of these was addressed from 74, Woodfield Road, Camp Hill, Birmingham, to a young man whose death had been announced two days previously in the Times. The writer signed himself Henry Prescott Swan, and after claiming schoolfellowship with the deceased gentleman, went on to explain that he had just been released from prison, and having nobody but his mother and a "true hearted girl" to look to in his disgrace, begged for "a few pounds" to help him make a new start. If Swan has really come out of gaol, it is a pity. If he has not been there at all, it seems desirable that the omission should be rectified.

The other letter is from a Miss Agnes McCann, of 144, Sirdar Road, Wood Green. Agnes explains that she loved not wisely, and that the object of her affection, a Mr. Laidler, turned out to be a married man. He found a home for her and her little ones, but one day, borrowing all her savings, he deserted her. He had, however, mentioned the name of a friend, and to this gentleman Agnes wrote imploring him to assist her in finding the father of her children. She is quite sure that if he knew of her present straits he would do something to assist them. As the gentleman to whom she wrote knew nothing of either the writer or any Mr. Laidler, he came to the conclusion that Agnes was more ingenious than ingenuous. That is also my opinion, and I am wondering whether he is the only one who has received inquiries as to the whereabouts of the missing Mr. Laidler.

The professional hand also seems to be visible in a letter written by a Mr. C. E Wyatt, of 23, Cambridge Road, Seaforth, Liverpool, to a total stranger. Wyatt does not ask you to give him any money. He only wants a loan for which he will gladly pay 5 per cent. interest, and further, as "a slight proof of his gratitude," he will when out of his present difficulties set aside a small sum yearly to be placed at the lender's disposal "to help some poor fellow who may be in similar trouble." The trouble is the repayment of a debt which he is utterly unable to meet, and threatens him with the loss of his home. He reinforces his plea with references to his family and to his trouble having brought him to "pray earnestly day and night," although previously he has not "led as good a life" as he should have done. "When the devil is sick, the devil a saint would be," and I fear the chance of any other poor fellow benefiting, even if Wyatt gets his loan at 5 per cent., would be of the slightest.

A Yorkshire correspondent states that bank officials in the North are being imposed upon by an individual who introduces himself as a former manager of a branch of Barclay's Bank. Watching for any member of the staff who leaves a bank, he comes forward with a plausible tale to account for his destitute condition, and begs for assistance to secure food and lodging. It is true that he was once employed by Barclay's, but his story of his downfall is not so veracious, and those who help him are wasting their charity.

It seems to be just about as difficult to kill or cure your quack as it is for the quack to kill or cure his patients. Derk P. Yonkerman is a case in point. He occupies a niche (No. 125) in Truth Cautionary List, the Lancet has exposed his pretentions, and the humbug of the claims made on behalf of his specific for consumption has been revealed in "Secret Remedies." Yet the Derk P. Yonkerman Company, Limited, still flourishes, and is still engaged in blarneying phthisical patients into dosing themselves with Tuberculozyne. One such patient, who recently gave the stuff a month's trial, at a cost of 50s., without producing any perceptible improvement in his health, has sent me the letters with which the company has since bombarded him. These all insist on the necessity for his not missing a dose or a day of the treatment, and the company urge him "as we would a brother or sister, father or mother, friend or associate," to continue it. There is scarcely any country but England where this sort of trade can now be carried on with profit and impunity.

A new body has been formed for combating consumption. Its title is "The National Tuberculosis Association," and its headquarters are in Bow, London, E. Its chairman is Captain J. B. Friend, O.L.M., F.I.D. The captaincy is, I understand, a territorial distinction, O.L.M. stands for Order of the League of Mercy, and the F.I.D. for Fellowship of the Institute of Directors. The association is, in fact, the outcome of Captain Friend's desire to do something to help stay the great white plague. No doubt he means well, but I should think he will find that there are enough labourers in this field already, many of them with better qualifications for the work than he can lay claim to.

A favourite device adopted by the free-portrait tricksters as a lever to extract payment for an enlargement is the retention of the photograph originally entrusted to them. This method was attempted recently by one Bertram Louis Cray, trading as the Savoy Art Academy at 43, Copeland Road, Leyton, and it was not until a solicitor had threatened to communicate with the police that he could be prevailed to return the photograph entrusted to him. The incident may serve both as a warning to people not to entrust photographs to Cray, and as an example of the means by which they may recover them.

Burt Maxim, 7, Temple Lane, E.C., also "of Newmarket," solicits subscriptions for his Turf tips in a circular which is scarcely flattering to the recipients. He observes that he has taken their names from a list of those who have "fallen victims to the harpies who infest this business." In other words, he reminds them that they are flats. For evidence of his own bona fides he refers to the Sportsman's Protection Association, 100, Stroud Green Road, N., of which he is "an approved and duly guaranteed member." Doubtless the association will say of Maxim precisely what Maxim says of himself, and from what I know of the intelligence of the greenhorns to whom he appeals I think he is quite justified in assuming that in their case once bit does not mean twice shy.

People are very fond of writing to me in praise of the moneylender. They generally cite some case that has come under their notice in which a moneylender has behaved with remarkable liberality, or it may be downright generosity, and on the strength of this they hint that in pillorying usurers Truth is doing grave wrong to a highly estimable body of men. This is much like arguing that because a burglar has been known to give away some of his hard-earned gains in charity the police and the judges ought not to be down on burglars when they are caught at work, and the press ought not to say unkind things about them.

In the last communication of this nature with which I have been favoured, the noble conduct of the moneylender is accentuated by contrasting it with the scurvy action of a banker. The banker refused to lend on "security of undoubted stability and securing a yearly income equal to the sum of the required loan." The moneylender lent without security and "at a moderate premium over interest" (rate of interest not mentioned). Bankers have their own rules in regard to the securities on which they lend, and they ought to adhere to them strictly—not only for their own sakes, but for the sake of all those who trust them with their money. English banks would not have the reputation they have throughout the world if they made loans on sentimental grounds. A professional moneylender deals with his own money, has no one to consider but himself, can take what risks he pleases, and charge what he thinks fit. If he chooses for once in a way to oblige a solvent client with a loan at a moderate rate of interest, that is no reason why he should not be denounced when he uses clients' necessities to suck them dry without conferring any shadow of benefit on them.

---

Such a long time has elapsed since I have heard anything of Edward Shuckburgh, the Bristol moneylender, whose name used to be so familiar to readers of Truth, that I had almost forgotten his existence. But the fact that he is still very much alive has been brought to my notice by a correspondent who has sent me a copy of the Bristol Times and Mirror for August 15, containing a long report of a case before the Bath magistrates in which Shuckburgh was charged with obtaining £150 from a widow without disclosing to her the fact that he was an undischarged bankrupt. As he was committed for trial I cannot, of course, at present comment on the case, but I note with interest that he still pursues his professional career at 80, Castle Street, Bristol, as "The Castle Loan Office."

---

An ingenious method of providing himself with capital appears to have been hit upon by a Portsmouth moneylender, E. Wallace, of 210, Shearer Road. He advertised recently for smart men to take charge of branch offices, and to applicants he explained that he wanted £50 cash security, offering them in return a six months' appointment at a salary of 20s. a week, plus 5 per cent. commission on advances to customers. Smart men who want to go in for the moneylending business will not be quite so smart as they think themselves if they accept this offer.

---

In a paragraph last week it was stated that one Hyman Lewis, a moneylender, of 15, Hanover Street, had registered the Ivanhoe Hotel, Great Russell Street, W., as his place of residence. It was also mentioned that Lewis had registered a great many addresses as places where he carries on business, and that the file at Somerset House contains a letter from an hotel-keeper saying that he is willing to allow his premises to be used for the purpose of such business. To prevent any possible misconception I am asked to explain that this letter did not emanate from the management of the Ivanhoe Hotel, or refer in any way to that establishment, and, furthermore, that the proprietors, Cranston's Hotels Company, Limited, would never under any circumstances countenance in any of their hotels business of the nature transacted by Lewis. In filling up the registration form, the latter seems to have named the Ivanhoe as his residence on the strength of the fact that he has occasionally stayed there. This was not only an impudent proceeding of which the company has a right to complain, but practically it was an evasion of the regulations as to the registration of moneylenders.

An engaging trait in the character of the touting moneylenders is the free and easy way in which they appropriate one another's new ideas in effective and killing circulars A week or two ago I described one of these novelties, produced by "Rosslyn Stuart," of Croydon. A duplicate of it has since been forwarded to me bearing the classic names of Eldridge and Morris, of 38, Museum Street. Which of the rivals was first in the field I have no means of knowing, but he ought to have registered his design, for there is no honour among usurers, whatever may be the case among certain other parties.

Have any of my readers heard anything of a scheme for founding a "National Memorial Home" in memory of the late King? I have been unable to obtain any information regarding it through the usual channels, though in a letter written recently a lady calling herself Mrs. Buck announces that she has "£100,000 to beg" for the purpose, and that she is "busy forming committees and organising street collections all over the place" with this object in view. If she is the Mrs. Buck whom I believe her to be her record is not one to inspire confidence in the future of any charitable scheme she sets afoot. My Mrs. Buck has a variety of names. At one time or another she has been Mrs. Burke, Mrs. Spencer, Mrs. Maxwell, Sister Annie, and Sister Amy, and her addresses are as various as her aliases, for within the past few years she has lived at Bedford, Woodford, St. Albans, and Gorleston. At the latter place she was charged with obtaining money under false pretences, but was discharged with a warning to be more careful in future.

Cawnpore is the headquarters of a concern known as the Indian Co-operative Bank, Limited, which claims that it is working on principles quite different from those on which ordinary banks work. This is perfectly true. A correspondent sends me a copy of a "confidential" circular letter in which Avadh Behari Lal, the chief manager, invites applications for various appointments in branches of the bank all over India. Not only must every employee hold a certain number of shares according to the value of his appointment, but even the would-be employee must subscribe for at least one share when he forwards his application, and he must also pay Rs. 1.4 for the company's articles of association, which alone will enlighten him as to the "special privileges" the bank will confer upon him. "We would like to take you in," the chief manager writes. That is obviously the object of the circular.

The latest defiance of the law in regard to the distribution of lottery tickets is made by the Northern Credit Bank, Ltd., Copenhagen. The lottery appears to be a more or less private enterprise on the part of the Bank, which offers 20 millions (francs) in gold in prizes, though it is mentioned in the prospectus that the enterprise is legally authorised. In order to inspire confidence, I suppose, the Bank forwards a ticket for the first drawing, and asks that 10s. shall be forwarded for it, while as additional bait to the gambler there is also enclosed a "propaganda ticket," nominal value 2s., any prize won with which is payable to the holder provided he has joined a ticket society in Copenhagen called H. Andersen, Ltd. The chances of winning anything are meagre enough in the State-guaranteed lotteries of the smaller European States, and what they are likely to be in a privately-managed concern Heaven only knows.

The reputation of Bond Street as the headquarters of the fortune-telling industry is well maintained by Zazra, a gentleman who will either read the stars for you or sell you the Indian Fakir Mirror as used by the Jadoo Wallah of Hindoostan for 15s. One of Zazra's circulars came to me the other day viâ Australia. It commenced "Salaam your Well-born" —a most convincing example of Baboo English—and came at once to the point by informing the person to whom it was addressed that he was just entering a critical period of his career. "Why do I know this?" asks Zazra. "It is my gift to find out everything," he answers in the next sentence. It is a pity he cannot find out that he is wasting postage on people who return his circulars to Truth Office.

In these days anybody with an idea for the betterment or spoliation of his fellow creatures usually starts a league to carry it out, but rarely have I come across a more ingenuous enterprise of the sort than one explained in a document which is being issued from 24, Hatherley Street, Prince's Avenue, Liverpool. It gives an account of the working of the "National Lithuano-Polish and International League of All the Friends of Poland." The N.L.P.I.L.A.F.P. is presided over by Prince Zbawca-Riedelski, and it has six different kinds of members, Benefactors, Members of Honour, Acting and Corresponding Members, Delegates, and Supreme Councillors. The Benefactors "are all respectable persons who contribute to the strengthening of the financial position of the League," and their importance is recognised by the conferment upon them of a diploma. I do not anticipate that there will be any great rush to secure the honour of being a B.N.L.P.I.L.A.F.P. The British manufacturers of leagues are quite able to supply the local demand without assistance from enterprising foreigners.

Can anybody give me information respecting a concern styled the Buena Vista Fruit Co., of Boston, Massachusetts? My curiosity has been excited by the fact that a young woman in domestic service was recently induced to pay the company $100 as the first of four annual instalments for the purchase of an acre of land at Omaja, Cuba. According to an extraordinary document purporting to be a "special contract," the company undertakes to plant the land with "citrus fruit" trees, and to continue its cultivation for six years after the completion of the purchase in return for an annual payment of $80, which is to be deducted from "the net income" obtained from the sale of citrus fruits. The contract is embellished with an imposing-looking seal and bears the signatures of Henry Richardson (President), Walter H. Trott, and G. L. Dunning as the "executive board of trustees."

I am told that this remarkable land-peddling business has been "pushed" in London by an individual described as a missionary from Cuba, and the above-mentioned young woman is apparently only one among a number of purchasers. Small ownership schemes are much in favour just now; but an acre of land in Cuba certainly is not a desirable investment for the savings of domestic servants or other humble investors in this country. The Buena Vista Fruit Co. is said to have an accommodation address in London, but the only address given in its "special contract" is "Boston, Massachusetts," and altogether the business is obviously one upon which more light might usefully be thrown.

---

English law on the subject of giving false characters is extraordinarily slack—much more so, I believe, than that of any other country. Here is a good instance of it. A few months ago a gentleman in London engaged a housekeeper who referred him to a lady who proved to be the sister-in-law of the proprietor of a West End hotel. In response to a telephone inquiry the latter stated that the woman in question had been employed at the hotel as housekeeper for eighteen months, and that she would be glad to have her back. The housekeeper proved the reverse of satisfactory, so much so that, after dismissing her, her employer communicated with the proprietor of the hotel, who replied that he only knew the woman as a friend of his sister-in-law, and that she had never been in his employment. No further explanation or satisfaction could be obtained.

---

Following the matter up, the victim discovered that precisely the same trick had been played upon the proprietor of an hotel at Southsea, to whom the same woman had come with the same reference, which had resulted in a similar conversation on the telephone. The same result followed in this case when the victim remonstrated with the proprietor of the London hotel and his sister-in-law. The woman who has obtained situations in this way calls herself Miss Spiers; it may be as well to mention it for the benefit of any other people of whom she may seek situations. But what is of more general interest is that it should be possible to give a false character of this kind with impunity. To make downright false statements in order to enable a person to obtain employment which would not otherwise be given is essentially fraudulent, and there ought to be a summary method of punishing it.

---

A correspondent asks me if my attention has ever been drawn to the starvation trick as practised by boarding-house keepers at the expense of holiday makers at the seaside. He assures me that there are boarding-house keepers who advertise boarding at a low figure, and so secure a large number of applicants for their vacant rooms. Two or three days' experience of the accommodation and tariff is, however, usually sufficient for the guests, and they express a desire to depart. The aggrieved proprietor then insists upon payment for the full period booked under threat of legal proceedings, and the sheep usually consent to be shorn rather than be put to the trouble and expense of defending an action. The moral is, of course, to avoid making contracts in advance for board and lodging at cheap establishments of which you know nothing.

OLD AGE.

After C. S. C.

("There is nothing more pathetic than the sight of unhappy old age."—American newspaper.)

I know not why my head is rack'd,
Or why I'm miserably cold,
I only know this awful fact—
I'm old.
My heart is aching at its core,
My toothless gums are sadly mauled,
My cheeks are sunk; and what is more,
I'm bald.

The songs I sang so long ago
Attract no more as was their wont;
I can't tell why; this much I know—
They don't.
I used to rhyme by day and night
To fill the hollows of my purse,
But now, alas! I scarcely write
A verse.

I sang of love and life and fame,
I carolled blithely like a bird
Until the stuff almost became Absurd.
I laughed till both my sides would shake
When none but I could see the fun,
And very nearly learned to make A pun.

But now I never try to chaff;
I've lost my former ready wit,
And no one ever makes me laugh
A bit.
I rarely wag my withered tongue—
Some think I've had it taken off—
And only use one languid lung
To cough.

The daring deeds I used to do
No longer now appeal to me,
But then I'm either eighty-two Or three.
It's stupid, though, to put in rhyme
The thoughts that surge inside my head;
And gods be thanked! I think it's time
For bed.

SCRUTATOR.

THE SHADY SIDE OF ASSAM.

IT does not appear necessary to continue the discussion of the manners and customs of British residents in Burma, although I have received several further letters on the subject. But in justice to the gentleman whose letter on the various aspects of life in the tea districts of Assam was published a fortnight ago, and answered somewhat vigorously last week by Mr. R. D. Davidson, I feel compelled to publish a further communication from him. Mr. Davidson, in a passage which I omitted from his letter, assumed that this gentleman was a mere casual visitor, whose observations might be dismissed as "travellers' tales." This is not so. My present correspondent has had a lengthy experience of the country and of the tea-planting industry, as his letters imply. I am not responsible for his statements; but before publishing them I am concerned to ascertain that he is a person entitled to credit, and that he is fully acquainted with the matters of which he speaks. This I have done. He now writes:—

I have read Mr. Davidson's letter. It was exactly what I should have expected. He is manager of the Butia Chang Estate in Mongoldei. I do not say that it is the case on his estate, but it is true of many that nowadays, as a consequence of the treatment meted out to employees in Assam, and in spite of frantic efforts to secure gentlemen, a large proportion of the new assistants are really only of the mechanic class. Mr. Davidson says there are no failures in Assam. Not many! At any rate, those that have not found a convenient resting spot under the "matti," "six by three," are, as I stated, so absolutely cut off from their former surroundings by the long exile they have to endure that they give way to the Assam mode of life, which does not much differ from the Burmese. In the Dibrughur district an influx of European ladies has caused many to guard outward appearances more carefully, but the difference is only on the surface. I defy Mr. Davidson to name twenty unmarried planters who have not succumbed to native charms. The authority which youngsters obtain in India is in many cases also the means towards this end. Hence the circular which I mentioned in my previous letter. What other inference can be drawn from it?

In regard to the illegitimate children, I can say from personal knowledge that many fathers send them to the Eurasian Home at Kalimpong, an institution which covers a crying need in India. Here they have to pay sums varying from 30 to 20 rupees monthly for the keep of a child; and the mother, generally a poor coolie woman, as well as the father, a "gentleman," never see the child again. But there are many others not so disposed of. I would ask Mr. Davidson whether he has never been at So-and-So's garden and been told, when the coolies came in from plucking tea to have the leaf weighed, "That is So-and-So's child"? If he has not, which I very much doubt, I have, and can give detailed particulars if necessary. A baboo once asked me why Europeans care so little for their offspring, and quoted the case of two boys whose father is in England now. The children drive the manure cart on the estate; the father a motor-car.

As regards the treatment of employees by their companies (of course, there are some exceptions) the average pay on which a youngster is sent out varies from 125 to 175 rupees (monthly). Out of this he has to procure an outfit, in some cases furnish a bungalow, and keep himself alive. Of course, if he likes fowls of the native indiarubber kind and rice with a few potatoes as his staple diet he ought to feel extremely happy. Everything else costs absurd prices—e.g., a ½-lb. tin of Crosse and Blackwell's jam, 14 annas (1s. 2d.). He may also get a pony allowance of 25 rupees a month, but as he has to keep a syce, a grasscutter, and a pony out of this munificent sum very little is left at the end of the month. Am I not right? He may also (the rules here vary) have to pay for all or the greater part of his servants, and he will find his average monthly bill come to about 30 to 40 rupees in this respect. This excludes the use of a decent cook, a man most youngsters cannot afford. They have to suffer for this later on. Then there is the club and subscriptions to gymkanas. I have known gymkanas to cost the club members £200 in two days; this only in beer and whisky—and the sum had to be borne by thirty men, many of them assistants who could not afford it. There has also to be added the almost yearly trip which malaria obliges a man to take on the Brahmaputra, and which will cost him no less than 50 rupees a week, the volunteer camp expenses, etc. But I leave it to the youngsters out there now to state their grievances.

As to the question of coming home on leave, I should be only too happy to have it proved that more than 15 per cent. of the assistants get home after five years. As regards promotion on return, is it not a fact that in a large number of cases the returning planter is met with the happy news at the "agent's" at Calcutta that the company sees itself obliged to its regret to dispense with Mr. ——'s services? In many cases this is done at home in the last month of the planter's leave. Is it not also a fact that one company, if not two, used to dismiss their men in batches of four and five? I challenge Mr. Davidson to deny that 90 per cent. of the men employed in Assam to-day are not in the service of the company they originally came out to.

In many cases the bungalow, a vision of loveliness in the London office, proves to be a rickety shanty. I have seen the unfortunate occupier in his pyjamas at night nailing up boards in a rainstorm by the light of a flickering hat bati (hand-lamp). The event of bungalows tumbling down suddenly is not altogether unknown.

There is another point which I did not mention in my previous letter, but which will show you that I know what is going on in Assam. It is a fact that children are cruelly overworked in most tea houses. They are made to sleep in the tea house so as to be ready for the next day's work, the interval between the finish and the start of the new work sometimes only amounting to two hours. Parents who object to have their children treated in that way are kept out of their pay until they knuckle under. I have more than once been taken by an indignant assistant down to the tea house in the early hours of the morning, and have seen such children, some only seven and six years old, roused up from their two hours' sleep with blows and cold water to start another twenty hours' working day. I know of one instance where an assistant, to his honour, struck when he was told that he could not get any relief for children who had been working thirty-six hours at a stretch. I have seen them standing with their empty leaf baskets in their tiny hands erect against the wall sound asleep. I have seen them fall down in the middle of a run and go to sleep immediately. Managers are under the necessity of making a profit anyhow; the man who does not gets dismissed. If the year is bad it is the labour that has to pay. It is the system that forces kind-hearted gentlemen, as they are in many cases, to such acts of cruelty. "If I do not make a profit the home board inform the next general meeting that they have been reluctantly obliged to dismiss Mr. X., as the garden made a loss." The shareholders are satisfied that all will rearrange itself now, and Mr. X., with his wife and children, is on the streets.

Does Mr. Davidson think that the sort of scenes described above in which the assistant has to take an active part improve his moral? Will he tell me on how many gardens the records of infant mortality are not faked? He will, perhaps, show me beautiful circulars enjoining the manager to look after his labour, including the child labour; but if a manager does so and works a few annas more expensively than his neighbour, and comparative lists are issued monthly, he gets into trouble.

If Mr. Davidson wants more details of what I have witnessed he can have them. But I think I may leave it safely to Assam to speak for itself.

Three entirely different subjects are covered by this letter: (1) the relations between Englishmen and native women, as to which I think enough has been said; (2) the relations between tea-planting firms and their British employees, as to which I hardly feel in a position at present to express an opinion; (3) the conditions of child labour on the tea estates. My correspondent's allegations on this last point are so serious that I have communicated with him since the receipt of his letter, and have had a long conversation with him on the whole subject. He gave me a very full description of the work that the children have to do both in the gardens and in the factories, and amplified considerably from his personal experience the allegations made above as to their general treatment. The extent to which these abuses prevail throughout the whole tea-growing region may be open to question; but this gentleman's experience has been fairly extensive, and in the face of his evidence I do not see how it can be doubted that the children are grossly overworked—at any rate at certain times—and that they must suffer serious injury in consequence. They seem to be put to work at an age when they are quite unfit for it, unless under strict official regulations and supervision. This is a matter which the Government of India ought to attend to, and it ought not to need more than one hint on the subject. If it is necessary for the State to prevent abuses of child labour in England there must be very much more necessity for its intervention in a country like Assam.

One other letter arising out of the recent articles on "Western Men and Eastern Morals" calls for notice. In speaking generally of the disposition of European exiles in the tropics to adapt themselves to the local standard of morals, I referred to the experience of a friend of mine, who, when on a shooting expedition in British Guiana, discovered a Presbyterian elder living in a sort of Mohammedan style. A gentleman familiar with British Guiana has taken this as a reflection upon the morals of our countrymen in that region, and is at great pains to assure me that there is no ground to-day, whatever there may have been in the past, for any such imputation. He has read the anecdote somewhat more seriously than it was written, and it may relieve him to know that the incident occurred in a very distant past—I am afraid more than thirty years ago. It is satisfactory to be told that owing to the beneficent exertions of Sir Alexander Swettenham the behaviour of the planters in British Guiana is now up to a high standard, though my correspondent, no doubt wisely, declines to commit himself to the statement that there are no exceptions.

HUNTING AN N.C.O.

On Friday, August 12, a district court-martial was held at Shorncliffe, the circumstances of which call imperatively for further notice. The prisoner was Staff-Quartermaster-Sergeant E. J. Olive, of the Army Service Corps, and the charge against him was that on a certain date in April last he forwarded to the Auditor, Eastern Command, a monthly bakery account (Army Form F 700) purporting to be signed by Captain A. Northen, the officer in charge of supplies, which had not been signed by this officer. Although the prisoner was not charged with forging the officer's signature, this was clearly the idea of the prosecution, as Captain Northen in his evidence, after repudiating the signature, which he said was "a fair imitation of his handwriting," stated his belief "that the signature was in the accused's handwriting," and gave reasons for his belief in detail. The prisoner pleaded not guilty, and was defended by a solicitor, Mr. De Wet. Practically the only evidence given was that of Captain Northen on the one side and the prisoner himself on the other. The latter emphatically denied that the signature was in his handwriting; he noticed that the form was signed before he despatched it, and presumed that the signature was Captain Northen's. In cross-examination Captain Northen admitted that a form had been produced to him for certifying that the figures in it—the form which was the subject of the charge—tallied with the figures in the army book; and that it would have been a neglect of duty on his part to omit to sign a form that he had to certify after having checked the figures. If, therefore, the prisoner or anybody else had added the officer's signature to the form after it had been checked, the only conceivable motive for doing so would have been to remedy the officer's own neglect. If the officer did his duty, the signature was his. The Court, after hearing the evidence, acquitted the prisoner.

That a charge of this trivial kind should be made against a senior non-commissioned officer without evidence to support it which a court could reasonably accept is on the face of it a very strange proceeding, strongly suggesting that there was more behind. It is quite certain that there was a great deal more behind, and this is why the whole case calls for further notice. I therefore give from the shorthand note which was taken a portion of Mr. De Wet's speech for the defence recounting the extraordinary treatment of the quartermaster-sergeant by his immediate superiors:—

The accused enlisted on January 22, 1895, in the 2nd Leicestershire Regiment, and he became a full corporal. In November, 1897, he transferred to the Army Service Corps as a clerk, and was stationed at the Curragh Camp, where he remained till March, 1903, and during that time served as chief clerk to Major-General Upton Prior and Major-General Sir Herbert Chermside. He became a sergeant, and was ordered to Hong Kong, where he served three years, returning to England in March, 1906, when he was employed as chief clerk to Major-General Scobell, who was then commanding the 1st Cavalry Brigade at Aldershot.

By this time he had thirteen years' service, and had never been up before any officer for any crime. He was always recommended by his staff officers for promotion when the half-yearly qualification reports had to be forwarded to A.S.C. Record Office, Woolwich, and notice has been given to the prosecution to produce certified extracts from these reports relating to the accused, so that they may be before the court when they are considering the character and bona fides of the accused.

After completion of his staff services the accused was employed in an A.S.C. office, and after about twelve months he was moved to Dover in November, 1908, to be employed in the O.C., A.S.C. Administrative District Office at Guilford Battery, Dover, and was employed on War Department contract work. After being so employed for two months he was placed under arrest for (1) neglect of duty in not sending out tender forms, (2) misappropriating postage money, to both of which charges he would have had a complete answer. A court-martial, however, was refused by the proper authority, and accused was (under para. 490, King's Regulations) released without prejudice by Major C. S. Dodgson, A.S.C., Shorncliffe, who at the time was acting for Lieut.-Colonel A. Long, A.S.C., at Dover, but from that date in January, 1909, up to the present time he has never been re-arrested, nor has the case been dismissed, nor has the accused been even officially informed of the result of that case. The consequence is that he is still under a cloud as to this charge.

The accused at that time had completed fourteen years' service, and had re-engaged to complete twenty-one years' service, and had held the rank of staff quartermaster-sergeant for twelve months.

The prosecution in that case was not satisfied with the refusal of the court-martial, so they determined to get rid of the accused, and applied for his discharge. The accused, however, appealed to the G.O.C. (Colonel Bittlestone) at Dover, who refused to forward the application for discharge.

The prosecution continued their persecution of the accused, as in March, 1909, they applied, under the Army Act, for him to be reduced in rank, but evidently this application was refused, as the accused still retains his rank.

Evidently the prosecution, being foiled in their three attempts, became annoyed at the presence of the accused at Dover, as the accused was sent to Shorncliffe (under observation), and was employed in the office of Major C. S. Dodgson, A.S.C. (the very officer who investigated the case against the accused when the court-martial was refused), and, although he put in a complaint through his company officer, Captain Grose, A.S.C., of being sent to work under officers in the same Dover Administrative District, he received no satisfaction, and had to take up his duties as ordered.

He was first employed in the barrack office on work that he had never done before in the whole of his military career, and was afterwards sent on the manœuvres to Churn Camp as supply clerk to Captain A. Northen, who was supply officer to the 10th Infantry Brigade. He had only been at Churn a couple of days when Captain Northen informed him (pointing to a letter he held in his hand) that he had received a letter from Major C. S. Dodgson to the effect that he (the accused) had to be reported on at the termination of the manœuvres.

On the termination of the manœuvres the accused returned to Shorncliffe, and was ordered to take over the Shorncliffe supply account. This being a peace supply account, which he had never undertaken before, caused a certain amount of anxiety to the accused, knowing as he did that he was to be placed under arrest for the least mistake he made. For some time, in spite of the worry and anxiety, the accused managed to do his work satisfactorily, but the worry and anxiety began to tell on the accused's health, and eventually some slight errors were detected, for which he was crimed and punished. On reference to the accused's regimental conduct sheet it will be seen that the persecution (I can call it by no other name) to which he was subjected became intense, and that he received four or five severe reprimands in about as many weeks. This continual persecution, with the knowledge that the serious accusation of misappropriating postage money was still hanging over him, and that he was a man marked for reduction in rank or dismissal (if possible), caused his health to completely break down, and he was finally compelled to report sick, and on June 14 was admitted to hospital with debility. He was in hospital for five weeks, and was marked up for discharge on July 18, 1910. Whilst in hospital he was informed that he was going to be invalided out of the service, but Captain Wood, R.A.M.C., could not definitely state when he (the accused) would be warned for the invaliding board. . . .

The speech goes on to detail how on coming out of hospital the man found himself under arrest, and the eventual formulation of the charge which was the subject of the court-martial. A number of minor irregularities in the treatment of the prisoner during this period are detailed.

Bearing in mind the trumpery nature of the last charge made against this man, and the fact that the court-martial ended in his acquittal, it cannot possibly be disputed that the defending solicitor was amply justified in speaking of his client as having been "persecuted." The court-martial is merely the last step in a systematic course of persecution which had been going on for upwards of a year and a-half. During this time the man had actually been charged with appropriating money, and a court-martial had apparently been applied for against him and had been refused, yet the charge had never been formally withdrawn. An attempt had been made to get him discharged from the service, and had been vetoed by superior authority; and an attempt had been made to get him reduced, apparently with the like result. He had been put to unfamiliar work, with special instructions that he should be closely watched and reported upon. He was worried and harried till his life became a misery, and his health broke down. Finally, it was thought that a chance had been found of smashing him, and this preposterous charge was vamped up, only to collapse ignominiously when it came before a court of unprejudiced officers drawn from other branches of the service than the Army Service Corps. And this is a man who, until he somehow incurred the enmity of his superiors, had served for thirteen years in responsible positions without ever having an offence recorded against him!

Presumably the War Office must have some official cognizance of the proceedings at this court-martial and the circumstances which led up to it. A question which obviously suggests itself as requiring official consideration at once is what is going to happen next to the man himself? That he should be left any longer to the tender mercies of the officers who have been hounding him for so long would be inconceivable cruelty. He ought to be removed at once as far as possible from Dover and Shorncliffe. But a matter of wider interest is that further inquiry should be made into the story told by the defending solicitor at the court-martial, with a view to steps which may discourage such proceedings in future. One often hears of a dead-set being made against a particular soldier by his immediate superiors, usually with the result that he leaves the Army a broken man. Such allegations are often difficult to believe and always difficult to prove. But here is a case where the facts are all on record and call for very drastic disciplinary measures, unless explanations are forthcoming which will put an entirely different complexion upon them. I am not the only person by any means who will be glad to hear that the Secretary of State or the Army Council is already seeking for such explanations.

OUR COUSINS-GERMAN.

With the exception, perhaps, of a letter, there is no greater give-away of character than a holiday in the neutral cosmopolis of a Swiss hotel. Here you may see the Powers shorn of their background, their prestige, their prejudices. Their girths are loosened; they have no particular axe to grind but that of material comfort.

The average Englishman assures you the first day by the turn of his shoulders and the angle of his profile as he surveys the menu over his pince-nez that he has positively no desire at all to speak to anybody. You will be the more surprised a day or two later at his sudden thaw and his very evident and jerky desire to be on confidential terms with certain favoured members of the hotel community. The Frenchman, while observing the civilities, sustains a very much more real reserve, confining himself almost entirely to his family, if he happens to possess one. Alone the German gives you good-day from the very beginning, and, paterfamilias or filiusfamilias, is disposed to such friendliness that usually you both part with mutual promises to visit each other, bolstered up by a subsequent exchange of picture postcards and amateur photographs.

For English and Germans have very much more in common than our halfpenny press would allow us to believe. The "entente cordiale" is based chiefly upon that complete misunderstanding which may blind towards faults and virtues according to prevailing circumstances. There is always between the average Frenchman and German that fine-edged scorn with which subtle if defeated France regards the robustious and sturdily uncomplex authors of her undoing. Nor is the German, in spite of an ample provision of skin, slow to feel this, with the result that he turns rather to England, with whom his quarrel exists at present mostly on paper. Even though he may have very often good material reasons for his advances—a desire to practise his English being among the most prominent—these advances are nevertheless instigated by a real spirit of friendliness where English people are concerned. The Englishman, on his side, is often as grateful to the German for addressing him in his own tongue as for being the first to break down the mauvaise honte which afflicts him as a nation. The German has never been shy, he has a childlike confidence in the pleasure he is conferring, and, not suffering greatly from a sense of humour, has no fear of ridicule.

The friendliness of the German is but the characteristic in another form upon which the Briton most prides himself—hospitality. The limitations of the German dwelling are for the most part prohibitive of the Logierbesuch—a dread affair in which you must never for a moment leave your guest to his own devices. In the same way the natural shyness of the Englishman often gives him an appearance of reserve outside his own house. The instinct is, however, the same, and is cause of the ready friendships which spring up when questions of Dreadnoughts are in abeyance. Another point of contact between the two nations is their very real admiration of each other. I have often been embarrassed on witnessing the awe with which the Englishman regards the miracle of speaking another language besides his own. He will even apologise for his own ignorance, regardless of the fact that the German wisely prefers a friend upon whom he can sharpen his teeth. The German, on the other hand, has the greatest reverence for most things English. He copies our clothes, he revels in our books, he has adopted tea as a regular meal, and as for exercise, cold baths, and fresh air, he quite out-Englishes the English. Even when he wishes to boast gently, he will say, "Ah, now we can do that as well as you!"

Another characteristic common to both nations is that idealism almost impossible in a too logical France. English idealism very often runs to mere sectarianism, but it is the idealism which has ever been the backbone of lost causes. German idealism—some call it materialism—is a heroic belief in the new, whether social, scientific, or philosophic. Finally, England may now congratulate herself that she shares with Germany that reputation for rudeness in travelling of which she formerly took the whole credit.

The truth is that, while "hurra-patriots," jingoes, or chauvinists exist in most countries to make mischief, the differences between England and Germany are merely the squabbles common to near relations. The family traits persist in spite of them, and when irresponsible scaremongers talk about an internecine conflict between the two peoples as a possibility of the future, we may comfort ourselves with the reflection that dog does not eat dog.

THE FOLLY OF CONSISTENCY.

To be consistent is a folly only required of statesmen in their policy, and tradesmen in their charges, and in both cases a lapse inclining towards us and against them will find us charitable—consistently charitable. There is no such thing as absolute consistency; even in that precise art which teaches us how, by the proper application of fire, to turn raw material into food, there is no such thing. We may, for instance, be told to stir a mixture till it is of the consistency of cream, as if cream were not sometimes of the consistency of water, and other times of the consistency of butter in its happier moments. There is a saying that nothing in life is certain except that nothing in life is certain. Nothing in life is consistent except inconsistency.

One of the dictionary meanings given for the word is, "a degree of density." If we read this meaning into such a phrase as "There was a great deal of consistency about his policy," we shall get at its real meaning very quickly. Human nature will not, as the Australian terms it, "stay put." It changes from day to day, and consequently its circumstances change also; but the change in the circumstances usually follows the change in character which has caused it. This discrepancy, multiplied by exactly the number of people in the world, gives a possibility of so many changes that to be consistent in the sense of believing to-morrow what you believed yesterday is to be completely unprogressive. If we were all born with a complete knowledge of everything that happens in the world, and the reasons for its happening, we might have a better right to stick to our own opinion, but as it is, every person we meet ought to upset slightly our previous balance with the world, so that we are for ever seeking a new poise.

It is for this reason that most great men are charged with inconsistency. Gladstone incurred the reproach of turning his back on himself at pretty regular intervals. Men of science have the same charge levelled against them. Any mind which is receptive of new ideas must be inconsistent. So long as growth continues, fresh aspects pour in on a plastic mind; it is only when it becomes fixed that it becomes consistent. The truly great man is as inconsistent as a child, because the impetus with which he starts life does not decay; he is ready to absorb new facts at any time.

The consistent man is like a cherry-stone left inadvertently in a piece of cake, and his chief purpose is to give toothache to people who bite on him unexpectedly. He has very little relation with the ingredients round him, does us little good, and gets none. To be consistent is to deny all the principal factors of life, because progress of every kind, in thought, in emotion, or in habits, is completely dependent on one's ability to forsake a previous point of view for one that seems better. If humanity ever reaches the perfect point of view it will become automatically consistent, but we need not consider that contingency just yet. One can, of course, be consistently truthful or consistently honourable so long as one regards truth and honour as mutable quantities. Indeed, they vary not only with circumstances but even with mood. The man who never has a struggle between his duty to God and his duty to his neighbour escapes the conflict simply because he has decided to ignore one or the other. If he once realises that Cæsar has a right to the things that are Cæsar's quite as much in his degree as God has a right to the things that are God's—if he once realises this, and acts on the realisation, he will become inconsistent on the spot. The consistent man is a terror to all who know him. To be sure, you can count on him to do a given thing in given circumstances, but you cannot count on that given thing seeming so desirable to be done next week as it does to-day.

No fine moral qualities spring from trying to arrange the details of life in a fixed relation to one another. The relation and coherence of these details spring from the underlying quality. Life is not an American desk, with pigeon holes and a self-locking roll top, in which things are sorted out, initialled, and card-indexed, and to-morrow's work can be left ready under lock and key when you leave business this evening. It is rather a letter box, into which anything may be dropped at any moment. The most we can do is to wait for the postman with "courage, gaiety, and the quiet mind," holding ourselves ready to answer our letters when they come—according to their contents, and not according to what letters we think the postman ought to bring.

Life is the greatest vibrating machine that has ever been invented, and the quicker it goes (and we work it pretty quickly nowadays) the more it shakes. Vibration is supposed to be good for the liver, and to soothe the nerves, but it is not good for people who wish to be absolutely unyielding. They will find in the long run that they can only remain in their place by vibrating too. The hardest bit of nut in a jelly must shake with it.

Consistency is the ungenerous objection of the narrow-minded towards the wish of the Creator that we should evolve, and if any one says that there are people so inconsistent that they are completely superficial, one can only point out that this is due, not to their sense of the inconsistency of things, but only to their consistent lack of understanding. Instability is another matter.

NOTES FROM PARIS.

SARAH BERNHARDT AT CAUTERETS.

AN exceptional offer from the Théâtre de la Nature at Cauterets induced Mme. Sarah Bernhardt to give up her well-earned annual rest at Belle Isle. The fee of 5,000 francs a representation, held out to her as a bait, is the largest ever obtained by an actress in France. Coquelin received 6,000 francs each time he appeared at the Riviera Casino of the Brothers Isola. They found it suited them to have him at that price as often as he could come. He gave them a great deal of Cyrano—the piece in which he thought he could be most himself. The price put upon his talent set him, before he got used to it, beside himself with joyful pride. He fizzed and exploded from high spirits, strutted in an amazing way, and dealt in endless gag like a Frédéric Lemaître, to give the brothers the full worth of their 6,000 francs. He even continued the fun between the acts in the restaurant of the Casino.

Mme. Sarah Bernhardt's Cauterets engagement was drawn up to coincide with grand tourist enterprises disguised as pilgrimages to Lourdes. These enterprises usually bring there in August and the early weeks of September an average of 700,000 pilgrim tourists. They can have an eight-days' extension this year, hotels in the Pyrenean lower valleys being well-nigh empty. In the higher valleys of the Cauterets level there has been much finer weather, and such an attraction as Sarah Bernhardt could not but give a splendid fillip to the Casino and the hotel business generally in drawing up pilgrims.

The pieces agreed on between Mme. Sarah Bernhardt and the director of the Nature Theatre at Cauterets were "La Samaritaine" and "Les Bouffons," by Zamaçois. "La Samaritaine" is one of Rostand's early things, and was thought fetching for a religiously-excited crowd of excursionists. No doubt it is chock-full of heretical verses, but all right in its general spirit. In any case, Monsignor Schaeffer (the former director at St. Sulpice of Mmes. Loubet, Fallières, and their daughters) is not likely to tell pilgrims to shut their ears to many passages of this sacred poem or drama. Monsignor is counted too much the opportunist by episcopal and other zealots, who, we may well imagine, envy him the 350,000 francs that, on an annual average, he draws from Lourdes. I may add that fears are entertained of a rival shrine to the one that brings him this profit being set up in the grounds of the Vatican.

"Les Bouffons" is singular in its originality and in an old world feeling throughout. It first was staged at the Sarah Bernhardt Theatre. King Edward expressed to its author and chief interpreter the great pleasure he had in hearing and seeing it acted.

In an interval between the Cauterets plays, our phenomenal great-grandmother hurries to Sainte Wandrille, near Le Havre, to witness the peripatetic representation of "Pelléas et Mélisande." "Macbeth" was brought out last year in this manner at the same place. There is no scene shifting, but the company changes place to new scenes, more or less natural. The action in "Pelléas et Mélisande" passes in the first scene at the entrance to a wood in twilight. There the audience see the meeting of King Goland and the Princesse Mélisande. They hear what they say, and go elsewhere, and are treated to a slice from the home life of the King and Queen of Allmonde—a fabulous monarchy. They next see their Majesties at their devotions in their private chapel—a Gothic one. Passing through a vestibule, they have a sight of the private apartments of Goland and his royal spouse. Finally there is the treacherous murder of the hero and heroine in a deserted garden, as, with faces close to the water of an old fountain-basin, they seek to read in it the puzzling problems of their destiny. Mme. Sarah Bernhardt has been asked by Mme. Georgette Leblanc (who personates Mélisande) to act at once as the severe, albeit friendly, critic and adviser. Part of the drama is set to music by Fauré. The hard-worked manageress will also come out in October in a third sex character—that of Nero, in "Britannicus" according to the letter, but the suspicion at Cameret is that it will be according to suggestions given by M. Haraucourt when they both studied together his "Néron," which Antoine now reads. Mlle. Brille is to personate Agrippina, of whom there is a grandly impressive image in the Museum of Naples. It deserves the serious and contemplative study of this actress. Nero was a vain creature. In gazing on this portrait of his mother, one comes to the conclusion that he must have felt small in her presence, and so hated her, and had her drowned. There is a replica of the portrait statue I speak of in the Louvre.

The poor of the locality in which the restored abbey of Sainte Wandrille stands are to receive through the mayor, curé, and charity bureau all the money made with "Pelléas and Mélisande."

On returning for good to Paris Mme. Bernhardt will revive "L'Aiglon" at her theatre. Mlle. Dufrène, her understudy, may often replace her in the third sex part of Napoleon II. M. Levy will sustain the blustering rôle of Flambeau. In the daytime there will be the rehearsals of "La Conquête d'Athènes," by M. Albert du Bois, in four acts, with three changes of scene. The scenery will comprise a public place in Athens, the street of the statues, and the Hall of the Archons.

An American has just said to me: "The Pope did Colonel Roosevelt the service of making him the favourite of the Methodist Connexion in America. They number over fifteen millions. Their pulpits have more heartfelt fervour than those of any other religious denomination. Their women, when at all religious, are eloquent. This they owe to the class meetings on which John Wesley so much insisted. It is a wonderful school for the sort of eloquence that springs from religious emotion, and is not to be cowed or put down. With this Colonel Roosevelt has with him the mass of Nationalist Americans. They are proud of the way in which, as an American citizen travelling in Europe, he asserted his equality with no matter what King or Emperor. The cable announcing to the United States his having declined an invitation from the Emperor of Austria to meet at a shooting party the heir to the Empire awoke there a great current of enthusiasm. The reason he gave to the Emperor was a previous engagement to shoot in Hungary with a Hungarian politician who has been generally in opposition. He always in Europe disclaimed being in the slightest degree official, except at King Edward's funeral. And there he evidently felt belittled in being officially reduced to the same level as M. Pichon, lieutenant of Clemenceau. I saw both in the same carriage in the Edgware Road, at the tail of the kings. Roosevelt kept his head steadily turned away from Pichon, and at Windsor he broke away from him altogether, going about by himself with his overcoat on his arm. Other Americans who saw him too, some at one place, some at another, were delighted. Sum total: All 'good Americans' will vote for Teddy and his nominees. As a Democrat, I deplore this almost certain preference."

The Pope's decree of August 8 will have, it may be expected, graver consequences than his refusal to receive Theodore Roosevelt unless he promised to wash his hands of the Methodist community in Rome. The Catholic press in this country keeps silence on that new law of the church, for such it is. I mean the rule to administer the communion of the eucharist for the first time to children of seven. At that age they are taken to confession and are theologically judged liable to commit sins. I think myself that the Pope is psychologically right, though wrong from the standpoint of a wide and necessary expediency. The preparation for the first Communion and the ceremony itself fills in France the month of May. A great trade is based upon it in boys' suits with white ribbon armlets, and toilettes and veils of white muslin for girls. The latter find in it a foretaste of their own weddings, with their family festivities, excitements, and the bestowal of charming gifts. Godfathers and godmothers are as the good fairy at the christening. If rich, they give gold watches of considerable value, prayer-books bound in ivory, with illuminated margins possibly far more valuable, or art chaplets that hereafter may fetch mints of money at public auctions. Purses of silver chain work containing gold or silver coins are among the gifts. The very poorest and most free-thinking folks manage to be generous on the occasion of the first Communion. They feast after promenading through the town with the communicants at some better restaurant than any they usually go to. The girl looks a shapeless mass of white muslin, and her white satin shoes are evidently not suited for the side paths of the streets. Still, from habit she is almost worshipped as the very incarnation of youthful poetry.

A kind of theoretical equality reigns between rich and poor at the first Communion. It may have in it a basis of reality if the catechist who prepares children for the rite be of an evangelical mind. Thus the girls of all ranks at Eu who communicated for the first time along with Queen Amélie became at the holy table her sisters. We are not to take the sisterhood in an absolute sense. But on the anniversary of the date on which it was entered into the Queen sends an autograph letter of good wishes to each of her "sisters." The daughters of wealthy parents must dress in plain muslin. The fashion journals for April are full of hints to enable the latter to get round la sainte mousseline rule. They can make up in dainty tissues and in fine lingerie stitching for obligatory plainness. The details may stand out by the very exquisiteness. Artistic fancy may appear in the gift prayer-book, chaplet, purse, or, if the girl is named Marguerite, in a badge of her patron saint, enriched with pearls of a fine orient iridescence.

Poor children in town and country are kept from drudging work until they are through the First Communion. This is to give them time for the catechism classes and to preserve their freshness of mind. In towns the curés do not look closely into the habits of the boys or even of the girls; but in the country they do, and as a punishment for neglecting catechism they often delay for a year or more admission to the ceremony. This delay in villages is thought shameful, and to augur ill for the dunce, scapegrace, or irreligious youngster who has not been "admitted." A boy who plays about instead of going to the catechism class is seriously threatened with "non-admission." This brings him to his senses, or at any rate frightens his parents. The mother herself then takes him to the chapel, where the catechist gives instruction. After the First Communion a boy is not much bothered about religion. But girls are put through another year of religious training, good to inspire a conventual vocation, or to promote any neuropathic religiosity that may be simmering at the bottom of their nervous systems. The catechism for the First Communion is a most edifying little book, and replete with high philosophy in the simplest form. Any boy or girl of from ten to twelve can mentally digest its higher truths. "Le Catéchisme de Persévérance" is another thing. It makes for the mysticism that permeated the letters of Saint Thérèsa, tends to render the young mind impervious to ideas that have no direct religious bearing, and to excite a strong distaste for the realities of life. We must all keep company from the cradle to the grave with these realities, though we became Carmelites, or even chose, as did Saint Colette, to become cenobites. I am therefore with the Pope in preventing this crowding out by preparation for the rite known in France as the Renewal of the First Communion on its first anniversary. A child of seven would see in the First Communion a tasteless lozenge or a tiny cake, and could not be catechised. The habit of communicating from such an early age would, in most cases, create a sort of indifference, though it might also act, at the same time, as a binding link to the Catholic form of religion.

It is hard to teach boys to look on Jesus in the eucharist as a Divine spouse, but too easy to teach girls. They are often, as Daughters of Sainte Marie, taught at separate times, in separate chapels; so that pabulum that might seem bêtises to the brothers is kept exclusively for the sisters. A deal of romance—I use the mildest word I can find—steals into the girl's mind when Jesus is spoken of as le Divin Epoux dans le Saint Sacrement. This, again, is my reason for being with the Pope as a psychologist. L'Epoux Divin is a senseless term to a Daughter of Marie entering her seventh year.

Lina Cavalieri and her American husband have retired for the present from the world to the quiet and very secluded Vallangoujard, a vale from which branch those of Balincourt and Valmondois, dear to artists. They have brought there a disestablished manse and are converting it into a rustic home, meet for a singer who is the soul of poetry. Why they have given it the name of Villa des Singes I am at a loss to think. I accidentally discovered the retreat of Lina Cavalieri in this way: Hearing a flood of melody pour from an old house, I asked the village groceress who the singer was. "An Italian lady who has a wide-world fame lives there. She made a large fortune in America, and married, at the mayoralty in which Liane de Pougy became a Princess, an American who is reported to be richer than she is. We know her here by the name of La Belle, and have only cause to praise her, for she is truly amiable, and has a gracious way of dealing with the very humblest. Often she sits singing on the doorsteps of her house, or before an open window, while somebody plays an accompaniment. It was a gendarme who acted as fireman at the Lyrique when she had an engagement there who told us who she really is, and he says she never sang better before a house there blazing with diamonds than before the windows of the old manse, just to afford a little joy to the people who gather on the road to listen. Her village fairs are quite new in this part of the country, though artists come so often down here. Acquaintances in the châteaux, small bourgeois like ourselves, and the people who work in the fields are welcome to the fair. All are happy, and go away contented." "And your Balincourt Baroness? Is she also invited?" "Non, non; pas celle-là."

When Daumier grew old, paralysed, and almost blind, Corot bought for him, "as a fraternal duty," a cottage with a field just outside the village of Valmondois. Daumier's heirs allowed the admirers of the caricaturist to use the cottage as a Daumier museum. Some of his unpublished cartoons and pencil sketches are to be seen there. That Thackeray was what he became as a novelist was largely due to his overmastering admiration for Daumier. Not that the latter ever wrote a line to be printed, except to name his series of cartoons. The great Balzac himself owed much to Daumier, who had prodigious insight and could read a human being as any of us can read a book. There was too much pose in the satire of Thackeray. Daumier always pencilled as he saw and felt. He had no sort of talent for pushing himself or for making money. But he was one of the wealthiest men of his time in the things that money cannot buy.

THE VIRTUE OF NECESSITY.

(After Horace. Odes III., i.)

The vulgar throng with scorn I view;
I bar your Philistines;
I write alone for people who Appreciate well-turned lines.

The lot of kings some bards have drawn,
As sovereign blessedness;
Whereas, a king's himself a pawn
In Heaven's great game of chess.

One man he owns a big estate,
One's champion at some game,
One is a master of debate,
One bears an honoured name.

Impartial Fate to prince and boor
Awards here smiles, there slaps;
She often compensates the poor,
The rich she handicaps.

Lives Crœsus, far as we can see,
In luxury and ease;
But o'er his head there hangs, may be,
A sword of Damocles.

He cannot sleep for anxious dread;
He longs for morning's light;
But Hodge, upon his humble bed,
Snores through the livelong night.

The man with competence content—
What worries he escapes!
No anxious moments e'er he's spent
On Fortune's whims and japes.

You ne'er saw Hodge, in feverish way,
The latest prices skim.
If all "the House" went smash to-day,
'Twere just the same to him.

Take me. Although a poet poor,
As poets mostly be,
The wolf I'm keeping from my door;
And that's enough for me.

Care grips the wealthy like a vice.
Get rich then? Where's the good?
Besides, at verses' present price,
I couldn't if I would!

LETTER FROM THE LINKMAN.

THE Toryheimer Party, dear Lady Betty, with its House of Ghosts, is in a desperate condition. The hereditary spectres have clanged Dreadnoughts, gibbered and moaned in vain. The old contrivances, "War Clouds," "Foreign Invasion," "National Ruin," and "Socialism" do not disturb, much less do they terrify, the enlightened people. The haunted-system is expiring.

There is a story which is applicable to the situation. The wife of a labourer was at her last. "William," she whispered, "you will see the ould sow doesn't kill her young?" "Ay, ay, wife," answered the husband. "And that Lizzie goes to schule reg'lar?" "Ay, ay, wife," he replied. "And that Tommy has his clothes mended?" "Leave it to me," said William. At length he interrupted the lady: "Now never thee mind them things, wife. I'll see to 'em all; you just go on with your dying."

The British multitude will undertake to deal with "Foreign Invasion," "National Ruin," "Socialism," and all other difficulties which may arise; at the moment it requires the Toryheimer Party to "go on with its dying."

. . . . . .

"LOST, a War Cloud. Anyone returning the same to L-rd R-s-b-ry, or giving information which shall lead to its recovery, will be HANDSOMELY rewarded. Of no use whatever except to the owner. Address, D-lm-ny P-rk."

The increasing tendency to be careless with war clouds cannot be too strongly deprecated. Several Peers and Opposition Members of Parliament have recently mislaid important war clouds at political meetings and elsewhere. It has been observed that since then the air-men throughout the world have encountered unexpected currents, and some of the accidents which have occurred lately are thought to be attributable to the prevalence of these derelict bodies. Besides, war clouds are essentially a luxury of the very rich; is it fair to place temptation in the way of the less favoured by carelessly mislaying such objects?

There is another consideration which must not be overlooked. The unsettled weather in England this summer is supposed by many meteorological authorities to have been mainly caused by the bursting of stray war clouds. Crops of hay and corn, collectively valued at millions of money, have been destroyed by the continual downpour, thousands of farmers have been brought almost to the verge of bankruptcy, and the holidays of hundreds of thousands of men, women, and children have been utterly spoilt.

* * * * * *

"Ragging" the Germans is a very objectionable proceeding. At the funeral of the late King Edward there were two mourners in the procession who aroused the enthusiasm of the crowds both in London and Windsor; the German Emperor and Lord Kitchener. The Tories misunderstand the multitude; the many in England admire the Emperor, and have not the faintest intention of engaging in another "Millionaire-made war."

The "Socialists" are more numerous in Germany than in any other country, and the continual opposition to the Emperor in the English newspapers only encourages them. Were the "Socialists" to succeed in Germany "Socialism" would become more rife in England and throughout the world. Were the Emperor to crush the "Socialists" he would have a freer hand to develop the designs which are attributed to him.

An Anglo-German war would enable us, no doubt, to destroy the German Navy, but it would certainly lead to the nations combining to protect themselves on the seas, otherwise every country would be at the mercy of England.

The "never fight but when attacked" principle is spreading rapidly from pole to pole; with the proper reservations it is an elementary condition of true civilisation. In these days, when the interests of all are inextricably interwoven, a great war entails ruin in almost every direction, and modern communities are eager, in consequence, to prevent unnecessary conflicts.

"There is something worse than war; the working man" is a policy the existence of which is well-known to the many, and they are not likely to let it be pursued.—Believe me to be, very truly yours,

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE RETIREMENT OF MAJORS.

DEAR SIR,—With reference to the Royal Warrant of last year requiring majors to serve on till fifty years of age for the pension of £300 a year, there is one aspect of the case which I have not seen commented on in the press. That is that in the good old days, when we had a Royal Commander-in-Chief, all alterations in the R.W. which affected an officer adversely were not applicable in the ranks held when the warrant was issued, but only to those who accepted promotion to a higher rank. In the case under reference majors within two years of forty-eight only have been given this option. I may be wrong, but, having usually kept in touch with the many changes in our conditions, I know of no previous instance where the old procedure was departed from, and it would be interesting to know whether it is unique, arranged by an Army Council subservient to the Treasury demands. In the case of the rank and file, as "Scrutator" remarks, owing to the terms of their attestation, new conditions cannot be imposed on them, except at times when the privilege of extending their service or re-engaging is accorded to them, when they usually are required to accept the new conditions as part payment for remaining in the service.

COLONEL.

TERRITORIAL BRIGADE-MAJORS.

Dear TRUTH,—I crave permission, as one interested in Territorials, to suggest, through your columns, that an alteration should be made in the staffs of the brigades of the various Territorial units. At present, rightly, the staff of a Territorial Division, including the General, is made up of Regular officers on full pay, whereas a Territorial brigade is commanded by a brigadier who is in all cases a retired colonel of the Regular Army, with a retired officer as his staff officer. This officer is styled a brigade-major, and gets £100 per annum beyond his pension for the work he does.

A very considerable weeding out of these brigade-majors is necessary, judging from what I saw and heard during the recent manœuvres near Felixstowe. I happened to follow the fortunes of the Blue Force, which included the East Midland Brigade, and I was present on the occasion of an attack across Brightwell Heath, performed by this brigade. Much to the amusement of the onlookers, the brigade major informed each commanding officer, as his battalion came up, exactly how, in his opinion, the attack should be executed. It is a fundamental rule that orders as to what the General wishes done are issued to all concerned, the execution of those orders is left to those who have actually to carry them out.

My reason for attracting public notice to the appointment of brigade-majors in general is that they are not up-to-date, and for £100 a year beyond their pensions cannot be expected to keep so, and the Territorial Force in particular requires smart, tactful, and up-to-date officers in order to ensure respect for them. To appoint an officer time expired for age is not conducive to efficiency, and neither is it fair to run the chance of such an officer influencing his retired colonel, the brigadier, in his reports on units under his command. I speak from many years' service.

BRITISH SEAMEN IN THE MERCHANT SERVICE.

SIR,—Anent your par about sailors and merchant shipping. You speak of "bringing the supply into touch with the demand." My little experience in connection with British shipping leads me to think you might well have advised the other way about—to bring the demand—if there is such a thing—into touch with the supply. A retired chief officer of the R.N. had been trying to get his boy into the merchant shipping. After nearly a year of fruitless efforts a berth was obtained for him, but only through great personal influence. The boy is one of whom the country may well be proud. His personal character is without a ntain; his physical fitness is quite exceptional. He has already won honours and reward for jumping overboard and saving life from drowning. Yet with all these qualifications there did not appear to be the least chance of his getting a ship without the help already referred to. Why not? J. P.
